THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE THIRD SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-FIFTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 94

NINTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1985-86

House of Commons

Monday 17 March 1986

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

London Docklands Light Railway

1. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement concerning the current state of discussions on applications concerning the London docklands light railway and its proposed extension.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I have nothing further to add to what my hon. Friend the Minister of State told the House during the debate on the Second Reading of the London Docklands Railway (City Extension) Bill on 6 March, at columns 532-35.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Secretary of State recall that his hon. Friend told the House that public money would support the City extension of the docklands light railway, and that instead of requiring it to be privately run it would, if constructed, be run by London Regional Transport? Has the sum that will go towards this extension been agreed, and, whatever the amount, will it not mean a subsidy to the developers of Canary wharf?

Mr. Ridley: The negotiations are not yet complete and, therefore, I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman the outcome. However, there are two elements to the cost of the westward extension to the Bank—the capital cost and the profit or loss of operating the railway in the public sector. I confirm that it will be operated in the public sector.

Mr. Mikardo: Is the Docklands Light Railway Company taking any steps to ascertain views on its proposals from the people in the area in which the railway will operate? If not, will he suggest that it would be in the company's best interests to seek to meet representatives of the organisations that represent those people?

Mr. Ridley: I do not know what the body is to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The procurer of the initial railway is the London Docklands Development Corporation. The transport users' consultative committee arrangements will also apply when the railway comes into operation.

Transport Act 1985

2. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport how he intends to monitor the effect on public transport services of full operation of the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. Ridley: My Department's Transport and Road Research Laboratory has established a programme for monitoring the effects of the Act with the help of various consultants. The results will be made public from time to time.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many people, particularly the elderly, are concerned that when deregulation takes place there will be no late-night or weekend buses? Has he discovered whether, when he has monitored the situation, that is so?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman will be extremely pleased to know that, according to my information, on the day when registrations closed about 15,000 bus services were registered. If they do not include late-night or weekend services, the county council in the area affected has the right and the duty to go out to tender to obtain extra services on contract. That is what the public assistance to county council expenditure is for. I am sure that the hon.

Gentleman will join me in welcoming the fact that 15,000 services have been registered at no cost whatever to the ratepayer or taxpayer.

Mr. Adley: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that since the liberalisation of coach services his Department has been forced to put governors on coaches because of excessive speeds on motorways? Is he further aware that the Metropolitan police are extremely worried and aggravagated about the result that my right hon. Friend's coach policy has had on the routes that coaches use in London, and also on parking? In particular, will he review the impact of his policy on the behaviour of coach operators?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot accept any connection between the deregulation of long-distance coach services and the behaviour of individual drivers on the road. In some cases it is deplorable, but in many cases coach drivers are extremely good. If the coaching industry is prospering and expanding and needs more access to the capital, my hon. Friend will join me in welcoming that, because it produces extra, cheap and efficient services for customers, which is what transport is all about.

Mr. James Lamond: Is the Minister aware that some of the predictions in Committee on the Transport Bill, as it was, are already coming to fruition? Is he aware that there are thousands of redundancies among transport workers, that many small villages are to be left without bus services, that fares are already forecast to increase and, all in all, that this is the biggest fiasco over which even he has presided?

Mr. Ridley: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that many of the forecasts made are coming to fruition. The first is the 15,000 registered services without subsidy. The second is the extraordinarily successful effect of minibus introduction, which has been a direct consequence of the Bill, and which in Exeter now has three times the patronage that it had before the Bill, is providing hundreds of extra jobs for drivers, and is running at a profit instead of a loss. I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is complaining about.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Is the Minister aware that some councils and councillors have a vested interest in ensuring that deregulation does not work, irrespective of the damage that they may do to their undertakings or to the people whom they are supposed to serve? Will the monitoring process recognise that grave danger?

Mr. Ridley: Yes. I take my hon. Friend's point, which is perfectly correct. The monitoring process will not only have a computerised data base of all bus service registrations, but will include detailed studies of selected areas and case studies of particular developments. We shall watch it carefully.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Is there not already evidence to show that the number of services registered is far below even the most pessimistic forecasts, and are in some cases as low as 20 per cent.? Does the Minister recall his statement to the Bus and Coach Council that operators are now free to operate without the constraints of a social conscience? Does that not mean that the policy will reduce vast swathes of the country to nothing more than open prisons?

Mr. Ridley: No, Sir. Whereas the National Bus Company expected about 70 per cent. of existing routes to be registered, the figure is more likely to be 80 per cent. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will cheer at another piece of good news. It is a major benefit that the responsibility for providing socially necessary and desirable routes on social and political grounds is now firmly and properly where it should be — with local authorities, not the NBC.

Transport Act 1985

3. Mr. Bob Edwards asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with passenger transport executive staff concerning transitional arrangements following from abolition of the metropolitan counties and implementation of the Transport Act 1985.

5. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is satisfied with transitional arrangements for public transport in the metropolitan counties.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I have on a number of occasions during the past few months met representatives of the new PTAs and their PTEs to discuss various aspects of public transport in the metropolitan counties, including the transitional arrangements consequent upon the Local Government Act 1985 and the Transport Act 1985. These arrangements seem to be reasonable.

Mr. Edwards: Is the Minister aware that the trade unions concerned do not think that the arrangements are reasonable? They are afraid that national agreements are being scrapped which will lead to absolute starvation competition among the workers in the transport industry.

Mr. Mitchell: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that £3 million has been allocated for the west midlands for this purpose. We shall consider applications for borrowing consent, should that prove to be insufficient.

Mr. Eastham: Is it not a fact that none of the local transport authorities believe that the Government are improving the services, and that every authority is predicting chaos on public transport? Are not local authorities saying constantly that they are now underfunded and, consequently, are introducing massive fare increases and massive redundancies?

Mr. Mitchell: For the Greater Manchester area, about £83 million is available. That should enable the purchase of a substantial number of additional services over and above those registered. The hon. Gentleman and other Labour Members representing metropolitan county areas have known since last summer that if they persuaded the PTAs to start gradually increasing fares, more bus workers jobs would be saved. They have failed to do that, and they have failed the busmen.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my hon. Friend look carefully at the strange arrangements that have been made by the GLC, particularly the institution of a large number of bus lanes and large islands in the centre of the road, which seem intended to do only one thing—bring traffic to a standstill?

Mr. Mitchell: I note what my hon. Friend has said, but his point is somewhat outside the question.

Mr. Parris: In the past, have metropolitan authorities been getting more, or less, than their fair share of the total amount of subsidy?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has put his finger on a good way of measuring the appropriate support. Expenditure per person of the county population on bus subsidy is £2 in Oxfordshire, £3 in Warwickshire, £23 in West Yorkshire, £30 in Greater Manchester, £53 in Merseyside and £60 in South Yorkshire.

Mr. Snape: They keep voting for it.

Mr. Mitchell: In other words, the expenditure in the metropolitan counties has been grossly extravagant compared with expenditure in the rest of the country.

Mr. Snape: They vote for it.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), who keeps interrupting from a sedentary position, should know that, unfortunately, there is no direct co-relationship between the ratepayers and the voters.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister of State accept that when he comes to Bradford on Wednesday he will find a large number of people who want to maintain a good bus service in West Yorkshire, who are disgusted at the proportion of services that will be cut, and are dismayed that up to 800 bus staff will be made redundant? Will he put his arguments to the ratepayers and electors of Bradford, who want to keep the best possible transport services and do not want to see the Government kill them all?

Mr. Mitchell: Perhaps the hon. Member also wishes me to tell the people of Bradford that the high level of rates is part of the reason for the high level of unemployment. The people of Bradford are as anxious as those in other parts of the country to serve in the increasing job opportunities being created by this Government.

Mr. Stott: The Secretary of State, as well as the Minister of State, have made much of the figure of 15,000 services being registered. Would the Minister not have done a greater service to the House of Commons had he been more honest and expressed that figure as a percentage? Is he aware that I am advised that in Greater Manchester, only 40 per cent. of the services have been registered as profitable, leaving 60 per cent. of the routes currently being run as unprofitable? Will not those groups have to be subsidised by the ratepayers or the taxpayers? Do the Secretary of State and the Minister of State not know full well that the money allocated to the metropolitan authorities falls far below the level required to maintain those services? If the Minister is not aware of that, he should have been with me in Saddleworth last Thursday night, when I spoke in the constituency of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), where not one route has been registered as profitable? If he cannot tell me, will he tell his hon. Friend whether those buses will still be running after October?

Mr. Mitchell: I can give the hon. Gentleman the information for which he asks, and I hope that he will be pleased when he hears it. Between two thirds and three quarters of the routes being run now have been registered. In addition, I can tell him that although in Greater Manchester a smaller proportion of routes are registered, a much larger allocation of finance is available—about £83 million. One could buy many bus routes with £83 million.

Mr. Dickens: As my constituency has been mentioned, is my hon. Friend surprised to learn that the people of Littleborough and Saddleworth have been grumbling for many years about their deplorable bus services? We hope that the plans laid before Parliament will give those people the excellent service for which they have hoped for many years.

Mr. Mitchell: In recent years there has been a chronic decline in bus services throughout the country. We have every reason to believe that the changes that we have introduced will stem that decline and, in many places, lead to additional services.

British Rail

4. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of British Rail, and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Ridley: I last met the chairman on 17 February and discussed a wide range of matters of current interest.

Mr. Maclennan: What resources may be made available from the Department of Transport to the chairman and the board to carry out their policy of improving the track between Wick, Thurso and Inverness by bridging the Dornoch firth and laying a new railway line?

Mr. Ridley: Investment in track, bridges, or any other material is entirely a matter for the board to consider. It puts forward plans, and we always approve them if they are viable. We have received no investment application in relation to the Dornoch firth bridge.

Mr. Fry: When my right hon. Friend sees Sir Robert Reid, will he tell him that the recent statement by the management at Leicester that British Rail does not want so many commuters from Wellingborough and Kettering and that they will price them away is hardly a marketing policy to be commended, nor should it be expected of British Rail?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend will agree that that is a matter for the management of British Rail, which must be responsible for what its managers say. I am sure that he will take the matter up with the chairman.

Mr. Anderson: When the Minister meets the chairman, will he make clear his views about the swathe of redundancies on the freight side in south Wales, from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) and the Severn tunnel junction in the east through to Llanelli in the west, both of which will be closed, which will have a considerable effect on job losses in the Principality, and on the environment, because of the increased lorry movements? Does he recognise that this is due principally to the Government's policy of destroying the manufacturing base of south Wales and imposing an impossible freight target on British Rail?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is a matter for the management of British Rail. It has agreed the present PSO target and the target for freight, and it must decide how to implement that policy. The hon. Gentleman should take the matter up with British Rail.

Mr. Robert Atkins: When he next meets the chairman of British Rail, will my right hon. Friend tell him that my constituents and I are fed up with the west coast intercity line being the Cinderella of British Rail, in that it has no 125s or advanced passenger trains, punctuality is no more than a joke, and the information given to passengers before and during travelling on the line is inadequate? Will he tell him that there must be some changes, because I am fed up with receiving letters from my constituents, who express rightful concern about the quality of the service?

Mr. Ridley: I am sure that the chairman will read Hansard and see the comments of my hon. Friend and other hon. Members. However, I must repeat that these are matters for British Rail. The House would not expect me to be permanently employed conveying messages from hon. Members to the chairman of British Rail.

Mr. Snape: When the Secretary of State next meets the chairman of British Rail, will he discuss punctuality with him? Does he agree with the secretary of the Central Transport Consultative Committee that many routes are causing serious concern and that the CTCC is strongly urging British Rail to improve standards? Does it give him any cause for comfort to know that 48 per cent. of eastern region trains and 34 per cent. of trains on southern region ran late last year? Does he think that Sir Robert Reid is making a pretty rotten job of running British Rail, and if the Secretary of State considers that he could do better, has he thought of applying for the job himself?

Mr. Ridley: I must repudiate the hon. Gentleman's last suggestion. I believe that Sir Robert Reid is extremely good at running British Rail. I do not think that I would be at all good at it. Equally, Sir Robert Reid would not be quite so good at running my Department. As for the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the level of standards expected of British Rail, including punctuality, is laid down in the objectives which I gave to the chairman two and a half years ago. It is up to the management of British Rail to achieve those standards.

London (Lorry Ban)

6. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his assessment of the effect of the Greater London council lorry ban which came into operation on 31 January.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I am not aware of any beneficial effects so far for Londoners in return for the considerable sums the exercise has cost.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend tell the House how much this pointless exercise has cost London ratepayers? Does he agree that the best possible way to keep unnecessary lorry loads off the streets of London has been the construction and will be the completion of the M25 orbital motorway?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir. The M25 has reduced lorry mileage in London by over 20 per cent. and it has reduced the number of lorries on some major roads by 40 per cent. The lorry ban exercise has included 2,000 signs, 20,000 permits and 200,000 pages of application forms. It will probably cost £250,000 a year to run and the probable capital cost will be £2 million. It seems to me that that is not very good value for money.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that large numbers of London residents support the lorry ban and want it to be enforced, and that the reason why it is not working as effectively as it should is that the Metropolitan police refuse to enforce it? Will he have a word with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and get the law enforced, or is the Under-Secretary of State prepared to enforce only the pieces of law with which he agrees, not those with which he disagrees?

Mr. Bottomley: May I say to the honourable chairman of the Greater London council that if a little boy saw the honourable chairman in his clothes and pointed out that he was wearing none, the hon. Gentleman might be covered with embarrassment, despite his finery. I am unaware of any of the applications for exemption being turned down, so it is very difficult to see that the lorry ban is having any effect.

Mr. Stanbrook: Do the Government have any reason to believe that there is a demand for lorries to enter London unnecessarily?

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Neither lorry users nor local residents want lorries to be where they are not needed. The plain truth is that lorries do not go through London when it is unnecessary. That is where the M25 has helped. It is also worth noting that 250 width and weight restrictions are in force in London and that they are not so controversial as this apparent lorry ban.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend the Minister aware that the Greater London council is said to have appointed 50,000 snoops to watch the police to see that they are doing their job? Would it not be better if the GLC were looking after residents whose homes are damaged by vibration and noise from heavy lorries than interfering with the course of law?

Mr. Bottomley: It would be sensible for people to spend a little more time looking at what the Government are trying to do to develop quieter lorries, to support sensible local lorry bans and to try to ensure that effort is put into worthwhile projects rather than into things which apparently have no beneficial effect.

London Assessment Studies

7. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the consultants' reports on the four London assessment studies.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Later this year.

Mr. Cartwright: Is the Minister satisfied with the fact that it has already taken more than 18 months to produce an initial report merely identifying problems in four of London's main traffic corridors? In view of the doubt and uncertainty that those studies inevitably create in the areas concerned, how much longer will we have to wait before we see, not the problems, but the solutions to those problems being put forward?

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman will accept that one of the reasons for the extended period for the first stage is public consultation. People want to be involved and to give their views. The second problem is that the GLC was not co-operative in sharing opportunities for gaining information.

Mr. Dubs: Is not the truth that the proposed trunk roads and other schemes in London are enormously unpopular and that the Minister is worried lest news gets out before the local elections, because that will have a cataclysmic effect on the prospects of Tories standing on 8 May?

Mr. Bottomley: That sort of scaremongering comes ill from the hon. Gentleman, although we might have expected it from some of his hon. Friends. The plain truth is that anyone who lives in or represents south London is aware of the massive traffic problems and how residents are having to cope with through traffic. We are not proposing new trunk roads in those areas, but we are trying to look at the problems and come forward with solutions. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman has a word with me and the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) afterwards.

British Airways

8. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress towards the privatisation of British Airways.

Mr. Ridley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) on 12 March.

Mr. McCrindle: Now that privatisation has been postponed, and without prejudice to the current talk of a management buy-out, will my right hon. Friend be able to reassure me that the other principal plank of the Government's aviation policy — the cultivation and encouragement of competition among British airlines on the appropriate routes — is not equally likely to be postponed? Has he any new initiatives to announce in that respect this afternoon?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend knows that the policy on competition was settled in the White Paper "Airline Competition Policy", Cmnd. 9366, in October 1984, which was endorsed by the House. I assure him that we will continually watch opportunities for increasing competition in the airline industry, but I have no plans for reopening the whole matter again.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Will the Secretary of State give a firm assurance to British Airways, whether publicly or privately owned, that neither he nor any member of his Government will prevent British Airways from ordering and purchasing from now until 1995 the appropriate aircraft to keep it in the lead?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Dicks: When will my right hon. Friend look to the wellbeing of British Airways, as he always does for the British Airports Authority? Will he consider positively the proposed management-staff buy-out by British Airways?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The mystery about the alleged management buy-out proposal is that nobody seems to know who suggested the idea. The chairman of British Airways has written to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and in that letter, which is now in the public domain, to coin a phrase, one paragraph says:

"We would prefer this"—

the privatisation—

"to be accomplished by means of a public flotation and will pursue such intention with much vigour while continuing to work closely with Nicholas Ridley and his Department. Furthermore, we support HMG's efforts to achieve a successful outcome in the current negotiations with the United States Government over the capacity annex to the Bermuda II agreement."

I am not quite clear what all the row was about.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Secretary of State aware that we are grateful to the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) for revealing that Lord King of Wartnaby invited 140 Tory Members of Parliament to a gargantuan beanfeast in the Savoy? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that that is a good way of spending public money? Will he find out what that was all about, and will he do something about it?

Mr. Ridley: I am sure that the time will come when the board of British Airways will wish to entertain Labour Members. Now that we have reached a position where all the pressure in the House and in the media is to criticise the Government for not proceeding more speedily with the privatisation of British Airways, the hon. Gentleman might find a way of getting himself a hot, free lunch.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is not the purpose of privatisation to give the investor a risk-free investment? Does he not further agree that privatised concerns such as British Aerospace, BP —not to mention the British Airports Authority—are, indeed, subject to the whim of the Government? Moreover, many of us regard it as unacceptable that the flotation of British Airways should be delayed because of an inability to write a prospectus.

Mr. Ridley: I am sure that my hon. Friend knows enough about the subject to recognise that the writing of a prospectus places a heavy and important legal responsibility on the vendor and the board to ensure that it contains entirely accurate information about the future, upon which investment decisions can be based. That applies to any company. I regret to say that at present the difficulties involved in doing that are too great. However, I hope that the time will very soon come when we are able to do it.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Although we understand the Secretary of State's embarrassment in not coming to the House last week to tell us that, yet again, he had had to postpone BA's flotation, can he be a bit more forthcoming now? Will he tell us plainly that BA's privatisation will be abandoned and that he will have urgent discussions — I gather there will be an opportunity later this afternoon — with Lord King about the development programme and the replacement of BA's fleet? In particular, will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear to Lord King that the privatisation of the helicopter division of British Airways should cease forthwith?

Mr. Ridley: I must correct the hon. Gentleman. I have not postponed BA's privatisation. The position before last week was that we hoped that it would be possible to privatise it during the coming financial year. That is still the position. The Government never mentioned a summer date. I have already given the assurance that equipment that is needed by BA, and which passes the viability test, will be sanctioned by the Government. Moreover, I have no intention of interfering with commercial decisions that BA may or may not take on disposing of its helicopter subsidiary.

Mr. Higgins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the success of BA's privatisation is likely to be much greater if outstanding problems are resolved before the publication of the prospectus, rather than afterwards?

Mr. Ridley: That is true. As we hope to involve the managers and staff of BA, together with many small investors, it is most important that the prospectus is straightforward and does not mislead them.

Tavistock

9. Sir Peter Mills asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration his Department is giving to traffic levels in Tavistock; and what plans he has for a bypass of the town.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Traffic arrangements in Tavistock are for the Devon county council. If the county council put forward proposals for a bypass, consideration would be given to their eligibility for transport supplementary grant.

Sir Peter Mills: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that there are growing problems on the route between Plymouth, Tavistock, Hatherleigh and the north? Given the increase in the number of heavy lorries and the container port at Plymouth, Tavistock and Hatherleigh will need proper bypasses. Will my hon. Friend accept that I do not want to have to wait 15 years, as I had to in the case of the Okehampton bypass, for those two bypasses?

Mr. Bottomley: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, but he will understand that we are largely in the hands of Devon county council.

Transport Act 1985

10. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met representatives of shire and metropolitan counties to discuss the impact of the Transport Act 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met representatives of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities on 16 January. I have met various representatives of both shire and metropolitan counties at a series of seminars organised by the Bus and Coach Council earlier this year.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that deregulation, cuts in transport supplementary grant and cuts in bus grant have reduced the national demand for buses from 5,800 in 1980 to 2,400 in 1985? Is that not the real reason for the question mark over the bus plants at Lowestoft, Preston and Workington?

Mr. Mitchell: No, Sir. The hon. Gentleman deplores the phasing out of bus grant, but it was announced by the Labour Government in 1977, and it fell to this Government to carry out that intention. Thus, the hon. Gentleman can hardly blame this Government for carrying out a decision that was announced by their Labour predecessors. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the demand for buses, but there is very substantial demand for many smaller buses. Indeed, I hope that British industry will gear itself up to manufacturing what the market requires.

Mr. Haywood: Is the Minister aware that minibuses have started operating in Avon? Is he further aware that in my constituency the 16 and 15-seaters are immensely popular and are serving parts of my constituency which have never before had a bus service? Is that not a reflection of the competition provided by the Devon General Bus Company?

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that illustration, to which I could add many others. The Exeter experiment is well known. Not only has it increased the availability of bus services; it has increased the number of jobs for bus drivers. The scheme is so successful that the Devon General Bus Company is extending it to Torquay, where it is warmly welcomed.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Is the Minister aware that the 15,000 registrations relate mainly to the urban routes and that in the rural areas the outlook is grim? When he discusses these matters with the shire counties, will he remember that finances are inadequate to subsidise the rural routes when the time comes in the autumn? What does he intend to do about that?

Mr. Mitchell: In some rural areas, such as Devon, a high proportion of the routes have already been registered, so that it does not necessarily follow that there will be less registration in the rural areas. Substantial funds are available for contract services to be provided in the rural areas. One would expect the counties to use that substantial sum — nearly £100 million for the shire counties—to secure services in such areas. The people there can have the security and certainty of a contract service, and therefore feel safe.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Community Budget

49. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Attorney-General if he is satisfied with the preparations which have been made for the hearing of the interim application by the United Kingdom to the European Court of Justice on the expenditure by the Commission of the sums raised in the budget as passed by the European Assembly; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): Yes, we expect judgment shortly.

Mr. Taylor: Will the necessary steps be taken to prevent the Commission from spending this money in an illegal budget before the judgment is made? Will the Attorney-General consider recommending to his Government colleagues that an amendment be made to the Single European Act to prevent the European Assembly from making illegal budgets in the future?

The Attorney-General: It was expected that the judgment in the main action would not be delivered until the early part of next year. We now hope that it will be in high summer, and therefore part of the worry expressed by my hon. Friend will be removed. I shall draw the rest of his remarks to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. Deakins: If we are successful in our application to the court, will we be able to reclaim, and is it our intention to reclaim, the moneys paid over which are outwith the Consolidated Fund?

The Attorney-General: If the moneys have not been spent, we shall, of course, seek to reclaim them.

Mr. John Morris: Is not at least £70 million at stake? Why did Britain wait from December to March before it tried to seek an interim injunction? The Government parade their belief in the rule of law, so why the delay?

The Attorney-General: The sum is £70 million up to the end of March—the end of the financial year. We have moved as fast as possible, but we have had to consider and consult our colleagues in the Community. They are all on our side in relation to the illegality of the European budget, but only we are prepared—I think properly—to take the initiative of going for an interim judgment.

Peter Cameron Webb Syndicate

50. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Attorney-General when he anticipates charges may be laid with regard to the allegations of fraud in the management of the Peter Cameron Webb Syndicate at Lloyd's.

The Attorney-General: The investigation co-ordinated by the fraud investigation group set up by the Director of Public Prosecutions for that purpose continues to be vigorously pursued. Substantial progress has been made in recent months, but it would not be right for me to discuss the present state of the evidence. Nor do I propose to speculate as to when a decision will be taken about the preferring of charges.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Has the Attorney-General seen the Daily Mail of 10 March, which identifies Mr. Peter Dixon of the syndicate, who went off with only a cool £7 million —not £40 million that the other gentleman went off with—and who is now living in Virginia? Are we applying for an extradition order so that he can be brought back to face trial in this country?

The Attorney-General: I hope that we shall be in a position to apply for an extradition order. I must remind the House that the United States is slow in dealing with extradition. First, we must have a case that will satisfy the judges in the United States.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind that many Conservative Members are concerned to ensure that where fraud occurs, especially against small investors, the courts should be able to act as soon as possible to bring the perpetrators to justice? Is he aware that there is great public concern about fraud?

The Attorney-General: I share my hon. Friend's concern. There has been a marked improvement in reducing delays lately. In 1983, 25 serious frauds were committed for trial. In 1984 there were 45 committals, and there were 93 in 1985. There were 150 prosecutions started in 1985 and 55 trials were completed, 42 resulting in conviction, which my hon. Friend will know is well above the average conviction rate. A great many compliments are due to the fraud investigation group for what it is doing.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Attorney-General recall saying to one of his hon. Friends that he found the level of City fraud unacceptable? Is he aware that Peter Dixon was issued with a writ in America a short time ago in respect of a civil action? If it is possible for the civil authorities to serve a writ on that man, who with his partner got away with £39 million according to the investigations which were carried out by Lloyd's, why is it that the Government, the fraud squad and those who act on behalf of the DPP find themselves unable to track down Peter Dixon and carry out what most people regard as British justice? If old-age pensioners can be done for taking a tin of salmon—some of them are locked up for such offences—I am sure that the British people will regard it as less than even-handed treatment when crooks in the City can get away with blue murder.

The Attorney-General: The degree of proof and the testing of it in civil proceedings is different from that in criminal matters. I shall tell the House what is happening. The Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions is heading a squad comprising the assistant director, a professional officer, two detective superintendents and five counsel, two of them being Queen's counsel. All of them have been trained in the process of reinsurance. The difficulty is the tracing of the funds to ultimate beneficiaries. The funds have gone through several countries. Some of the witnesses have been unhelpful, and I am probably using a phrase of understatement in saying that. It is extremely difficult for us to deal with laws abroad on disclosures of confidential information. We have been having difficulties with Switzerland, which in this instance is the most important country, and where the Banque du Rhone is situated. We are doing everything possible to bring to justice those who committed these offences.

Mr. McCrindle: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that whoever or whatever is holding up the pursuit of these prosecutions, Lloyd's is not, contrary to what has often been suggested, one of the responsible parties? On the contrary, Lloyd's is prepared to continue to give every possible assistance in bringing the perpetrators of the frauds to justice.

The Attorney-General: I can confirm that. Lloyd's is giving to the Director all the documents that are relevant, and I am extremely grateful to it. However, the difficulty in obtaining evidence from abroad and the rules of confidentiality make it very difficult to get on as fast as we would like.

Nationalised Industries (Legal Advice)

51. Mr. Eadie asked the Attorney-General if he will outline his duties in relation to the giving of legal advice to the boards of nationalised industries; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Nationalised industries are not part of the Crown and my duties do not include giving them legal advice. Each of them can obtain legal advice, whenever necessary, from their own legal advisers, who are independent of the Law Officers and of the Government.

Mr. Eadie: Does the Attorney-General agree that his answer appears to be in conflict with what has been reported in the press? For example, it is well known that the National Coal Board consulted the Attorney-General's Department on whether it was in breach of the law in paying pension credits to mineworkers. We know that it was told that it was in breach of the law not to do so. Why is there secrecy? The Attorney-General's Department seems to be trying to cover up the NCB's deplorable industrial relations department. Will he do something about that? Will he stop his Department being used by the NCB in such a despicable way to deprive miners of their legitimate rights to pension credits?

The Attorney-General: I wish that I could give the hon. Gentleman the advice that I gave, as he would no doubt be delighted. The National Coal Board received two conflicting opinions, so it asked the advice of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. As a result of that, I advised my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and, with my permission, the NCB was shown my view.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the issue goes much wider than that? Is he not dismayed that the NCB has ignored decisions of the industrial tribunal process if it does not like them, and also ignores decisions of the colliery review procedure if it does not like them? As a matter of policy, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that that is an unacceptable way for a publicly owned nationalised industry to treat the law?

The Attorney-General: That must surely be a question for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and not for me.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Africa (Aid)

54. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has made to the United Nations emergency agency for Africa appeal for £460 million, in aid in the current year.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): During 1986 we shall deliver at least 68,000 tonnes of wheat or wheat equivalent to Ethiopia, Sudan and Mozambique at an approximate cost of £10·7 million, and some £12 million in other aid for relief and rehabilitation. In addition, we shall be meeting our share of the cost of European Community actions, including its substantial food aid provision.

Mr. Beith: In view of the enhanced press interest in overseas development questions, will the Minister tell us the Government's response to the appeal from Mr. Bradford Morse, head of the United Nations development programme, for £460 million additional emergency aid this year in view of the threat to the lives of 11·5 million people in Ethiopia, Angola, Mozambique and Sudan? Has there been any special British Government response to that appeal?

Mr. Raison: In fact, there has not been an appeal from Mr. Bradford Morse. He has published estimates of the scale of need. I think that those estimates probably include some development work as well as relief work. I assure the hon. Gentleman and the House, however, that we shall continue as we have done in the past two years to play a very full part in helping to deal with the emergency.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Has not Ethiopia, a major recipient of the aid, been moving population on a scale and with a savagery far exceeding anything known in South Africa? Do the Government intend to raise that matter at the United Nations?

Mr. Raison: We have made our concern about the resettlement policy absolutely clear and we have not supported any programmes involving resettlement.

Mr. Stuart Holland: How can the Minister be sure that money given to the Ethiopian Government or to voluntary agencies working in Ethiopia is not spent on resettlement schemes? Does he share the widespread concern of the House that the schemes are not concerned with moving people for their own welfare and development, but are political manoeuvres to depopulate areas which are contested in law?

Mr. Raison: We always take very great care over the destiny of the resources that we provide. I have had no reports that money provided by us has been used to further resettlement.

55. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he plans to respond further to the all-party parliamentary group report on United Kingdom aid to African agriculture.

Mr. Raison: I answered oral questions on the report on 11 November 1985, and my noble Friend Lord Trefgarne responded fully to a debate on it in another place on 18 December. I am, of course, willing to continue to respond to letters or questions from hon. Members on the report.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister accept that the lessening of development aid is one of the reasons why there is such a need for relief aid at times of famine in Africa, and that the advantage of increasing the development aid budget is that there can be the sort of sustained support for African agriculture which gives self-sufficiency through methods such as irrigation schemes, which might reflect much better on the need for voluntary contributions towards relief that we have seen over the past year? The Government were substantially criticised in the report. Will the Minister tell the House that he will do something this year to make British aid to African agriculture much less miserly?

Mr. Raison: We all accept the importance of long-term development as a way of forestalling famine of the kind that we have seen. In fact, the proportion of our bilateral programme that has gone to aid to agriculture has increased and I have recently shown my concern for aid to agriculture by announcing one or two very important additional projects in this area.

Mr. Moynihan: In view of the comments made in the report regarding the Equatoria region agricultural project, will my hon. Friend make a statement to the House regarding the security of the ODA project and the personnel, in view of the civil war in northern Uganda, 18 miles away, the civil war in the southern Sudan and the current isolation of the project from diesel and food supplies?

Mr. Raison: I visited the ERAP project in January of this year. I believe that it is an extremely good project. My hon. Friend is right to say that there is a considerable problem posed to it more immediately by the difficulty of getting fuel which comes out through north Uganda. I hope that the project will continue in being, because it is one which I value, but we shall have to watch what happens carefully.

Mr. Tom Clarke: As the main thrust of the report was to express concern about the percentage that is being spent on agriculture, and even that is not always right, does the Minister agree that the emphasis might be changed in the interests of the peasant food-producing sector?

Mr. Raison: I largely agree with what the hon. Gentleman has said. As I said earlier, I have recently announced one or two further agricultural projects which are designed very much to help the peasant farmer.

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees

56. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth affairs when he last met the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Raison: I have not yet met the new High Commissioner, Mr. Hocké, since he took up his post. In June 1985 I met the High Commission's Director of External Affairs, Mr. Volfing. We had a wide-ranging discussion of UNHCR's activities, including its financial position. In that regard I am pleased to announce that I have just approved a further £1·05 million for UNHCR's african refugee programmes.

Mr. Cox: I welcome that reply. However, is the Minister aware that the High Commissioner last month sent out urgent appeals for some 1 million people in Africa who are suffering from hunger and lack of proper shelter? May we have an assurance in the House that the Government and our EEC partners will give all the help they can so that we do not see the tragic problems this year that we saw so often last year in the Sudan, Somalia and Ethiopia?

Mr. Raison: I accept the importance of what the hon. Gentleman has said. I believe that our record vis á vis UNHCR has been very good. In the current financial year we shall have spent £33 million on refugees, of which £17 million will go through UNHCR.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend agree that some of the most effective work being done on a substantial scale for refugees is being done by the Government of Pakistan to assist the 3 million refugees from Afghanistan? Will the Government give every possible help to the magnificent effort of the Pakistan Government?

Mr. Raison: I agree. I think that the Government of Pakistan have behaved with a great sense of hospitality to the refugees from Afghanistan. We have responded to the appeals for Afghan refugees with considerable generosity and continue to do so.

Mr. Pavitt: In view of the continuing tragedy of Lebanon and the middle east, and the excellent work being done for refugees there, did the Minister, in his discussions, make any extra allocation for that part of the world, where there is constant flux and where, as a result, the administrative problem becomes even more expensive?

Mr. Raison: The form of support for refugees in the middle east is the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which is not covered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

India (Aid)

57. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Commonwealth and Foreign Affairs what plans he has for the provision of aid to India during the years 1986, 1987 and 1988, respectively; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: British aid is planned on a financial year basis. In 1986-87 we plan to spend about £108 million on bilateral aid to India, and at least £11 million more from the aid and trade provision. Figures are not available for subsequent years.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that some of us feel that that sum is totally inadequate to meet the vastness of the need and suffering in India? Now that, happily, the Indian aspect of Westland's affairs has been settled, what plans are there for discussions with the Indian Government in the immediate future regarding further needs and projects?

Mr. Raison: I share the view of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the signature of the Westland agreement is very much to be welcomed, from the Indian point of view, and of course from the point of view of the employees of Westland in this country. However, the hon. and learned Gentleman is wrong to suggest that our aid programme to India is inadequate. It is a very large aid programme. In my view it is extremely well constructed, and I believe that the Indians much appreciate it. We discuss regularly the composition of that programme.

Mr. Jessel: As so much of our EEC aid goes to Africa, is it not right that it should be balanced by our bilateral aid being concentrated largely on India?

Mr. Raison: Our bilateral aid goes to Africa in large quantities as well, but, as I have just said, we have a large bilateral programme to India. I am sure that it is absolutely right that we should.

Aid (Conservation Strategy)

58. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to ensure that the overseas development programme is guided by the principles of the world conservation strategy.

Mr. Raison: We have adopted principles that are in harmony with those of the world conservation strategy. They are contained in guidance notes and checklists that are issued to Overseas Development Administration staff.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Surely the Minister accepts that soil erosion and deforestation are crucial issues, particularly in Africa. If that is so, why have the Land Resources Development Centre and the Tropical Development Research Institute been starved of resources, and why have they less manpower than before?

Mr. Raison: Those issues are very important, but the fact is that the TDRI and the LRDC are very well equipped to carry on the outstanding work that they have been doing for several years.

Tercentenary of Bill of Rights

3.31 pm

Mr. Speaker: In 1988 we will be celebrating the tercentenary of the "Glorious — or bloodless — revolution", and the Bill of Rights. Those were the foundations from which evolved, peacefully, the system of parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarch which we enjoy today, and which has inspired the constitutions of many other countries of the world.

Parliament itself will wish to take a lead with an appropriate celebration to mark that anniversary. The Lord Chancellor and I are therefore appointing today a small Committee of Members of both Houses to advise us on the form of those celebrations, and to oversee the arrangements to be made.

I am also happy to say that the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and the Leaders of other parties in this House have indicated their full support for these proposals and have agreed to become patrons of the project.

The following Members have kindly agreed to serve on the advisory committee:

The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), as chairman, the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), the hon. Member for Monmouth (Sir J. Stradling Thomas), the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack).

I have asked Mr. Michael Ryle, Clerk of the Journals, to serve as the Commons secretary of the Committee.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a lover of our monarchy, our Parliament and our institutions, I was most interested to hear about the proposal for 1688 to be remembered and for the setting up of the Committee. Will you please make sure, when the Committee deliberates, that the Whig dogs do not get the best of it?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that will be a matter for me. It will be a matter for the Committee.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention and that of the House to the fact that the next Parliament to be elected, which will be no later than the same year, 1988, will be the 50th Parliament of the United Kingdom and might also merit an appropriate commemoration?

Mr. Speaker: It will depend on when those celebrations will take place. Perhaps we will be able to commemorate both events.

3.33 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does it arise from questions?

Mr. Leigh: I have given you notice of my point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this an appropriate time to ask for your ruling?

Mr. Speaker: I shall take points of order after hearing applications under Standing Order No. 10.

British Airways (Privatisation)

3.34 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the privatisation of British Airways."

The matter is specific because, despite last week's written reply, it is understood that the chairman of British Airways is today seeing the Prime Minister to urge a management buy-out in apparent defiance of the decision of the Secretary of State for Transport.

The matter is important because these decisions should be taken by the House, not over expensive lunches at the Savoy hotel by most of the members of the 1922 Committee. It is urgent because the future of the world's largest airline is being seriously affected by the uncertainties surrounding its prospects and the open and public disagreement between its chairman and his sponsoring Minister, the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration namely,

"the privatisation of British Airways."

I listened carefully to the hon. Member, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Newspaper Dispute (Scotland)

3.36 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent examination, namely,

"the dispute affecting the Daily Record and the Sunday Mail."

The dispute affects Scotland's highest selling daily newspaper and the production of its sister newspaper, the Sunday Mail. The two newspapers are not affected by the general Fleet street crisis. The papers are printed in an up-to-date plant using modern technology. In 1986 their profits will approach £7 million. Their circulations are large and growing, with the Daily Record selling more than 750,000 copies daily.

Because of the disruptive management by Mr. Robert Maxwell, who seeks to destroy the Scottish identity of the Daily Record and the Sunday Mail, the future of those newspapers is in dispute. The Scottish community is up in arms about the matter. As there is no tradition of militancy involved in the production of these newspapers, as the dispute is continuing and as there are no signs that the parties will come together, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider my application seriously.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the dispute affecting the Daily Record and the Sunday Mail.

I am afraid that I must give the hon. Member the same answer as I gave to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Huddersfield Polytechnic School of Architecture

3.38 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent attention, namely,

"the proposed closure of the Huddersfield polytechnic school of architecture."

My request is specific, because it relates to an announcement of closure that was made public only last Saturday. It is important, because closure will dramatically affect the ability of the Yorkshire and Humberside region to supply skilled architectural staff to rebuild and reconstruct the ravaged infrastructure of our region. The matter is urgent because the late date at which the Secretary of State for Education and Science has made the announcement will seriously impair the recruitment drive for this September's courses. It will dramatically affect the school of architecture, which places 100 per cent. of its students in employment. The school is renowned for the quality of its department and the modern methods that it has pioneered.

Above all, I hope that my application will be successful because it will allow me and my Yorkshire colleagues to express at greater length our horror and the frustration and anger in the region at the proposed closure. A debate would give us an opportunity to consider this incomprehensible decision and the grounds on which it has been made.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the proposed closure of the Huddersfield polytechnic school of architecture."

As the hon. Member knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the business already set down for consideration this evening or tomorrow. I regret that I do not consider that the matters that he has raised meet all the criteria laid down in the Standing Order and, therefore, I am not able to submit his application to the House.

Privilege

3.40 pm

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order, of which I have given prior notice, relates to the use and possible abuse of parliamentary privilege. I seek advice and a ruling on a particular instance.

It is with considerable hesitation and regret that I raise this matter, because it refers to a Conservative Member —the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) — who on Thursday 13 March tabled a question to the Attorney-General asking him whether he would now prosecute a doctor in my constituency in respect of a rape offence. The man was named.

At the outset, I must stress that it is not for me to comment on the man's guilt or innocence. I am content to let the law take its course. However, I feel that at best it is a breach of parliamentary convention — and possibly an abuse of parliamentary privilege — to name an individual in this way. This is a double abuse, as it is not permissible to name an accused before he is charged, and in rape cases the accused cannot be named unless found guilty.

Like other hon. Members, I wish to see all criminals, particularly rapists, and especially child abusers, brought to justice. If any hon. Member feels that the police are not being diligent or that individuals are being protected, it is right and proper that questions should be put to the Attorney-General so that he may investigate further. The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth would have been doing a public service had he put his question and omitted the name, but by putting the name into the question he is now denying justice.

The full details of this case are more complex than those that have come out in the newspapers, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas) may well know. The man cannot defend himself without giving more details, which would almost certainly identify the rape victim. In the absence of his defence, he is being found guilty by parliamentary privilege and newspaper headlines, and he now struggles to try to prove his innocence. This is quite contrary to English law, and led to some of the outrageous comments that we had from hon. Members last Friday.

If the police have sufficient evidence against this man, he should be brought to trial. But can he now have a fair trial? I wish to make it clear again that I am not attempting to defend this man. It is not for me to judge his guilt or innocence, nor is it the duty of this Parliament, nor any Member of this Parliament, to do just that. However, I ask whether justice is being done at the present time. Can it be obtained in the future if a trial should take place? Is parliamentary privilege being abused, and if so, how can it be stopped? I seek your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the right hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas) wishes to raise a point of order on the same matter, I shall call him first.

Mr. Norman St. John-Stevas (Chelmsford): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. Further to the point of order so lucidly put by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark), may I point out that this tragic case of the rape of a child took place in my constituency and that the child is the daughter of one of my constituents — [Hon. Members: "Alleged rape."] The alleged rape. In fact, the police have indicated that in their opinion a rape has taken place, but there is doubt as to who was responsible for it.

Is it not one of the strongest conventions of this House that constituency cases are taken up by the Member of Parliament concerned? Yet there was no consultation or information given and nothing was said to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) before he tabled his question. Should there not be some protection for hon. Members in these cases?

I had taken up the case with the local police and the Director of Public Prosecutions, and their legal, impartial opinion was that the prosecution could not succeed and so should not take place. May we have some protection and guidance on that crucial point? Do you agree that the higher the privilege, the greater the sense of responsibility with which it should be used?

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) has also made allegations about a constituent of mine in north Humberside. He did so without consulting me, without reference to me, and without any discussion with me. If a matter concerning a constituent is to be raised, it is a matter of courtesy to refer it to the hon. Member in whose constituency that person resides. If that hon. Member then takes no action, another hon. Member may feel free to act in the interests of justice.

Both the alleged perpetrator of the crime and the victim happen to live in my constituency, yet at no time did the hon. Gentleman refer the matter to me. As a result of the statement being made, the press have camped out at a church in my constituency. Everybody knows who is involved in the case. The result is that a person is being tried by the media and would have been subject to a form of parliamentary lynch-law by the hon. Gentleman had he been able to speak during questions earlier. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) for the succinct way in which he asked his supplementary question.

Apart from the courtesies of the House, the matter should be referred to the Committee of Privileges because it involves the freedom, honesty and dignity of individual constituents who, no matter what they are accused of, are entitled to a free, fair and unbiased trial, which at present they are not getting.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Paragraph 3, entitled "Personal reflections" on page 338 of "Erskine May" states:

"It is not in order in a question to reflect on the character or conduct of those persons whose conduct may only be challenged on a substantive motion. . . nor is it permissible to reflect on the conduct of other persons otherwise than in their official or public capacity. Moreover, a question introducing names (whether of persons or of bodies) invidiously or for advertisement or in any way not strictly necessary to render the question intelligible is not in order."

You may rule, Mr. Speaker, that the paragraph does not cover the conduct of my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens). However, it is in your power to set a precedent, by which if, in a similar case, an hon. Member wishes to name a person who is accused but not yet charged, he should do so on the Floor of the House by reference to a letter that he has sent to the Attorney-General, in which he can mention the name of the accused. Surely it is a principle of our country that a person is innocent until proven guilty, and it is a principle of the House—this is in our sub judice rules—that we should not supplant the role of the courts of the realm as my hon. Friend has done.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take one more point of order, then I shall allow the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) to have a word.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): I wish, Mr. Speaker, to submit one further point in support of the submissions that have been made. Any hon. Member who is genuinely interested in bringing someone to justice has a perfectly easy remedy, which is to seek a private meeting with a Law Officer. Law Officers are always prepared to see hon. Members at short notice to discuss a matter and then, through the Director of Public Prosecutions, to ask the police to make the necessary inquiries. If there is insufficient legally admissible evidence in the opinion of counsel advising the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General will tell the hon. Member. Many years ago I sought the advice of the Law Officers when a local chief constable refused to prosecute. As a result of a meeting with officials in the Law Officer's Department, the local chief constable prosecuted the case, the defendant was tried, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment.

There is a discreet and realistic way of dealing with such matters, and I support the applications that are being made to consider this a breach of privilege.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): It is five years since I named someone in the House of Commons, and it was a distasteful thing to have to do. I wish to be helpful. You will appreciate Mr. Speaker, that during the past five years letters have flowed to me containing allegations and details of cases that I should look into and demanding that I name various people, some very important. I always sent the files to the Home Office, which investigated the cases for me, and in many cases to the chief constables concerned. Therefore, I was jealously guarding, not misusing, parliamentary privilege.

When I was elected to the House, I thought that I could come here and speak without fear or favour on my constituency's problems and on matters of national importance, as child abuse and child protection are. My difficulty is that people offend against children in privacy, by and large, without an audience. We are in some difficulty when the victims are little children and where the courts cannot prosecute unless there is corroboration.

May I conclude, because I see that hon. Members are getting restless, by saying that children are being abused, but that such cases do not come to court because the Director of Public Prosecutions decided otherwise. I unreservedly apologise to the hon. Members who have criticised me, but I say to each of them that I have been fighting a national crusade to protect little children. I do not intend to slip in any names now, but I advise the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) that a man in his constituency is abusing children. I have named him in a question——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me deal with this matter. I am grateful to hon. Members for giving me notice that they intended to raise the matter on points of order. The hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) is correct. "Erskine May" makes it clear on page 338 that the invidious use of a person's name in a question should be resorted to only if to do so is strictly necessary to render the question intelligible. I commend to hon. Members the device in appropriate cases of supplying the relevant Minister privately with the name of an individual who is the subject of a question, and I hope that wherever possible hon. Members will use that method of avoiding unnecessarily damaging references to individuals. I thank the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) for raising that point.

Freedom of speech is essential to the work of Parliament. It is the responsibility of every individual Member to ensure that he uses his freedom in a way that does not needlessly damage those who do not enjoy that privilege and in a way that does not damage the good name of the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have made a statement and a ruling. I do not think anything else can arise.

Mr. McNamara: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This arises from what the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth said. I am grateful for your ruling, which the House heard with respect, and which I appreciate greatly. The hon. Gentleman said that he would not slip in any names, but he has already named my constituent in a question. May I take it that if a written question has been tabled today, the Clerks will ensure that it is altered to make sure that that man's name is not shown?

Mr. Speaker: I have no knowledge of any question, but the House may be certain that I shall look carefully at any such question if one is tabled.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): On one point, Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order. So that no one should be misled, would it not be as well to add that following the Strauss case any such communication between a Member and a Law Officer is not subject to privilege?

Mr. Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman's question directly involved with this matter?

Mr. Foulkes: It follows from your ruling, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) said that he had tabled a question. Can you confirm that if he does not withdraw it he will be in contempt of the ruling that you have just given?

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth has submitted a question, but it has not yet been accepted. I shall look carefully at it.

OUTER SPACE BILL [Lords]

Ordered,

That the Outer Space Bill [Lords] be referred to a Second Reading Committee.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton].

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &C.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House I shall put together the two Questions on Statutory Instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Professions Supplementary to Medicine (Winding up of Remedial Gymnasts) Board Order of Council 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Local Authority Grants (Termination) (Scotland) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Gas Bill (Allocation of Time)

Ordered,

That the Report [12th March] from the Business Committee be now considered,—[Mr. Biffen.]

Report considered accordingly.

	Remaining proceedings on Consideration	Midnight
Second day	Third Reading	7 pm

Orders of the Day

Gas Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New clause 8

POWER OF COUNCIL TO INVESTIGATE OTHER MATTERS

'(1) The Council shall have power to investigate any matter (not being a matter which it is its duty to investigate under section 32 above) which—

(a) appears to it to be a matter to which subsection (2) below applies and not to be an enforcement matter within the meaning of that section; and

(b) is the subject of a representation (other than one appearing to the Council to be frivolous) made to the Council by or on behalf of a person appearing to the Council to have an interest in that matter.

(2) This subsection applies to—

(a) any matter relating to the design, manufacture, importation or supply (whether by sale, hire or loan or otherwise) of gas fittings used or intended to be used by persons supplied with gas by public gas suppliers;

(b) any matter relating to the installation, maintenance or inspection of gas fittings used or intended to be used by such persons; and

(c) any other matter relating to, or to anything connected with, the use by such persons of gas supplied by such a supplier or the use of such fittings.

(3) Where the Council has investigated any matter under this section, it may prepare a report on that matter and (subject to section 41 below) shall send a copy of any such report to such (if any) for the following persons as it thinks appropriate, that is to say—

(a) any person to whom the report refers or who (whether or not he has made a representation to the Council) appears to the Council to have an interest in the matter to which the report relates;

(b) the Director General of Fair Trading or any person whose functions under any enactment appear to the Council to be exercisable in relation to that matter;

(c) any person who appears to the Council to be a person who ought to take account of the report in determining how to act in relation to that matter;

but nothing in this subsection shall require the Council to send any such copy to the Director.'.—[Mr. Buchanan-Smith.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.57 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following:

GAS CONSUMERS COUNCIL (LOCAL REPRESENTATION)

(1) It shall be the duty of the Gas Consumer's Council to appoint in accordance with a scheme under this section individuals to be local representatives of the Council.

(2) It shall be the duty of such individuals representing the Council in any locality:

(a) to be available for receiving on behalf of the Council representations from consumers or prospective consumers of gas in the locality;

(b) to consider and investigate any matter which appears to affect the interests of gas consumers or prospective gas consumers;

(c) where action appears to be requisite as to any matter referred to in paragraph (b) above to make representations to the Council; and

(d) where action appears to the Council to be requisite as to any functions assigned to it by this part to assist the Council in making representations to achieve that action in any way in which the Council deems appropriate.

(3) The scheme shall be prepared by the Gas Consumers' Council within a period of twelve months beginning with the appointed day.

(4) The scheme shall have regard to the individual requirements and circumstances of the different regions and areas of Great Britain with, in the first instance, specific arrangements appropriate to each of the marketing regions of the "successor company" (interpretation as in section 64 of the Bill). Insofar as it fixes the number of local representatives to be appointed the scheme:

(a) shall come into force on being approved by the Secretary of State

(b) may be varied from time to time and if the variation affects the number of local representatives, such variation shall require the approval of the Secretary of State.'.

Government amendments Nos. 16 to 18.

Amendment No. 20, in clause 33, page 37, line 8, at end insert

'and any matter relating to the manufacture importation, supply, installation and maintenance of gas fittings'.

Government amendments Nos. 22 to 25, 39 and 40.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As hon. Members who participated in the debates on the Bill either on Second Reading or in Committee realise, a major priority of the legislation must be to ensure that the interests of all gas consumers are fully protected. When I say all gas consumers, I mean of course not only domestic gas consumers, but industrial and commercial consumers. These categories were covered in the original Bill, but because of the system of regulation that was being set up, with the power to appoint a Director General of Gas Supply, the powers of the new Gas Consumers Council were directly related to tariff consumers and also to the relationship that they have with the Director General of Gas Supply.

This would not, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained on Second Reading, inhibit the council, once it had been set up, from acting on behalf of all consumers, not just tariff consumers. None the less, having listened to the lengthy debates in Committee on the important issue of the interests of gas consumers, my right hon. Friend and I are concerned by the views that have been expressed in the House both on Second Reading and in Standing Committee.

The powers relating to the role of the Gas Consumers Council are specifically set out in the Bill. This means that there should be no doubt about the responsibilities of the council. I have had full consultations with Miss Sheila Black, the chairman-designate of the new Gas Consumers Council, who made it plain to me that she and her colleagues on the old council would like these powers to be fully and clearly set out in the legislation.

That is the background to new clause 8. The Bill already lays a duty on the council to investigate complaints concerning the supply of gas. However, the new clause puts the new council's remit into statutory form. It provides the new council with power to investigate any complaints from gas consumers about all relevant matters concerning the sale, installation, use and maintenance of gas appliances and fittings, whether they are in use in people's homes, or whether they are for sale in shops and intended for use. The council will also have the power to investigate any other matters associated with the use of gas or gas fittings. In particular, it will have the power to investigate safety matters. All those who participated in the debates on the Bill believe, as do the Government, that this is of paramount importance. The new clause seeks to set out precisely what the Gas Consumers Council can do to enforce safety.

These powers are not in themselves adequate unless the council is able to follow up its investigations in whatever way it feels is appropriate, given its wide remit. It is important that the council should have the power to take follow-up action when it has investigated a complaint. Therefore, the new clause provides the council with the power to pass on any of the findings of British Gas or of any other supplier to the Director General of Fair Trading, the Health and Safety Executive, the complainant, or any other person or organisation that has an interest in the matter.

I hope that the new clause meets the wishes of the House and fulfils in statutory form the Government's intentions relating to the powers of the Gas Consumers Council and the points that have been made in our debates. The new clause has been warmly welcomed by Miss Sheila Black, the chairman-designate of the Gas Consumers Council. She wanted these powers to be fully spelt out. I hope that the House will accept that the new clause fulfils those objectives.

Amendments Nos. 16, 17 and 18 are required to achieve consistency in the extent to which the new Gas Consumers Council receives copies of documents. The Government have accepted an important amendment in Committee. It provides that the council is to receive copies of the annual report of the Director General of Fair Trading. Having accepted the amendment, the Government looked carefully into the matter to see whether the amendment needed to be extended to include other documents. I hope that the House agrees that it is right and proper that the council should be made fuily aware of any proposals relating to a modification of the authorisation.

Amendments Nos. 22, 23 and 25 are consequential upon the new clause, if introduced. They extend the statutory remit of the new Gas Consumers Council to cover all complaints from gas consumers. The amendment will allow the council to pass on, without the normal confidentiality restrictions that are povided for in clause 41, relevant information that is gained in the course of its investigation of complaints. It will be able to give full information to the Health and Safety Executive and to Ministers and trading standards officers for the purposes of the consumer protection and consumer safety Acts. This will ensure that matters relating to the safety and standards of gas appliances can be drawn to the attention of the proper authorities.

Amendments Nos. 39 and 40 enable the Secretary of State for Energy—in practice, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—to be involved in setting the terms and conditions of employment of staff of the Gas Consumers Council. As drafted, paragraph 3 of schedule 2 requires these terms and conditions to be approved only by the Treasury. The amendments retain this requirement, but add to it the need for the approval of the Secretary of State. This is a sensible extension of the requirement, because the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry should be involved in this matter. He can bring to bear his experience of other consumer bodies.

As new clause 8 and its associated amendments are of interest to the House, they will probably form a substantial part of our Report stage debate. We have put into statutory form a substantial number of the matters that were discussed in Committee. However, I emphasise again that, as originally drafted, the Bill would not have inhibited the Gas Consumers Council from doing any of the things that we are now seeking to set out in statutory form.

As I said earlier, I hope that the new clause and its associated amendments meet the wishes of the House. The Gas Consumers Council will be able to act with complete confidence, knowing that its powers are provided for in the Bill, and investigate all complaints—not just those of tariff consumers—and deal with all matters relating to appliances, fittings and installations. I commend new clause 8 and its associated amendments to the House.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): I wish to deal first with new clause 6, but before I do so, I should like to comment on what the Minister of State has just said about new clause 8. I agree that it takes into account some of the points that were raised in Committee, but may I direct his attention to paragraphs (b) and (c) of subsection (3). The last two lines of new clause 8 say:

"but nothing in this subsection shall require the Council to send any such copy to the Director."

That is unsatisfactory. The Director General of Fair Trading will not have the power to make references. Furthermore, he will not receive copies of complaints. We are dealing not just with competition but, as the Minister of State said, with wider aspects relating to the powers of the Gas Consumers Council.

The Opposition's new clause 6 deals with representations to local representatives of the Gas Consumers Council. This matter was debated in detail in Committee, but the Government have not seen fit to take into account the representations that were made then. Therefore, the Opposition have decided to put them before the House at Report stage.

The Minister referred to the chairman-designate of the Gas Consumers Council, Miss Sheila Black, but we are indebted to the South-Western Gas Consumers Council, which has submitted a great deal of evidence to the Committee and to hon. Members on both sides of the House. Clause 2 refers in only the vaguest terms to the Secretary of State when it says that he "shall have regard to the desirability of having members who are familiar with the special requirements and circumstances of different regions and areas in Great Britain" when appointing members to the new Gas Consumers Council.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary told us that it was intended that the new Gas Consumers Council would have the powers to set up an advice structure on the various industrial and consumer interests in any area or to ensure that widely scattered consumers are adequately represented. However, that seems entirely to depend on the discretion of the future chairmen of the new Gas Consumers Council. The view of the recently appointed chairman of the new Gas Consumers Council, as expressed in her evidence to the Select Committee, is that local representation, certainly in its present form and extent, does not carry out a vital function. We contest that because our information is that over the years regional bodies of the Gas Consumers Council, perhaps not with great publicity—we have learnt more about this since the Bill — have carried out a great deal of important investigative work and have played a major part in monitoring a major publicly owned industry. I do not need to remind the House that this will be a major privately owned monopoly. The circumstances do not change.

Local representation is vital and a duty needs to be placed on the GCC rather than just on the chairman to draw up and maintain a scheme of local representation. When, as I have pointed out, the industry is transferred from public ownership into a private monopoly, the same consumer interests will remain. Therefore, they need adequate representation.

Among the main functions of local representatives is, first, troubleshooting. Customers who have complained against British Gas ask local members to take up individual problems which they have not been able to sort out themselves in, for instance, the south-western region. The same applies to Wales, Scotland, the north-west and every other region in the United Kingdom. They represent them in finding a way through the bureaucracy of the monopoly. They deal with straightforward problems by personal contact or telephone, thus preventing long written reports, and pass on to the Gas Consumers Council those cases which need a more detailed analysis or assessment. Those are important areas in which the Gas Consumers Councils act and they will be denied such opportunities when that regional representation is taken away from them. That is the vital factor.

Therefore, new clause 6 takes into account the need expressed by the Under-Secretary in Committee to maintain flexibility in the new arrangements. The proposed new clause does not take away flexibility. It makes the use of that flexibility subject to a broader base of discretion than the whim of an unknown future chairman of the Gas Consumers Council. In effect, it transfers from the regional gas consumers councils, based on the Gas Act 1972, section 11, to the new Gas Consumers Council the duty to draw up and maintain a scheme for local representation. However, in the requirement to have the Secretary of State's approval to the numbers in the scheme, the residual right of appeal by any regional interest group is left, should it be felt that any future proposal to dismantle, reduce, or alter the scheme set up by the new Gas Consumers Council is not justified. It widens the base of the responsibility for exercising the discretion to the Gas Consumers Council and the Secretary of State rather than leaving it to the apparent discretion of one particular person, however good that person might be, to which I have already referred. The provision relating to numbers also exists in the Gas Act 1972. Nevertheless, the new clause allows flexibility to change those arrangements without altering the prime legislation as appropriate.

That is the basis of new clause 6 and I have made the case for its adoption. In effect, we are trying to put back what the Government are taking out of current legislation. I have also pointed out the weaknesses of new clause 8 and perhaps, when he replies, the Minister will deal with my points on subsection (3)(b) and (c) because we are extremely concerned about the fact that any reference to the director is removed from the new clause.

I understand that it is not possible at this stage to move new clause 6 but that will be our intention at the appropriate time.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on introducing this important new clause, into which he and his Department have put a great deal of effort. It allows one or two of his hon. Friends to start the proceedings on Report in a rather more harmonious way than might be the case later when some of the amendments put down by the members of the Select Committee come up for debate. Nevertheless, it is gratifying to see that the Government have responded in full measure to the large numbers of representations that some of us have had from the consumer organisations. Indeed, I understand that they are pleased with the new clause.

It is also pleasing to see that the Government have responded so adequately to the amendment put down by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) in Committee. Unfortunately, he has to be absent for the moment this afternoon, but I know that he initiated the prodding of the Government in order to ensure that the legislation provided a little more adequate protection for the consumer by putting a few more teeth behind the consumer organisations. That my right hon. Friend has done and in doing so he has also responded magnanimously to the Select Committee's recommendations. We also received a great deal of evidence from consumer organisations suggesting that the procedures to protect consumers in the legislation needed stiffening up a bit, and that my right hon. Friend has done.

We are pleased to say that he has also made reference to the funding of the consumer organisation. The Select Committee was concerned as to whether resources would be adequate to do the job properly. However, my right hon. Friend has given the Select Committee the assurance that whatever resources are needed to do the job properly will be provided. Thus, from all points of view the new clause is most satisfactory, and I am happy to wish it well.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): I am pleased to speak to this group of new clauses and amendments because, since the termination of the Committee stage, I have received a letter from the Under-Secretary of State covering two safety points that I raised. I thank him for his helpful letter.

My first point concerns gas cookers. The situation will probably improve substantially, but it still needs to be watched carefully.

More consideration should be given to open flue heaters. I may be raising detailed points, but they will be important when the Government's massive legislation is implemented. Open flue heaters have received some publicity already. In his letter the Under-Secretary of State wrote:

"the heater in question is now obsolete and it is likely that only a few old properties remain."

I have made some inquiries, and I believe that until recently there were about 10,000 such heaters in the south-west region alone. The number has now been reduced to about 8,000. About half of them are in the Bristol area, as they tend to be concentrated in inner city multi-occupation accommodation. Yet the south-west is only one area, and the problem is probably still larger than the Under-Secretary of State would have us believe. Thus, the situation needs to be monitored carefully.

[Mr. Michael Cocks]

The Under-Secretary of State also said in his letter that anybody who had this sort of heater should have it checked by a competent gas installer, which brings me to my next point, because it is expected that as a result of privatisation there will be some touting for business. Two of my constituents recently drew my attention to a reply-paid card advertising something called "South West Services". One of my constituents works for the South-West gas board and says that, to the casual observer, the logo is not dissimilar from that used by the board. Moreover, there is a freepost address in Keynsham, Bristol. Keynsham is the headquarters of the South-West gas board, and my constituent feels that the material is so similar to that sent out by the board that someone might well think that it comes from that official source. Moreover, the service is based in Stokes Croft, and there is no indication whether the people concerned are properly registered suppliers. Perhaps the Under-Secretary of State will look into that. I should be happy to give him the details if they would be of any help.

We welcome the Government's move towards the point that we made in Committee, but there is still much to done to locate defective appliances. Even at this late stage I ask the Under-Secretary of State to consider asking the successor authorities to institute some sort of census of appliances that may be defective, even if it means putting a question on the part of the gas account that is returned with the bill.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): We must welcome the fact that the Government have apparently, at this late stage, seen the light and the necessity to strengthen consumers' rights. Throughout the Committee stage we argued that consumers' rights were not properly enshrined in the Bill. We believe that their position is being severely weakened through the watering-down of the regional consumer councils. Access to advice and information is vital, especially for those with fuel debt problems, and we believe that that access will be reduced. The abolition of the metropolitan counties and the GLC will also put at risk citizens advice bureaux, which deal with thousands of fuel problem cases. As drafted, the Bill yet again weakens the consumers' position.

Given the huge, powerful and wealthy monopoly that will lie in private hands, it is important that the rights of consumers should be strengthened. It is vital that they should have strong statutory protection. Thus, I welcome the Government's new clause. Throughout the Committee stage we expressed our concern and said that there should be regional offices which were adequately staffed with efficient and experienced personnel in each British Gas region. Given the tight budget, it seems unlikely that such offices will be adequately staffed. I hope that the Minister can give us an assurance on that point.

There is obviously a need for complaints to be handled at regional level. It is essential that there should be regional complaints offices, with adequate staffing, which come under the overall management of the national body. It worries us that the scale of the proposed budget will not allow for some essential consumer services.

In Committee the Minister told us that the funding of the Gas Consumers Council was to be demand-led. He said:

"There is no intention to introduce a cost-cutting exercise because the function of the Gas Consumers Council must be demand led and not financially constructive to enable it to carry out its reasonable functions in the most effective way." — [Official Report, Standing Committee F; 21 January 1986, c. 166.]

How is that demand to be decided? Apparently the Department of Trade and Industry is assessing future workloads for the new council and its regional offices in order to discover the demand for staff and to work out the new structure. How much confidence can gas consumers have in the new council if they are told that it cannot deal with their complaints effectively because British Gas will not co-operate or because the council does not have the resources available?

As the Government have tabled this new clause early in the debate, I hope it means that they will support our new clause, which furthers the needs of the consumer, because these needs are clearly not adequately covered by the Bill as drafted.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I shall be brief. I welcome the Government's move and the fact that we have the support of the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) on behalf of the Select Committee. In Committee there was little support from members of the Select Committee, apart from myself.

Can the Minister say whether the consumer has any protection against the right of entry? I have put that question to him before, but I have never had an answer. I believe that a private sector monopoly will be able to decide to enter a person's private home without a magistrate's order. If I am wrong, the Minister will no doubt put me right, but there should be a provision in the Bill to protect the consumer from the threat of the private sector. A subcontractor, or perhaps a cowboy, employed by a gas supplier could take the decision to enter a person's home. The foreman on the site might decide to do that.

I hope the Minister can assure us that under new clause 8 consumers will be protected from a decision to enter their home or private property. Civil liberties are involved, and the people should be protected.

4.30 pm

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The amendments and new clauses are important. I am pleased that the Government have accepted our arguments in Committee and that the surveillance area of the Gas Consumers Council is to be extended under new clause 8. However, those of us who come from the provinces, regions and nations that make up Great Britain regret that the new Gas Consumers Council is to have a centralised complaints role.

The regional gas consumer councils were set up by the 1972 Act and broadly continued the existence of the consultative councils set up in the Gas Act 1948. Herbert Morrison was one of the chief architects of nationalisation. He believed that when the large monopolies were created in the public sector it was important that the industries served the people and that people should have a say in the running of those industries. We argued in Committee that that ethos is even more important in relation to a large private monopoly.

The Government's attitude is typical of the Conservative party. They believe that market forces will decide all things, that British Gas plc's functions will be maintained and general standards levelled as people buy their goods or purchase energy from it. Under the new monopoly people will not have real choices and the normal market forces will not operate. That is why we want the right representation structure to be established for consumers. Consumers of gas will number almost 20 million by the end of the century and they will have to buy their energy from British Gas plc.

The Government will say that everything is working well now and that after vesting day they will still work well, but it will be a different kettle of fish with the large private monopoly. Clause 2 refers only in the vaguest terms to the Secretary of State having "regard to the desirability of having members who are familiar with the special requirements and circumstances of different regions and areas in Great Britain"

when appointing members of the new Gas Consumers Council. That is not good enough. We should go much further. During the Standing Committee's sixth sitting the Under-Secretary of State said:

"the new Gas Consumers Council will have the powers to set up an advice structure on the various industrial and consumer interests in any area or to ensure that widely scattered consumers are adequately represented."

I do not know whether the people of Wales or of the north-east and north-west of England regard themselves as "widely scattered consumers". I am sure that they would prefer more formal representation to ensure that by statute they have a right to be involved in the consumer protection aspect of gas.

That representation under the Bill depends on the discretion of the future chairman or chief officer of the new Gas Consumers Council. Miss Sheila Black, the current chairman, expressed her view recently to the Select Committee. She said:

"Local representation in its present form and extent does not carry out a vital function."

We are unsure whether appointments to and developments of the new structure will be left to her discretion.

The Under-Secretary said in Committee that the Government's desire was to maintain flexibility. He said:

"Every word added would be a restriction, and inflexibility would rule." — [Official Report, Standing Committee F, 21 January 1986; c. 168.]

That is an example of the woolly thinking and limbo state in which we shall be left as a result of the Bill. The Government just seem to be hoping that things will happen. Because everything has gone marvellously for British Gas in the last 10 years, the Government hope that things will carry on like that. I have less faith in their friends in the City and in private management than they have. The general record in the private sector shows that our views are justified.

The arguments have been well rehearsed in Committee. The Opposition believe that there should be a more structured relationship between the consumer and British Gas plc. We believe that that structure should be enshrined in the Bill.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I speak briefly in support of new clause 6. We believe that new clause 8 is an improvement to the Bill. It is certainly an improvement on the consumer protection proposals that we debated in Committee. Ministers have said repeatedly that the Bill offers the best deal for consumers and for their protection. We dispute that, but it is futile to pursue that line in the time available.

New clause 6 follows the line that we have pursued in trying to improve the Bill. If the Government are correct in saying that the Bill gives consumers the best deal, that is no reason why we should accept that the Bill is perfect and incapable of further improvement.

New clause 6 deals in particular with the regional aspect. It tries to ensure that regional and district consumer councils are strengthened and preserved. Throughout many hours of debate we have expressed our concern that many people who have given valuable time and experience over many years, representing consumer interests at district and regional level, will be swept away and their expertise will no longer be available. The Bill provides for some regional representation, but it will not be as strong or as efficient as it is at present. We want to improve on the present position.

As I have said on many occasions, there is considerable regional variation. Most consumers will find it easier to contact officials locally and any move towards a system of centralism and the relegation of the regions' importance will be a detrimental step. The proposals that are set out in new clause 6 go some way to redressing the deterioration that would ensue if the Bill were enacted unamended.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Minister appeared to be resting a large part of his case on the somewhat smug response of the Government after consultation with Miss Black, the chairman of the National Gas Consumers Council. Unfortunately, the response that the Minister has offered the House does not seem to offer any reassurance. New clause 8 does not respond to the needs that were clearly emphasised in our long consideration of these matters in Committee, and we remain entirely dissatisfied and deeply concerned.

I emphasise the argument that has been advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). We cannot object to the modest progress and the slight change that is being made, but it will still leave a state of affairs that could become entirely and disgracefully unsatisfactory.

The hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), who contributed to the debate, is a distinguished member of the Select Committee on Energy. He may distance himself slightly from the Government at a later stage, but he seems to be accepting new clause 8 with equanimity. Paragraph 93 of the report of the Select Committee on Energy states:

"The proposed Gas Users' Council must have powers and duties to scrutinise the actions of British Gas in all areas of its operations."

However, the hon. Gentleman represents a Derbyshire constituency which comes within the area of East Midlands gas, which serves my constituency as well, and when the Bill is enacted and implemented there will be only one person to represent the large area of the east midlands. That one person may reside a long way from the hon. Gentleman's constituency, or from mine. Twelve individuals all represent large areas within which there will be, perhaps, millions of consumers. That shows how disgracefully the Government have responded to the Select Committee's recommendations.

Mr. Rost: The hon. Gentleman referred to one paragraph of the Select Committee's report. That paragraph goes on to state that the Gas Consumers Council should have adequate resources to perform its task, which is something that has been conceded by the Government.

[Mr. Rost]

I do not accept that the scrutiny point has not been conceded. A little more centralisation might provide a more effective consumers' organisation.

Mr. Hardy: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not have cause to regret that comment in due course. If he believes that one individual representing millions of consumers, or potential consumers, in the east midlands will be satisfactory, he has a great deal more faith in centralisation than I have.

The hon. Gentleman must consider the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks). We are not talking about slight and unimportant matters. We must bear in mind, as we stressed on many occasions in Committee, that gas is a volatile substance and that there are circumstances in which there could be peril and risk for the consumer. On the grounds of safety and security, it is grossly unsatisfactory to have only one person representing millions of consumers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) shed light on another aspect of this issue when he said that we are giving a great deal of power to a private monopoly. Its representatives will be able to enter private property. It is a serious and strange departure for the Conservative party to confer such powers when it has always stood for the principle of an Englishman's home being his castle. If the Government are giving powers to a private monopoly to operate in such a way, there is even more of a case for the consumer councils to have a proper regional character. Even though the Government have moved slightly in acting on the advice of Miss Black, they have not satisfied those who are concerned that regional cover should be adequate. The Minister may have paid attention to Miss Black and to the Gas Consumers Council, which she represents, but the evidence of the South-Western gas consumers council, which was referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South, was probably much more wise and valuable than that from other sources.

Apart from anything else, the new arrangements for local structures could be wiped out at the whim of an individual. There is nothing in the Bill that removes our anxiety about that. We do not believe that the appointment of one person to represent the interests of gas consumers in each of the 12 gas regions will be adequate. A comprehensive network of officers is necessary and they must have adequate resources. It is astonishing that the Government did not adopt that approach when the Bill was introduced. The fact that their conversion has been entirely half-hearted causes us still to be anxious. The fact that they are still reluctant to provide an adequate assurance that the interests of regional consumers will be protected leads us to the view that the Government are far more concerned to please the future shareholders of British Gas than to ensure that consumers' needs are met.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: With the exception of the speech of the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), I began to feel that the Government's new clause was welcomed generally. The hon. Gentleman, in language to which we became accustomed in Committee — for example, he said that he was "entirely dissatisfied" — went a little over the top. In contrast, the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said that there were certain directions in which he would like to see the Government go further. When the hon. Member for Wentworth reflects on these matters, I think he will appreciate that we have gone a long way towards spelling out in considerable detail the statutory responsibilities of the council. I am delighted that hon. Members on both sides of the House have taken that view, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), who is an experienced member of the Select Committee on Energy. The Government respected the views of the Select Committee, and I am glad that my hon. Friend feels that its views on these matters have been covered by the new clause.

When we were dealing with new clause 8, I was asked specifically why there was not an obligation to submit a report to the Director General of Gas Supply.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Methyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Surely the director should receive reports.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman makes a good suggestion and one that might be acted upon. I should explain to the right hon. Member for Salford, East that the reference to the director has been added for the sake of clarity. There is already fierce competition in the gas appliances and servicing market, and the competitors are not gas suppliers. It is an area in which competition law already applies. The new clause requires the council to refer reports as appropriate to the Director General of Fair Trading, who will be concerned with any anti-competitive practices or monopoly abuse in supply and servicing. That is why we put it in that way, as in tariff matters the National Gas Consumers Council already has a direct role in relation to customers, reporting to the Director General of Gas Supply if it so wishes.

In relation to the other statutory extensions of powers in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), it is made absolutely clear that these are not covered by the director general and that the reports are made to those responsible for those matters. To save the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) intervening at this point, I should make it clear that if the council feels that in any matters covered by those provisions it might be appropriate to inform the director general or if it feels that he should act on an investigation which may have begun in one area and extended into another, nothing in the new clause will prevent the council from informing the director general and the director general from acting on the matter.

The new clause seeks to clarify the functions of the Gas Consumers Council. It is therefore important to make it clear to whom the council is responsible when it has investigated a complaint and wishes to make a report. In the interests of clarity, therefore, the right hon. Member for Salford, East may conclude on reflection that we have got it right.

Mr. Orme: The Minister talks of clarity, but the last two lines of new clause 8 confuse the situation. I cannot see why they are included. What is wrong with the director general being informed even if there are no immediate implications for him or for action by him? He is an important part of the new set-up, together with the Gas Consumers Council and British Gas plc, and each should know what is happening. The new clause concludes:

"but nothing in this subsection shall require the Council to send any such copy to the Director."

We believe that that provision is wrong and should be deleted.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: This brings us back to a fundamental difference between the two sides, which arose many times in Committee. In the area of regulation, in which the director general has strong powers of control, we have sought to make the limits of his responsibility absolutely clear. Spelling this out in relation to the Gas Consumers Council also makes it clear to whom the council is obliged to report. The council is not required to report to the director general, but it is perfectly free to do so if it wishes.

The new clause makes it clear to whom the council should report—for instance, the Director General of Fair Trading—in relation to various matters. We believe that that clarity of responsibility is necessary. The Opposition would like the director general to have a wider role. That is the fundamental difference between us.

Mr. Rowlands: Perhaps I may suggest a more modest reason why the wording is not appropriate. Clause 33(1) refers to the director general's powers to review activities connected with the supply of gas through pipes, including appliances and installation. That being so, under the general review procedures he should at least receive reports from the Gas Consumers Council in relation to complaints.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The director general does not have a role in this area. Clause 33 simply allows him to inform himself about the general activities. Including a direct requirement for the council to report to him under the new clause could lead to confusion as to the person to whom the council is required to report. We have made it absolutely clear who is responsible for following up references by the Gas Consumers Council.

New clause 6, as the right hon. Member for Salford, East made clear, turns on local representation and the local role of the Gas Consumers Council. The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) also referred to this. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) fears over-centralisation in Gas Consumers Council activities, and the hon. Member for Wentworth made a similar point.

While we were preparing the Bill, the existing National Gas Consumers Council, without any prompting from the Government or the Department, carried out a review of its own activities and the effectiveness with which they could be carried out. As the evidence to the Select Committee by Miss Sheila Black shows, the existing council—not the new body, of which only the chairman-designate has been appointed—felt from its experience of dealing with complaints that the existing statutory system of regional councils was over-rigid and over-structured and did not necessarily achieve the most effective representation of consumers or the most effective protection of their interests.

It was very much in the light of that evidence that, after consultation with colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry, who are ultimately responsible for consumer matters, we decided that representation and protection of consumer interests would be more effective under the structure that we have proposed, and which I freely admit is more centralised in one sense, although members of the council will be drawn from and represent every region of British Gas. Staff will be appointed in each area and there is power for the council to set up whatever consultation or advisory procedures it thinks appropriate.

It is perhaps an exaggeration to say that no two regions are alike, but there is wide variation from the Scottish region, catering for a wide geographical area with many scattered communities, to North Thames region at the other extreme. What is appropriate for one region may well be inappropriate for another, in view of the entirely different circumstances. The Bill in no way restricts the ability of the new Gas Consumers Council to set up the structure that it believes appropriate in the various regions to satisfy the responsibilities laid upon it by the Bill.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Having referred to the great variations between, say, Scotland and North Thames, the Minister said that under the Bill it would be for the new Gas Consumers Council to decide what structure was suitable for Scotland and for North Thames. At what stage will the people of Scotland be consulted as to what structure is best for them?

Mr. Buchanan Smith: If the hon. Gentleman had been patient for a moment longer I would have described the consultation procedures which are being undertaken before any final views are taken as to precisely what structure should be set up. There is no question of the Government imposing a structure from the centre, although I emphasise that it is not the responsibility of my right hon. Friend or myself but the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, given his statuory responsibilities for consumer protection. However, I can give the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) the assurance that what is eventually decided will be decided only after full consultation with the existing regional council offices.

I have heard no criticism throughout the passage of the Bill of the conduct of the regional councils and of how assiduous they have been in their work of investigating complaints and representing the intersts of consumers in their different areas. It is the existing regional councils and those employed by them whom we are currently consulting. We are also consulting with them in relation to the work that is now being done to set up an organising committee to deal with the new structure. I emphasise to the House, and particularly to the hon. Member for Dundee, East, that a number of existing regional consumers council chairmen are represented on the organising committee. For example, the present chairman of the consumers council in Scotland is a member of that committee. I think that there are concerns in Scotland. I say to the hon. Member for Dundee, East that I have met representatives of the local committee in the Grampian region in the north-east of Scotland in my constituency and I understand their views. I know that they have made their views clear to us. We have urged anybody who has approached us to direct their views to the organising committee through their own regional chairman. Therefore, I believe that there is a scope for local views to be taken into account in setting up what I admit may be a less structured, less rigid, and more flexible arrangement than that which currently exists. We are doing that in response to what the existing National Gas Consumers Council feels is in the best interests of consumers.

One of the questions which I know the council is examining in detail is the precise structure and organisation of the local representatives that would be appropriate. At this stage, I do not want to pre-empt its deliberations but, as we have repeatedly made clear, there will be staff who will work with the council of representatives appointed from each region to take up complaints at local level and keep in close touch with the views and needs of local consumers. On that point, I am at one with the right hon. Member for Salford, East. I think that it is important that there are grass roots links with consumers. Certainly, our objective is to provide a body that can give speedy and effective help. As I have said, we have been persuaded that the present system has been too rigid and it is for that reason that we are trying to provide a more flexible approach.

I would like to express my thanks to those who have served on the regional gas consumers councils because they have done an extremely good job. They have given much time and effort to dealing with the problems of gas consumers and I am sure that both sides of the House will join in paying tribute to those who, over the years, have served on the councils at local level.

One or two other points were raised during the debate. The right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) raised the question of safety, which we rightly debated at considerable length in Committee, and in my opening remarks today I expressed the importance that we attach to that. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the installation and maintenance of gas fittings is already covered by the Gas Safety (Installation and Use) Regulations 1984 which are administered by the Health and Safety Executive. In addition, the Department of Trade and Industry has considerable powers under the Consumer Safety Act 1978 in respect of the sale or supply of unsafe goods. Trading standards officers can take action to prevent the sale of any appliance considered unsafe. Those powers are to be reinforced.

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Bristol, South for raising that matter because it gives me the opportunity to repeat on the Floor of the House what my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and I said in Committee. The Department of Trade and Industry is hoping to introduce regulations later this year in respect of the sale of gas cookers. I repeat that because I do not want there to be any confusion about the fact that there is already an effective legislative structure to deal with safety in a number of areas.

The right hon. Member for Bristol, South raised the substantial question of appliances which might be dangerous and which were already installed. He said that he would send more details to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and myself. I would be grateful if he would do that and I or my hon. Friend would be happy to respond to him on that point. I think that we are all united on the need to ensure that safety is as effective as we can make it.

The hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) and the hon. Member for Wentworth raised the question of rights of entry. The point made by the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford is that British Gas will be a private company and not a nationalised industry in the future. I accept that, but British Gas could exercise compulsory rights of entry only in limited circumstances. I refer the hon. Gentleman to clause 18, and in particular paragraphs 14 to 17 of schedule 5. That clause and the paragraphs of schedule 5 control rights of entry. I do not think that there is any disagreement or concern over the need for rights of entry in an emergency. But, outside emergencies, rights of entry can only be exercised with a magistrate's warrant under the procedure set down in the Rights of Entry (Gas and Electricity Boards) Act 1954.

That is particularly relevant to the new clause and the debate on the consumer councils, because if there were any question of abuse of those powers, it is certainly an area where the council could receive a complaint, investigate it and act upon it in order to assist a consumer, if the consumer felt that any of the powers in the Bill were being abused in any way.

Mr. Lofthouse: I should like to clarify a point. On page 77, in schedule 5, paragraph 17, the Bill spells out the provisions as to powers of entry:

"Where in pursuance of any powers of entry conferred by this Part of this Schedule, entry is made on any premises by an officer authorised by a public gas supplier".

Before the officer can have that authority, must he have a justice's warrant?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I should like to look into that point and I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman.

The important point in this debate on consumer councils is that we must ensure that the consumers council has the power to investigate any complaint from a gas user.

We have had a useful debate on what is an important matter. I make no complaint about the amount of time spent on Second Reading, in Committee or during Report this afternoon in debating the interests of consumers, and the best way to protect them and deal with them. By spelling it out in the new clause, we have made it clear what the powers of the new Gas Consumers Council are, and to whom it can refer any complaints that it feels are justified. I am grateful for the welcome that has been given to it.

I am sorry that I cannot accept the new clause of the right hon. Member for Salford, East or the amendments associated with it, for the reasons that I have explained, but I believe that what is now in our new clause, if the House approves it, will give the new Gas Consumers Council a much clearer background against which to operate. I am sure that that is to the benefit of consumers.

Mr. Orme: We shall not oppose the Government's new clause, although we feel that it does not go far enough. It is only the guillotine that prevents us from voting for our new clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 9

STATEMENTS IN CONNECTION WITH FLOTATION

'(1) This section shall apply where—

(a) an offer for sale to the public of any securities of the successor company is made by or on behalf of the Crown;

(b) any invitation or advertisement is issued (whether or not in documentary form) by or on behalf of the Crown in connection with the offer; and

(c) that invitation or advertisement does not contain all the listing particulars.

(2) None of the persons mentioned in subsection (3) below shall incur any civil liability by reason of the invitation or advertisement, or any omission from it, if—

(a) the contents of the invitation or advertisement were submitted to the Council of The Stock Exchange;

(b) that Council did not object to the contents of the invitation or advertisement; and

(c) the invitation or advertisement and the listing particulars, taken together, would not be likely to mislead persons of the kind likely to consider the offer.

(3) The persons referred to in subsection (2) above are—

(a) the Crown;

(b) any person acting on behalf of the Crown in connection with the offer;

(c) the maker of any statement contained in the invitation or advertisement;

(4) The reference in subsection (2) above to a person mentioned in subsection (3) above incurring civil liability shall include a reference to any other person being entitled as against the person so mentioned to be granted any civil remedy or to rescind or repudiate any agreement.

(5) In this section "the listing particulars", in relation to the offer, means such particulars as, by virtue of any provision of any enactment other than this section or of any subordinate legislation, have been approved by the Council of The Stock Exchange for the purposes of the admission of the securities to which the offer relates to the Official List of The Stock Exchange.'.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following:—

DRAFT PROSPECTUS

'The Secretary of State shall present to Parliament a draft prospectus for the successor company which shall include independent valuations of the company.'.

Government amendment No. 38.

Mr. Hunt: The House will be aware that the mini-prospectus is becoming a popular art form in the flotation of companies, particularly those moving from the public to the private sector. It is a particularly valuable means of publicising an issue the size of British Gas, in attracting the necessary funds and a wider spread of share ownership. Nevertheless, mini-prospectuses are a relatively recent innovation and were first given general application under the Stock Exchange (Listing) Regulations 1984, which implemented three European Community directives. Like many such useful tools, they carry one possible disadvantage: it could be argued that the process of abridgement or extraction of selected information from the full listing particulars that the preparation of a mini-prospectus involves could give rise to liability for misrepresenation or the omission of material facts, although they have been amply disclosed in the full prospectus.

A provision is included in clause 126 (5) of the Financial Services Bill to give protection against any liability thus arising where the material has been approved by the stock exchange under the 1984 regulations. However, we are dealing with the present situation. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House, whatever their views on the principle of the proposed flotation of British Gas, will agree that we should make full use of the marketing tools available. The new clause provides the necessary protection against liability that might arise simply by virtue of the abridgement that I have described, despite the fact that full disclosure would already have been made elsewhere. It is a protection that the Government are proposing to extend to all issues under the Financial Services Bill. I therefore urge hon. Members to support the new clause.

5.15 pm

Mr. Orme: We find the Government's approach to flotation unacceptable. I specifically draw attention to new clause 7, which states:

"The Secretary of State shall present to Parliament a draft prospectus for the successor company which shall include independent valuations of the company."

We say that because of what has happened in previous flotations, not least British Telecom. Because of the strength of our feeling and because our new clause is not likely to be reached in the voting pattern, I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Government's new clause 9. We shall do so because of the importance that we attach to the flotation of shares.

The terms of the sale of British Gas are a cause for concern, particularly in view of the report of the Public Accounts Committee on the sale of British Telecom. Unfortunately, the PAC's reports are always after the event, for obvious reasons, and therefore too late to influence it. However, it is not too late to influence the sale of British Gas. That is why we raise the matter on the Floor of the House now.

The Government have said, and Ministers said in Committee, that the PAC's conclusions would be taken fully into account when the new clauses were considered. Looking at the Amendment Paper, we find that that is not so. Our new clause gives us the opportunity to discuss and put forward our views on that important matter.

The reports of the PAC are an indictment of the handling of the sale of BT. We use the argument about BT, as we did in Committee, because it is the only parallel that we can use for the size of the sale, in that it is a transfer of a public monopoly into a private monopoly. We are dealing with a large amount of expenditure. The British taxpayer has a right to be informed about the proposed sale.

The City continues to be the main beneficiary of privatisation. For example, in fees, commission and so on, in the small sale of Associated British Ports, the City made £2·6 million. It made £12·5 million on Britoil, and a massive £190 million on British Telecom. In its 17th report on 16 May 1984, the PAC criticised the failure to use the usual Government method of floating new Government stocks and the Government's heavy reliance on the advice of merchant bankers who also had a stake in the sale as underwriters. That shows clearly that there have been conflicts of interest in the conduct of previous flotations. Who can have confidence in the City at present? What is happening in some areas of the City of London is a disgrace. In effect, about £200 million is being handed over in the sale of a public company, to which a large part of the electorate is opposed. Therefore, we must endeavour to protect their interests and at least bring forward the issues.

Many of the PAC's criticisms are a direct result of the undervaluing of shares. For instance, a gain of 18 per cent. was made on the sale of Cable and Wireless, with a loss of £40 million to the taxpayer. For Associated British Ports, the gain was 23 per cent., the equivalent of £10·58 million. Amersham International showed a gain costing the taxpayer £22 million. However, the most astonishing example has been the sale of British Telecom. In December 1984, the Financial Times commented:

"the Government have sold BT for some £1·3 billion less than its initial stock value".

According to the share index in The London Standard today, British Telecom shares are selling at 218p a share yet, at the time of BT's sale, they were sold at 130p a share. There has already been a massive gain in the pricing of British Telecom shares. The taxpayer is paying for it, but what benefit has he had from the sale? Recently, BT prices, not least standing charges, have increased, and this is affecting pensioners and many other sections of the community.

No doubt the Under-Secretary of State saw the recent "World in Action" programme which looked closely at the sale of BT. Independent financial experts said that by the summer it was increasingly clear that the sale would be a success. The sale was first thought to be a massive risk, but that was no longer the case. The programme told us that one firm of City stockbrokers upset its competitors by saying that and was accused of "talking up" the selling price. The success of the sale was described as inevitable —similar to giving £10 notes for £5 notes.

British Telecom was a British-owned company, one of the 10 most successful companies in the United Kingdom, and was sold off for one reason — to enable the Government to use the proceeds for tax relief at what they thought was the appropriate time. British taxpayers are still paying for that massive undervaluation. The "World in Action" programme pointed out that if the proceeds had been used differently 30 hospitals could have been built. Instead, the money was used to line the pockets of people in the City.

The third report of the Committee of Public Accounts, which was printed on 11 November 1985, continued the scrutiny of the sale of British Telecom. In the coming months and years, will we see the PAC dealing with the sale of British Gas in the same way? Will people wring their hands and say, "Why did we allow that to happen?" I wish to put it on the record, as, no doubt, do other hon. Members, that we warn the British public before the event of the consequences of the sale. The PAC concluded that the Department of Trade and Industry got the flotation hopelessly wrong. The Committee understood why the Department and the Treasury took that underwriting course but was "not convinced that the extent of risk justified the rates agreed for placing commission."

The Committee noted the Department's explanation of the reasons for the high premium in the aftermarket but was "surprised that the Department had not foreseen the possibility of this situation arising. Inevitably this also raised the question whether . . . the Government objective of maximising net sale proceeds has been met. Moreover, we note the Department's view that if the special selling measures led to their receiving an extra 4p a share that was equivalent to £120 million. By the same token it can be argued . . . that the price was over cautious and that a modest further increase . . . would have brought in a higher return without risk".

That would have meant a higher return to the taxpayer. Whatever one's view on privatisation, this can be seen only as a powerful indictment of the way in which the matter was handled.

There has not been a Government response to the PAC report. The Secretary of State for Energy today gave a response to the report of the Select Committee on Energy. On Sunday, the right hon. Gentleman rubbished the report of the Select Committee on the Environment. The right hon. Gentleman has been quick to reply to the reports of the Energy and Environment Select Committees, which are not strictly within his remit, but he has not replied to the PAC's report, with its implications for British Gas.

The PAC report commented also on the sale of shares overseas. Within the first week, every British Telecom share put into the New York market was sold back into Britain, giving New York investors a killing of £108 million. The PAC recommends that "a thorough review of the method, desirability and value of overseas sales should be carried out by the Department and the Treasury."

What do the Government have to say about the sale overseas of British Gas shares? They have appointed a Japanese merchant bank, Goldman Sachs of the United States and the Swiss Bank Corporation to promote the sale of shares overseas. This morning, the Financial Times was catching up with events—it was a little behind the times —in referring to the 15 per cent. limit on the sale of shares overseas. We should like the Government to spell out how that sale will operate in terms of the information they put before the Standing Committee. We should like also information which the Standing Committee was not given on the operation of the golden share. We are dealing with a crucial industry and we are, therefore, entitled to ask for more information.

The purpose of the new clause is to allow Parliament to assess the method of the sale, to ensure that valuations are independent and to scrutinise the desirability of promoting sales overseas. If the Government are selling off our national assets—it does not matter whether it is Westland, British Leyland or British Gas—they should at least ensure that the sale does not result in tremendous losses for the taxpayer.

The new clause offers the Government an opportunity to show that their hands are clean and that they are not just providing another killing for the City. Their actions with public assets must come under public scrutiny, preferably before mistakes are made. There must be scrutiny by the House. That is why the new clause is important. We are entitled to a Government reply. If that reply is not satisfactory, we shall divide the House.

5.30 pm

Mr. Allan Rogers: The Minister made some interesting slips when introducing the new clause, and I was particularly interested in his reference to the prospectus as an art form. This Government would turn me off anything, and the description of the prospectus as a particularly interesting art form would not encourage me to buy shares in British Gas. Although I shall not buy them, many other people will. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said, it will almost be like giving people £10 notes for £5 notes.

It should be remembered that this flotation is not part of the Government's policy of extending share-owning democracy. Given the immense volume of the flotation, it is clear that the number of British Gas employees who will take up shares will be relatively small. It is more than likely that the billions of pounds of shares that will be floated will be bought by the institutions in the City and on the exchanges of New York and Japan. Therefore, it is a smokescreen for the Government to suggest that they are returning a national industry into the hands of the British people through the purchase of shares. That is absolute nonsense. One could even say that such a suggestion is a lie. To a large extent, as with British Telecom, the ownership of these shares will fall into the hands of the large institutions which will be at least one or two, if not more, steps divorced from the British public. As a result, British Gas will be even further removed from the British people than it is at present.

That is why the Opposition have tabled new clause 7. We want to ensure that the value of the gift that is to be handed over is known to the public at large. As was said in Committee, many parts of British Gas were taken into public ownership without compensation. It is a bit much that assets which were formerly owned by municipalities and local government should now be sold without such bodies receiving any compensation. That is especially so, given that compensation was paid by the Labour Government to the private corporations that ran sectors of the gas industry prior to public ownership. That is why we have argued that there should be a proper evaluation of the assets, so that a comparison can be made with the assets at the time that the industry was taken into public ownership, and so that proper compensation can be paid.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East referred to the huge sums of money that would be paid to the stockbrokers in the City of London. It will run into millions of pounds for a job that a donkey could do. This national asset will be worth around £17 billion, and up to £1 billion may be paid to City stockbrokers for handling this flotation. In Committee we considered the mechanics of the flotation at some length. Some figures were given about the volume of the flotation and the fact that the amount involved might be two to three times the total sum handled by the City of London on new issues in any one year. In other words, this flotation could take up all the investment capital available for a considerable time.

Last week the Secretary of State for Transport said that there would be a delay in the privatisation of British Airways, and the Minister of State said that this was due to all sorts of reasons that were outside the Government's control. I giggled at that, because the truth is that the market could not stand these two flotations this year. The Government have decided to go ahead with the sale of British Gas and to hold back the sale of British Airways, simply because not enough money is available as investment capital to allow the two flotations to proceed at the same time. That is another Government hypocrisy that has been exposed as we have considered the Bill.

I accept that the Government have a sufficient majority to ensure that this exercise goes ahead. We are anxious that they produce information on which the people can judge what it is all about. We had some successes in Committee and received some publicity, but we shall continue to expose the Government for the charlatan way in which they are promoting this Bill.

Mr. Rost: I welcome the Government's new clause, which will allow a mini-prospectus to be issued. It would be nonsense if that were not allowed. A full prospectus would have to be published in large quantities, and would probably take up to eight or 10 pages in one of the heavy newspapers. Apart from the enormous cost involved, the average investor does not read the small print anyway. He wants to know who is backing the issue, who the brokers are, who the advisers and merchant bankers are, and who the sponsors are. In this case, the Government have some good names sponsoring the flotation.

Even the experienced professional investor will take much of the small print as read, provided that the backers are reputable and that their reputations are at stake. If we are to encourage the new smaller investor and British Gas employees to become involved in this issue—that is the main motivation of the Government's privatisation policy; it is the spreading of capitalism—it is essential that we do not confuse such investors with an enormously bulky prospectus published in the newspapers or elsewhere that will simply put them off. On the other hand, a simplified prospectus might encourage the small investor to go for it.

Although I have sympathy with some of the arguments put by the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), I feel that he over-stated his case. He referred to PAC criticism of previous flotations. I sympathise with him, and have supported him publicly on previous occasions, but if the right hon. Gentleman is basing his argument on the subsequent rise in the price of British Telecom shares, he should reflect on whether he has over-stated his case. In fact, since British Telecom was floated about 15 months ago the share price has risen substantially, but the right hon. Gentleman did not point out that the BT share price has risen by far less than most other leading shares during that period. If investors had bought other shares, such as in Imperial Chemical Industries, they would have more than doubled their money. Indeed, a portfolio of leading shares would have done much better for investors than have British Telecom shares.

The right hon. Gentleman should also have pointed out that the market as a whole has risen substantially during the past 15 months—by more than 40 per cent. I do not have the figures before me, but within that market many leading companies' shares have more than doubled in price. This is a reflection of confidence in the Government's economic policy. The encouragement of new investors and the new mood of optimism is reflected in investor confidence, at home and abroad, in the Government and in the future of our economy. For the right hon. Gentleman to criticise the flotation of British Telecom as having been under-priced because the whole market sector has improved substantially is to be unfair to himself, because he usually presents a fairer argument.

I sympathise slightly with the gist of the right hon. Gentleman's overall criticism of the basis of flotation of the Government's privatisation programme. There is a better way of establishing a fairer price than we have so far achieved. I cannot understand why it is essential that 100 per cent. of the shares that the Government intend to sell must be sold on one day. That is unnecessary. The Government do not sell their gilts in that way, and companies do not sell their shares in that way. They sell sufficient shares to establish a market, and then gradually peddle them once the market level has been established. There seems to be no reason why the Government, who are acting on behalf of the nation as the trustee for British Gas shares, should not establish a market by selling 10 per cent. and withholding 90 per cent. of the shares, and then sell the 90 per cent. gradually during the following months, probably fairly rapidly, at a market level which will have established itself according to the market assessment of the value of British Gas. If the flotation were handled in that way, it would overcome the necessity for the right hon. Gentleman's new clause.

While I understand the gist of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, the proposal that a fair independent valuation should be prepared for British Gas and presented to Parliament is nonsense. The only independent fair valuation is the market valuation. Many investments and companies are valued on a fraction of their asset values. I can name any number of oil companies which are valued at well below their asset values, and I can think of many investments and companies which are valued at many times their asset values because of the premium that is paid for management, prospects or goodwill.

I do not understand what the right hon. Gentleman means by an independent valuation. The only independent valuation that is meaningful is the market valuation—the balance between supply and demand, and buyers and sellers. That is why I suggest that if British Gas and other privatisation issues are to be floated by the Government, only a small proportion of shares should be issued initially to establish an independent share valuation through a balance between buyers and sellers in the market. That way we would not have the problem which has been highlighted and criticised by the Public Accounts Committee, and shareholders—the nation—would be guaranteed a fair price. It is inevitably almost impossible to value in advance a company of this nature.

That is important if we are to encourage wider share ownership and the new small saver to buy shares in British Gas. A genuine investor will not be put off by the proposal for a fair valuation, because he will not go for a quick short-term profit, but will be more interested in long-term investment. Certainly British Gas employees, whom we hope will participate, will consider the long-term interest, because their future and livelihood are involved. Therefore, they will not take a short-term view or be tempted by a quick short-term profit.

The right hon. Gentleman's new clause is impractical and unnecessary if we think carefully about the way in which the flotation of British Gas should be handled to achieve a fair balance between the desire to encourage new small investors and employees, and to seek a fair price for the nation and shareholders.

5.45 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I wish to deal with the new clauses tabled by the Government and the Labour party. It is conceivable that when the Secretary of State announced the privatisation of British Gas many people outside the House who do not hold the strong ideological views that are represented across the divide may have thought that it seemed not a bad idea. During the past few months the House has witnessed a dynamic change which requires this massive flotation to be considered carefully.

It has been said, and, indeed, it should be true, that this is the biggest single company flotation that we have ever seen. When the Secretary of State announced the flotation, the price of oil was nearly $30, which consequently increased the valuation of British Gas above what it is now, when the price of oil has fallen to $15. If Sheikh Yamani is to be believed—he has not been wrong during the past few months—the price of oil is heading towards $8.

If those circumstances prevail, it is reasonable to assume that one would not expect to offer a major energy company on the market in the autumn. We have legitimate reasons for ensuring that the prospectus and details of the flotation are brought back to the House because the needs of the Conservative party may conflict substantially with the national interest. The House and even the Government's supporters are entitled to ensure that we are not forced to make a flotation at the bottom of the market and in circumstances where the valuation of British Gas, which should be about £8 billion, could be depressed by up to £3 billion simply because of the oil and gas markets.

I have considerable sympathy with the sentiments behind new clause 7 and the provision that the prospectus should be brought back to the House. I have heard the Minister's objections to that, but he should recognise that we are considering a major issue, not something that can be brushed aside by saying, "Trust us. We are the Government. We shall do it in the best way." There is a clear conflict of interests between the Conservative party's political objectives and the national interest.

It is important that this peculiar sort of flotation is spelt out in significant detail. It is wrong to privatise a major utility, as we are doing, especially in a way which neither introduces an element of major competition nor produces proper accountability and regulation. If it is appropriate to bring private money into a major utility, such as British Gas, the right approach would be to look for some sort of franchise operation. It is a privilege to operate a utility, and, to paraphrase what has already been said, it should not be a licence to print money. The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said that the British Telecom flotation had been described as buying £10 notes for £5 notes. Our worry is that the Government, in their desperation, might offer £10 notes for £2 or even £1, because they are anxious to get their hands on the money in the short term and will float the company even when the market is out of tune with the flotation. It is important that those who are invited to subscribe to the British Gas Flotation are aware of the circumstances.

Another factor that must be taken into account is that there is likely to be a general election within a year of the flotation. The prospectus must spell out the political objectives of a different Government. I shall not speculate on the nature of that different Government, but let us assume that they are not a Conservative Government. If they are not, there will be moves towards greater regulation of British Gas and greater accountability, which will affect the value of the shares. If the Government floated British Gas at the bottom of the market, some people might make a substantial killing. However, if they held off a little longer or the price recovered, some people might be surprised later to discover that the British Gas operation was not as cheerful as they had thought and was not a licence to print money. In those circumstances, they would have had every right to know in advance the risks that they were taking.

On balance, the greater risk is that the Government will sell us short rather than the other way round. In those circumstances, the Minister should accept that a substantial body of opinion outside the House is not satisfied with the way in which the Committee stage of the Bill was conducted and the fact that no significant changes were made. The Government seem intent on pressing ahead with the flotation, ignoring the completely changed market circumstances since the idea of privatising British Gas was mooted. Therefore, the Government should bring the details of the prospectus back to the House and should require that a full explanation of what is involved is laid before the prospective shareholders. They must not simply say, "Leave it to us." I am afraid that we do not trust them.

Mrs. Clwyd: Conservative Members have tried to convince us that wider share ownership is good for everyone, but research has shown that the number of individual shareholdings in privatised companies drops dramatically soon after privatisation and that strategic control of the stock remains in relatively few hands. In Cable and Wireless, for example, the initial 150,000 shareholders slumped to 26,000 within a year, and 467 large shareholders owned three quarters of the 346 million shares in private hands. There are plenty of similar examples, and it is a fraud to suggest that wider share ownership will be achieved by privatisation.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said forcefully, public assets have been substantially undervalued. If the Government have nothing to hide—if they are not simply trying to line the pockets of their friends—there is no reason why they should not support our new clause. Of course, they might be doing what we all suspect they are doing. As my right hon. Friend said, the terms of sale of British Gas are a cause for great concern. Our new clause tries to do something about them.

My right hon. Friend gave detailed examples of sale receipts, percentage speculative gains and the immediate loss to the taxpayer in previous privatisations. Indeed, the Government have a poor record on such sales. Their practice is to sell assets cheaply so that flotations cannot fail. The Government's problem now is the falling price of oil, which is increasing the public's anxiety about the sale of British Gas. My right hon. Friend talked about the Public Accounts Committee, which expressed its worries about stock going to an immediate substantial premium and creating windfall gains for the investor at public expense. He challenged the Minister to answer the points made by the PAC, and perhaps we shall hear some answers from him today.

The Public Accounts Committee made an important point about the handling of share sales. It mentioned the advice of merchant bankers, on which the Government rely heavily, who also have a stake in the sale as underwriters. The PAC said that the merchant bank advisers who were also underwriting the issue would have an incentive to ensure that the issue was fully taken up.

An interesting side effect of the privatisation programme that we discussed in Committee is that the public spotlight is beginning to focus on the fat fees for the City. I am not surprised that Conservative Members have so vigorously defended privatisation. My right hon. Friend gave examples of the millions of pounds lost to taxpayers by the previous 10 sales of nationalised companies. The report on British Telecom showed that the Government and their advisers undervalued the offer by a factor of five, while the City was rewarded with sale fees of at least £128 million.

The new clause is designed to ensure that that does not happen again. Judged by any standards—even by the standards of Conservative Members—those fees are excessive and appear to bear no relation to whether a sale has failed. We want basic information on why large fees are charged and paid to enable us to determine how the costs are arrived at. The Public Accounts Committee and Parliament should investigate the fees and other expenses paid for privatisation sales, not with a view to establishing what is normal in the City, but with a view to discovering how the costs are arrived at and distributed and whether the taxpayer is getting value for money. Why have the Government ignored the advice of the PAC that the Bank of England be used more often as an adviser during sell-offs?

Unless the Government support our new clause, the Bill will simply line the pockets of their friends. The salaries of the chairmen and top directors of 10 privatised companies increased by an average of 83 per cent. within two years of privatisation. The profits that once belonged to the public are being plundered to pay excessive salary increases to top executives.

If the Government do not support our new clause, they will show what we suspect: that the privatisation programme has more to do with private greed than with public need.

Mr. David Hunt: The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) and his hon. Friends have extended the debate to cover some general points on the flotation. My hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) was right to say that this is a marvellous opportunity for wider share ownership. The Government have made it clear that they intend to ensure that the ownership of British Gas is widely spread throughout the British public, and specific proposals will be made to ensure that those who manage the industry and are employed in it can have a direct stake in the industry for which they work.—[Interruption.] Now that I have woken up the Opposition Front Bench, may I make some more important points?

The Government are determined that the privatisation of British Gas will be good for the consumer, the employee and the nation. Anybody who now objectively studies the legislation, improved further here today, will see that that is the clear objective. No longer will British Gas suffer from unwarranted restrictions on its freedom to act as an efficient, successful and commercial business.

The right hon. Member for Salford, East quoted from the Public Accounts Committee report, and the Government treat its comments seriously and will carefully consider the points that it makes. The formal response will, however, be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The right hon. Gentleman said that he and his hon. Friends wanted to involve Parliament in the details of the proposed sale of shares in British Gas. I fully understand their interest in the contents of the prospectus, which will naturally and rightly be the subject of the widest possible interest.

Part II will enable the assets of BGC to vest in a Companes Act company wholly owned by the Crown, with the securities issued to the Secretary of State. Clause 50 specifically contemplates the disposal by the Secretary of State of such securities. Parliamentary approval to the Secretary of State's exercise of his powers of disposal will therefore have been given when the Bill reaches the statute book. Therefore, it is not necessary to involve Parliament in the details of the execution of those powers, and it would not be appropriate to require in the statute the presentation to Parliament of the prospectus in relation to one particular private sector company over another.

Nevertheless—I pay particular regard to what my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash said—my right hon. Friends and I shall pay particular regard to making the prospectus available to Parliament. We shall arrange for copies to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses at an appropriate time. I share my hon. Friend's view that we must see the widest possible extension of share ownership through this privatisation issue.

Hon. Members seek independent valuations of the company in the prospectus, but it is nonsense to value companies on the basis, for example, of the current cost of replacing all its assets. The company's value should be seen as the value of the business to investors, and depends on a number of factors at the time of sale, including the profitability of the company, and of other companies in the same market sector, and the overall state of the market. The new clause proposed by the Opposition is both unnecessary and inappropriate, and I shall urge my hon. Friends to vote against it. We want as wide a spread of ownership as possible, in particular to the employees of British Gas. My right hon. Friends and I are determined to see that the flotation provides an opportunity for all those employed in this great industry to have participation in its future success. Managers and employees will have a unique opportunity, for the first time, of a direct benefit resulting from their future success.

Mr. Bruce: If the Government thought that the market was adverse, are there any circumstances under which they would postpone or abandon the sale for commercial reasons?

Mr. Hunt: That question and the hon. Gentleman's contribution to the debate have demonstrated once again that the Liberal party is all over the place. It does not know whether to support or oppose the issue. I have noticed that there has been a singular absence of any member of the SDP here. Perhaps that is a good thing, because we do not know where the Liberal party or the SDP stand on this point.

Mr. Bruce: Answer the question.

Mr. Hunt: The answer to the question is that it is now evident for all to see that neither the Liberal party nor the SDP wants this issue to be a success. I have news for them —it will be a success. I have no doubt that the future commercial success of Britain will greatly benefit from the ownership of this company being spread among the employees, the managers, the pension funds and individual investors. These proposals will enhance the commercial success of our nation and bring benefit to industry, consumers and the employees.

Mr. Orme: With the leave of the House, Mr. Speaker. The Minister's reply proves that we were right to table our new clause. The House is right to scrutinise the sale of a major national asset. On almost every occasion that the Government have privatised, they have got it wrong over the sale of shares. This is the biggest sale of shares ever. As for wider share ownership, we have seen what has happened with the shares that have been resold and gone into larger units and companies. For example, the total share ownership of British Telecom among employees is less than 2 per cent. Therefore, I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Government's new clause, on the basis that our new clause on public scrutiny by the House of Commons is the correct one.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

REGIONAL COMPANIES

'The Secretary of State shall as soon as possible after the transfer to the successor Company of the property, rights and liabilities of the Corporation form and register under the Companies Act 1985 a Company for each region of the Corporation and transfer from the successor Company to each such regional Company the property, rights and liabilities formerly pertaining to the Corporation in each relevant region together with a share of the property, rights and liabilities of the successor Company which the Secretary of State shall deem equitable.".—[Mr. Wilson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wilson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause is probably one of most radical that has been tabled. Although many hon. Members are completely and utterly against the privatisation of British Gas, it is recognised that the Government have a substantial majority and on Second Reading the vote was given for privatisation. My new clause is no approval of privatisation—I am against it. The structure that has been adopted by the Government for British Gas is highly dangerous.

My new clause seeks to establish not the one successor company that the Government have outlined as appropriate to take over the work, enterprise, rights, assets and obligations of the BGC, but to use the mechanism that exists in the Bill for the successor company so as to provide for each of the regional boards or areas of British Gas to be divided up into companies and for those to be floated on the stock market.

It is important to address ourselves to a point that did not emerge in Committee but which was acceded to in Committee—that British Gas in its present form is a public utility which is highly centralised but which has some regional operations which, prior to the 1972 Act, were autonomous boards in the gas industry. Since nationalisation, bit by bit we have seen those powers disappear.

I am suggesting that we retain the central successor company. The Bill provides for transfer of the assets on a vesting day to that company. It would perhaps have been easier to eliminate that company altogether but I would be forestalled in that by the Bill's long title. In any event, it is a useful mechanism because, although I would prefer, for instance, to see Scottish Gas become a completely autonomous company with access to its own sources of gas, I recognise that that might not be appropriate to other parts of the United Kingdom. A substantial pool of gas is available to Scottish Gas because twice our market consumption share comes from indigenous resources in the North sea. I exclude the supplies of gas which come from the Norwegian sector. A successor company could be a holder of the pool of gas which exists and could make it available to the regional companies which will be set up to market it, to provide for the distribution services, the sales of appliances in the showrooms, and so forth.

There are some parallels to that. In England there is the Central Electricity Generating Board and there are marketing companies, but those are, of course, in the public sector. The independent television industry provides another example. The Independent Broadcasting Authority sponsors Independent Television News, which supplies news or central facilities to individual companies down the line. Those companies supply the programmes to the consumers and they have to pay their share of the costs of ITN.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): Following those analogies, will there be some franchising arrangement with the regional companies and do I take it from what the hon. Gentleman says that he has in mind marketing companies?

Mr. Wilson: No, I shall correct the hon. Gentleman's impression. I want gas companies in each region where British Gas currently operates. I would not necessarily take the franchising further than the analogy I gave in relation to ITN. It would not be appropriate in the circumstances that I have outlined. Nevertheless, it is quite a good analogy to show that there can be a central holding of the raw material of gas and yet independent companies would be able to market their own.

Alternatively, there is the other situation that I have described of an independent company in each area, but then the current pool of gas would have to be divided in some way so that a continuity of supply was provided for.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Would the regional companies that the hon. Gentleman proposes be independent or wholly owned subsidiaries of the central company? A strict reading of the new clause shows that they would be wholly owned subsidiaries of the central company.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman was fortunate enough not to serve on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill which, to put it mildly, took a rather long time. If the hon. Gentleman consulted the Bill he would find that it is necessary to go through the procedure that I have outlined. The long title, in particular, would prevent the setting up of individual companies as successor companies through transfer by the Crown direct from British Gas. As I said at the outset, independent companies would be floated off separately and they would be centres of authority.

Let me deal with the structure which exists in the Bill. Whether or not we embark on the principle of privatisation, what the Government have sought to do is not acceptable to many people. In other words, they are turning a public monopoly into a private monopoly with no real opportunity for competition, with weak regulatory powers, and, as is hinted at in the abolition of the regional gas consumers councils now served by British Gas which was discussed earlier, we are seeing incipient centralisation by British Gas. That background is ominous. Few countries will allow the creation of such a huge monopoly on that basis. Indeed, in the United States, the home of the free market, legislation seeks to bust trusts when they come to that stage. The Americans found it necessary to break up "Ma Bell", whereas here we have an example of the Government going ahead with the creation of Mr. Gas. It is dangerous in terms of the accumulation of authority within the overall economy of the United Kingdom and it is also dangerous for the various areas of the United Kingdom because they will see what responsibility and authority is left to British Gas operating in their areas slide to the centre.

In Committee we discussed the fact that already British Gas is altering the name of Scottish Gas to British Gas Scotland and Wales Gas to British Gas Wales, and so on. A new uniform structure is being imposed from the centre.

The only reason why the Government have gone ahead with the privatisation of British Gas in this form is that they wish to sell in a hurry. Their time is running out and this is one example where the Government have not even tried to project the benefits of privatisation. Instead, they seem more honest in their aims when they recognise that, given the reduction in oil revenues, it is a great advantage to them to have massive resources coming in, albeit of capital arising through the sale of shares in British Gas, in order to finance tax cuts for the next election. But that is a short-term advantage that would have disastrous consequences. In the interests of widening the share distribution and strengthening the economy, it would be far healthier for the Government to consider the flotation of separate companies, each having a distinctive basis. Thus, I have in mind the setting up of 12 companies.

In Committee I drew the following analogy. One of the difficulties facing Merseyside is the absence of indigenous companies. When Liverpool was flourishing, insurance and shipping companies acted autonomously, creating wealth and providing jobs in the area. Now there is a wasteland. Many of us in Scotland are worried that if too many of our companies are taken over, any opportunities to change our economy will go, along with the units on which we had previously relied. Thus, I fear the Bill's consequences for regional development.

In Committee, I drew attention to an interesting article by Mr. Dennis Wilson, a former director of British Gas, which appeared in the magazine Gas World. He lamented the abandonment of autonomous systems of staff and line management, and described the flight of authority from the regional boards under the 1972 Act, saying that they had been emasculated. He also complained that British Gas, at the centre, was spawning a central hyperstructure of mammoth proportions, situated in expensive London locations and of no benefit to local consumers. He clinched that argument with the remarkable information that, at March 1985, there were 6,768 employees at the headquarters of British Gas. As a former director, he made it clear that he thought that the headquarters exercised an over-close scrutiny of the activities going on in the various regions or areas of the corporation. He said that, although demanning and efficiency had been called for from British Gas as a whole, there had been 4·4 per cent. demanning in the regions with only 1·1 per cent. demanning at headquarters. That rings true.

Perhaps the headquarters staff are doing work that is duplicated elsewhere. But even if they are doing valuable work, it could be done at area headquarters. That would create employment as well as opportunities for promotion and advancement and would give a commercial boost to the many areas that suffer from high unemployment. Thus, good quality jobs are being lost. When so many employees are employed at head office a sort of arteriosclerosis of the corporation develops. However, as I am not medically qualified, I would not want to elaborate on that save to say that it does not bode well for the corporation's commercial health.

I believe that we should float off companies in each of the areas. They would carry out the main functions with the exception, perhaps, of buying gas, although they could perhaps undertake that function in competition with each other at a later stage. They could oversee supply within their respective areas, management techniques and the taking of decisions with regard to gas showrooms. Regional companies might well have the advantage of being able to favour local suppliers, which would be good for the health of the economy.

Moreover, the flotation of such companies would strengthen the economy, particularly in Scotland. Some of those companies would be substantial. The number of staff at regional level ranges from 5,000 to 11,000. Scottish Gas serves more than 1 million customers, has 74,000 appliance sales per year and carried out 1·25 million service jobs in the last year of operation. All those functions would be better controlled at an area level. Scottish Gas also has sales of £403 million and investment worth about £20 million per year. Its wages amount to £57 million and a recent magazine article estimated its pre-tax profits to be about £35 million. However, that is an estimate, as British Gas does not attempt to split up its overall profits between the area organisations.

I commend the new clause to the House. The Government should have undertaken something like it from the beginning, instead of creating a colossus which might have adverse effects on the economy. If a Scottish Gas plc was established it might make up, in some small way, for the recent loss of Andersson Strathclyde, Bells, House of Fraser, perhaps the Trustee Savings Bank if the appellate committee of the other place does not change the judgment, Coats Patons and possibly Distillers. It would greatly help the Scottish economy to have a new, thriving company on the market that was controlled from within Scotland. It might also be an answer to some of the economic problems affecting different parts of the United Kingdom, and I commend it to hon. Members.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): I shall be brief, as I was not a member of the Committee and so have not followed the arguments as closely as have the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. I apologise to my right hon. Friend in advance in case I make some points which have already been considered in Committee, or which to his mind are too obvious even to be discussed. However, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will have patience with me.

I was attracted by the new clause because it gives the House a chance to consider the structure of the new, privatised corporation. My interest is based, not only on any regional or Scottish consideration, but on the question of how the corporation will develop over the years. We naturally think of British Gas as a national and local gas supplier and distributor, but we shall be introducing a company which has the capacity to stand alongside BP as a large high-tech energy business which is capable of supplying the domestic market as its primary consideration as well as of moving internationally and taking its place in the exploration, distribution and development of energy resources in other parts of the world. I have the same view of British Telecom, although it is the local and national telephone company. I hope that it will use its domestic base to exercise influence, economic power, and profitability in other parts of the world.

I return to the local, regional and Scottish scene. It is important for regional policy that the management and administration of separate regional companies — I see them as subsidiaries of the main privatised corporation — have local accountability. Their ability to contribute to high calibre management jobs would satisfy the regions and Scotland.

The proposed system will give us a local chairman who is little more than a PR man. He will have a grand title — I make no criticism of people holding such jobs — but he will be a PR officer for customer service. With separate fully accountable subsidiary companies, with all the local and regional assets in the balance sheet, we could have proper local management and boards of directors and some competition between regions in terms of service, quality of service and efficiency of administration. It would be possible to compare the efficiency of the different subsidiaries and to discover what benefits might accrue from the lessons learnt.

That is done in the electricity industry in Scotland. The two companies submit two balance sheets and accounts which include all the assets. A different system is operated south of the border by the Central Electricity Generating Board and the distribution boards, but the Scottish model is at least worthy of consideration and debate. The consumer should be able to judge, on a full and proper company law basis, the performance of one regional gas operating company compared with another, without taking anything away from the efficiency or efficacy of British Gas plc. With those thoughts in mind, I support the new clause.

Mr. Bruce: I support the new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), to which I have appended my name. The issue was raised in Committee and I regret that the Government are not prepared to face up to it. A number of matters have emerged. It is not just a question of before and after. The clause proposes to go further than what occurs at present. The Bill will create a more centralised gas industry. Even if the Government cannot accept the full thrust of the clause, they should have the grace to acknowledge that they are not simply transferring the status quo but are engaged in greater centralisation. Many of us feel that that is a retrograde step.

The new clause suggests that we go further and create autonomous companies in Scotland and Wales and in the English regions. I accept that the competition would be limited, since the core business would have a substantial monopolistic element, but the scope for more competition would be greater. The transparency factor would be greater, but one would be able to examine the performance of different regional and national companies and draw lessons from them, whereas at present we are at the mercy of a centralised wisdom heavily concentrated at the corporate headquarters in London.

I suggest that the regional companies should be able to buy their gas—in most cases from British Gas through the transmission system—with the option of buying gas from other sources, whether that is from other than natural sources as technology changes, or from local natural sources onshore or offshore.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East mentioned the concern about the size of the British Gas Corporation headquarters in London. I fear that after privatisation the headquarters will be even bigger and that the management jobs available outside London will be fewer. Management decisions are being made at a central corporate headquarters and decision-making is not being devolved, so the freedom to pursue action needed in a particular area or region is not taken on board.

The decisions by North Thames gas on a particular course of action are fundamentally different from those that might be taken in Scotland. If they are that different, separate and autonomous companies should make the decisions. Each area should have the freedom to pursue policies in the light of local circumstances and different market circumstances.

Consumer councils have also been discussed in terms of regionalisation. I am slightly puzzled that some members of the Committee seemed enthusiastic about regional consumer councils, but were unwilling to accept that that need for local control and autonomy should reach the management and organisation of the gas industry. It seems strange to be in favour of regional consumer councils, but in favour of a unified, centralist, London-based corporation, without the opportunity to develop separate identities in the region.

The Government have rejected our proposals and have been inclined to rubbish them, but they have not come up with arguments as to why our proposals cannot be put into effect. The Minister will recognise that many people outside the House are puzzled about why that option has not been seriously considered. If it had been fully considered and the Government had said that they had examined it in depth but had good, coherent reasons why it would not be in the best interests of the consumer, the shareholders or the taxpayers, we should be more satisfied. The Government have said that they do not see any advantage in our proposals, but they have failed to say why.

In Scotland there is considerable interest in the idea of Scottish gas being handled by a separate company operating as an independent entity. It would have its headquarters in Scotland and the people of Scotland would have a direct stake in it. We see no reason why other regions, such as Wales, should not be given a similar opportunity. The proposal does not mean that there would be no centralised gas industry. Of course the transmission system must be centralised, and many of the corporate offices will continue to function to provide a service, but we need a counterbalance.

A monolithic structure will pursue its own policies and there will be no opportunities for the Scottish, Welsh and the English regions to say that they do not believe that the corporate central decisions are in the best interests of their consumers. They will be outvoted. All that we shall have is a National Consumer Council with possibly one regional representative. That is a weak and inadequate alternative to what is proposed.

The Government should have explored the sentiment behind the new clause more thoroughly. I urge them to take on board our serious proposal, even if the clause is not structured perfectly. If the Government go ahead with their centralist philosophy they will alienate many people outside London who are fed up with decision-making being taken away from their locality and made in London. The decision-making process will be removed from their localities and there will be an inability to get at the person making the decisions. The local representative may continue to be near to someone's doorstep, but very often it will be necessary to go to London to get satisfaction or to change policy.

Mr. Douglas: I shall try to be brief, but we are dealing with an important issue which must be treated seriously. We have heard three speeches on the new clause and there have been three different interpretations of it, and I shall not necessarily present my interpretation of the clause. I am in favour of a decentralised operation. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) made clear the thrust of his argument in his closing remarks. He puts forward the clause as a piece of decentralisation, and in so doing claims that Scottish Gas plc will become the cure-all for the ills of the Scottish economy.

Mr. Wilson: I did not say that.

Mr. Douglas: I am not saying that the hon. Gentleman used those exact words, but he suggested that Scottish Gas plc would become a cure-all. Is he saying that the Strathclyde problem would be resolved and that Scottish Gas would lead to an expansion of employment? Under the existing structure we have had reasonable decentralisation. I do not say that everything has been perfect because public utilities, which tend to be monolithic, cannot be perfect. However, when a public utility has some form of accountability through a Minister to Parliament, pressures can be exerted in reflecting regional concerns.

The real thrust against the Government's proposals is that once the corporation becomes a company the chances of controlling it and achieving a regional dimension, whether the region is Scotland as a nation or another area, will diminish and evaporate almost completely. I found the remarks of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) humorous when he said that he wanted the new company to be a real challenger to BP. The Government introduced the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982 and in so doing they stripped British Gas of any opportunities it had of engaging in exploration and production. However, every sinner who repenteth is worth while.

I think that I speak for all Scottish Labour Members when I say that we want to see decentralisation. However, we recognise that the chances of us exerting pressures within a regional dimension will diminish and evaporate once the Bill is enacted. That is why we are so opposed to it. I do not think that it is valuable to give the impression to the Scottish people, the Welsh people, or the people of any region of the United Kingdom that if we set up mini companies that are independent, or wholly-owned subsidiaries of the major company, they will cure the major difficulties within the Scottish economy and that Scotland will get a great prize.

Mr. Orme: The hon. Members for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) asked me on Second Reading whether the Opposition were in favour of the sort of proposal that is before us in new clause 1. I said then that we were not. Notwithstanding all the faults or weaknesses that may exist in British Gas, I think that Scotland, along with other areas, has had good service from it. The policy that has been advanced by the hon. Member for Dundee, East could lead to different charges in different areas. If independent companies were set up, their charges could be different. I come from the north-west and I do not want differential charging to be a feature of life in areas that are far from the centre. That would pose a danger for Scotland, Wales and other areas.

How far should we go with any independence that is created? I think that we should——

Mr. Wilson: It does not necessarily follow that charges in the more remote areas would be higher. In Scotland we have two electricity generating boards, and the price of electricity is cheaper to the customer in Scotland than in England and Wales. If a pool of gas is owned by the successor company and there is level pricing, any reductions in the price of gas that are enjoyed by the customer will be the result of the efficient management of the local companies.

Mr. Orme: I do not think that the parallel with electricity is valid. The hon. Gentleman is playing into the hands of Conservatives who talk about competition and want to see British Gas broken up. British Gas is highly efficient and the charges for gas are too high only because of things like the gas levy. The Government are draining away that which is created by the efficiency of British Gas. There could be cheaper prices in Scotland, Wales and England. The structure that is proposed by the hon. Gentleman would not work, and it would not be in the interests of Scotland or any other region within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fletcher: The right hon. Gentleman said a few moments ago that there could be differential pricing in the regions. He argued that the further away from the centre an area was the more that that could be. Surely he is not suggesting that the centre of the gas industry is the west end of London. Everything depends on where the centre is.

Mr. Orme: It is not a geographical issue in that sense. When the Telecommunications Bill, as it then was, passed through the House, I was involved because of my responsibilities as an Opposition spokesman. There were major arguments on behalf of those living in rural areas and much time was spent discussing what would happen to them if the Bill were enacted. We spoke of the dangers of differential pricing.

The Opposition feel that the new clause is unnecessary. If the hon. Member for Dundee, East and those who support him force a Division on this issue, I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends not to support the clause.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I agree with the comments of the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) about the woolliness of the way in which the new clause was introduced by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson). The hon. Gentleman talked about cheaper electricity being available in Scotland, but he did not acknowledge that the lower prices are related directly to the extent to which we depend upon nuclear power in Scotland. I hope that the hon. Gentleman consulted the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), and I hope that he in turn consulted his hon. Friends in the Social Democratic party.

With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), the alliance that we see on the new clause does not take into account the fact that the people of Scotland would not know where they were when it came to their energy policy. Each party would be advocating a different policy. On that basis, if on no other, anyone who believes that a clause of this nature would be for the benefit of Scotland would be wise to scrutinise closely precisely what it is that those who support it are trying to achieve.

I think that the hon. Member for Dundee, East was less than fair when he said that a new structure was being imposed on Scotland by British Gas. That is not true. British Gas is maintaining the structure and organisation that currently applies. There has been a change of name and Scottish Gas has become British Gas Scotland. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would prefer

"Scotland" to the adjective "Scottish". It is important that that is on the record, because the hon. Gentleman returns constantly to this issue and misleads people in describing what is taking place. As I said in Committee, there will be no change in the structure and organisation of British Gas Scotland.

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central was less than fair to the chairman of what will be British Gas Scotland in describing him as no more than a public relations officer. My hon. Friend has a different kind of constituency, and I do not know whether he has had any dealings with the chairman, but I have had many dealings with the chairman in relation to service, transmission lines, and so on—I do not mean small individual consumer questions, but larger matters of supply to whole communities, renewal or reinforcement of transmission lines, and so on—and have never failed to obtain complete satisfaction. I felt, therefore, that my hon. Friend's comments belittled the chairman's role.

The hon. Member for Gordon asked why the proposal in the new clause could not be carried out, but nobody has said that. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman did not listen more carefuly to what was said in Committee. The question, as the right hon. Member for Salford, East has said, is whether it is worth doing and whether it is in the interests of consumers in Scotland.

Those who support the new clause must realise that we start from a successful, integrated industry. That is partly due to the development of North sea gas and the almost total reliance, apart from some liquid natural gas, on an integrated distribution system throughout the United Kingdom. Had we begun from the situation at the time of nationalisation, with individual gas works producing gas from coal in a large number of different places, different considerations might apply, but as we now have an integrated industry relying on a single source of supply it makes no sense to break it down.

Mr. Craigen: The Minister has spent so much time telling us what an excellent gas industry we have that I am surprised there is any need for privatisation. How can he guarantee that the industry will behave as he suggests in relation to structure once it is privatised?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: That is exactly the question that I wanted. I was getting worried that it would not be asked. I believe that the tests in the private sector—competition with other fuels in the industrial market, and so on—will provide far greater incentives to efficiency and higher standards of service to the consumer. It has been amply demonstrated that the private sector provides better standards of service and efficiency in the interests of the consumer.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) referred to the problem of a private company serving the interests of the region. For industrial consumers, as has been shown in this period of falling oil prices, competition from other fuels ensures that consumers obtain proper services. On the question of tariffs, the hon. Gentleman failed to recognise that the Director General of Gas Supply is charged under the Bill to observe the need to avoid preferences and to ensure fairness between different areas. I stress that point also to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central.

There might have been more of an argument if hon. Members could have said, as I thought my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central was about to say, that the new clause would lead to more competition. In fact, because there would still be a monopoly supplier in each region there would be no more competition than there would be among the various regions of British Gas. I believe—here I am absolutely at one with the right hon. Member for Salford, East—that the result would be differential pricing. I have dealt with the false analogy with electricity suggested by the hon. Member for Dundee, East. The fact that Scotland has far more scattered communities probably than any other region means that British Gas must provide special supplies of liquid natural gas, and so on. I accept that Scotland has problems, but without an integrated British Gas those problems could lead to much higher costs.

I believe that the new clause would do nothing to serve the interests of Scottish consumers. Having listened to those who spoke in favour of the new clause, I am left wondering what they really want. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central wants a strong British Gas to go out into the world market, but British Gas is already in the world market. Representatives of British Gas have accompanied me on trade missions and British Gas provides consultancies, advice and services overseas. Breaking down that integrated industry within the United Kingdom would not serve the best interests of British Gas or its consumers in this country.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) asked the hon. Member for Dundee, East whether the proposed system would apply just to marketing or whether it would apply to franchising. The reply was, in effect, that the pool of gas would simply be divided up somehow. When the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West asked whether the companies would be subsidiaries of British Gas or whether they would be independent companies, the hon. Member for Dundee, East said that there would be centres of authority in the regions. That is woolliness of the first order. To accept the new clause would be to buy a pig in a poke. It would not be in the interests of consumers in Scotland and it would certainly not be in the interests of Scotland.

Mr. Wilson: I cannot allow the debate to end on the farcical note struck by the Minister, who suggested that I did not know what I was after. He clearly does not appreciate the idea of breaking up the centralised system that he has in force, and I am surprised at the way in which the Labour and Conservative parties seem at one in trying to maintain the Goliath of British Gas.

I am even more surprised to hear the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), for whom I have great respect, talking about the benefits of British Gas—from which I do not dissent—but failing to realise that British Gas plc will be completely unlike the previous organism and therefore that he cannot make judgments about how this creature will react on the basis of what has gone before.

Then there is the strange situation of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). Apparently Scottish Labour Members are all in favour of decentralisation but are not prepared to vote for it. Sooner or later they will have to make up their minds. It is a Labour party tradition that everything should be organised from the centre, but I thought that they had been breaking away from that. I am very disillusioned by the attitude that they have adopted.

I am rather more cynical, of course, about the Government's stance on these matters. The Minister raises the question of differential pricing, but fails to acknowledge what was well known in Committee—that remote communities which are not connected to the main gas grid are charged a premium price for the liquefied gas provided. Is the Minister about to give an assurance that those communities will be provided with gas at the standard rate? If not, there is a huge hole in his argument about benefits.

As for the parallel with the network or grid, we already have that in the electricity supply industry. The North of Scotland Hydro-Electric Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board work together harmoniously on joint projects but still maintain their independence. They export power to each other and to the Central Electricity Generating Board, which in turn is linking up with Electricité de France, so it is possible for independent, autonomous companies to work in an international framework. If that is correct for the electricity supply industry, it seems self-evident that we could do so in relation to gas. The fact is that the Government want to keep a centralised gas corporation and the Labour party, which its leader has just described as a party of devolution, still wants to keep the power at the centre by having a huge organisation with 7,000 employees at its headquarters with all the tentacles coming out of London.

I hope that those hon. Members who believe in decentralisation, competition and a good service being offered within the gas industry will vote with me because I intend to press this matter to a Division.

RECOGNITION OF TRADE UNIONS BY THE PUBLIC GAS SUPPLIER

"(1) A public gas supplier shall extend recognition to Trade Unions supported by the staff.

(2) It shall also be the responsibility of a public gas supplier by agreement with such recognised trade unions to establish joint negotiating machinery for the purposes of regulating industrial relations, education and training, and health and safety in the company; and such machinery shall reflect both the regional and national structure of the public gas supplier."—[Mr. Orme.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Orme: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause deals with recognition of trade unions by the public gas supplier when the British Gas Corporation becomes a public limited company.

The British Gas Corporation currently employs over 93,000 people in a vital industry. It is clearly essential that industrial relations in the industry continue to run smoothly and that the recognition and framework that currently apply should continue after privatisation. BGC management has been promising that everything will stay the same. The new clause gives substance to that promise, and puts it into legislation.

The new clause seeks to ensure that a public gas supplier does two things that will help industrial relations. First, it requires the supplier to recognise appropriate trade unions. That is the first step as it encourages staff to believe that they are properly represented. It ensures that management has a suitable channel for consultation and negotiation.

The second part of the new clause seeks to ensure that proper negotiating machinery is established by the supplier. That is nothing new. Under the Gas Act 1972 the BGC is required to establish machinery for the negotiation of terms of employment and the promotion of the health, safety and welfare of gas employees. That machinery already exists within British Gas. It is essential that it continues with legislative backing. If the Government are not prepared to accept the new clause, we want to know what changes will take place and what machinery there will be under British Gas plc.

The current machinery has developed over the years. It is centralised and efficient. Negotiations over salaries and major conditions of service in the gas industry take place primarily at national level. There is virtually no negotiation at local level, but at regional or district level there are various forms of consultative and negotiating machinery for dealing with such items as car allowance schemes and so on. The machinery for joint negotiation is based mainly on Whitley principles and consists of a trade union side and an employers' side. Therefore, one side of a council cannot outvote the other.

There are three national joint councils—the national joint council for gas staffs and senior officers, the national joint council for higher management, and the national joint industrial council covering manual workers. Those councils deal not only with grades and salaries but with the promotion of training, safety, health and welfare, and improved efficiency and methods.

For each of the 12 regions and for the headquarters of the BGC there are three joint committees or councils that cover consultative and negotiable matters. The composition of regional councils varies from region to region, but their joint membership ranges from 12 to 26 people. The regional councils are both consultative and negotiating bodies. Local service conditions agreements are made for such matters as deputising allowances, car allowances and so on.

There is no local negotiating machinery in the gas industry, but there is machinery for consultation. Local joint consultative committees have been established in many areas in accordance with the provisions of the Gas Act 1972, and they represent all grades of staff. Those committees deal with matters such as hygiene, health and welfare, and do not consider or discuss terms and conditions of employment.

It will be appreciated that the machinery currently in operation in the gas industry is elaborate and well balanced. I am informed that it works well, mainly because the employees feel that they are given a fair hearing. On that basis, they are prepared to accept decisions that they may not like. It would be a tragedy if an industrial relations procedure based on recognition of appropriate trade unions and the establishment of workable machinery were to be thrown away. Employees of the British Gas Corporation who have worked hard to create a successful industry deserve to have their future assured, at least in this important area. They already have such protection under the current Act. They should have it also under the new legislation.

I am disturbed by the deterioration of industrial relations in British Telecom since privatisation. Representations have been made to me on several occasions about the changes in work practices and in the form of consultation.

The consultative machinery in the BGC has been built up over many years. It has worked well and is accepted by management and trade unions. That machinery may appear perfect on paper, but when real problems arise between the workers, particularly when one is representing 93,000 of them, and management, those consultations are not love-ins, but serious negotiations in which major issues are decided, ranging from wages and conditions to safety and health. It would be wrong to form a public limited company without first creating consultative machinery.

I understand that British Gas has consulted its employees. It has issued bulletins decribing what will happen under privatisation and giving information about pensions and other matters, but those bulletins have not said that the machinery that now exists will continue. That is why I have moved the new clause. We should like the Under-Secretary of State to give a full reply on these developments. The Government accepted the machinery provided under the 1972 Act, so what is wrong with accepting that machinery in an efficient privatised gas industry?

7.30 pm

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I should like to support the motion. Trade unionism in the gas industry is by no stretch of the imagination an innovation. In three years, my union — the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union—will celebrate its centenary. That union began 97 years ago as the National Union of Gasworkers, and it has grown from strength to strength.

It is against that background that we make a perfectly reasonable request — that the rights of trade unions should be recognised and written into statute. There should be no question of the public limited company having the right to determine whether there shall be a trade union organisation. As long ago as 1945, the Heyworh committee commented on the industry in the following terms:

"we have satisfied ourselves that the necessary machinery for negotiations between the two sides exists and has a satisfactory record of achievement."

I should like to underline the words, "satisfactory record of achievement."

I am proud to be the founder member of the first staff branch of my union in the gas industry. I am proud that we have never had any industrial troubles. There were tough talks but we always resolved the issues by talking and did not need to take the ultimate step of strike action. In the 30 years in which I worked in the industry we never knew what it was to strike. It was only the nonsense floated by the Government about selling off the showrooms that led to the first ever national stoppage in the industry. It is to the Government's shame that extremely responsible people—the workers in the gas industry—were pushed into taking strike action.

The concerns to which I have referred are as valid today as they were in the past. One need only look at fortress Wapping where many first-class journalists have walked out because trade unions are being trampled on. Unless the new clause is accepted, the same could apply in the gas industry. Skilled workers by the score might walk out because they are not prepared to work in an industry that does not recognise trade unions.

Clearly, we want to continue the good industrial relations record because that would be to the consumers' benefit. It is not sufficient for the Government to say that the privatised company may make its own arrangements and be confident about that. The Government may be confident that British Gas plc will establish the same kind of negotiating machinery that the publicly owned gas industry has enjoyed, but I am not.

We are talking about a monopoly energy supplier. Disruptions to that industry would be catastrophic. The one-day strike against the selling off of gas showrooms was simply a shot across the bows. A national stoppage is almost unthinkable.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that one reason why we should be extremely worried is the Government's known hostility to trade unionism? Does my hon. Friend agree that that is all the more reason why, when the stupidity of privatisation takes place, we must be extremely careful to retain the trade union strength and organisation that has been built up in the gas industry?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend has underlined my points. There must be some control by statute over monopoly. One can choose not to read The Sun or The Times but one cannot choose to live without gas.

Mr. Rost: Although I have been carefully following the Opposition's arguments, I find it difficult to understand why the new clause is necessary. I should have thought that all the evidence of previous privatisations during the past few years has shown that industrial relations improve once an industry has been privatised. There has been no question of workers in the industries not having proper representation. Industrial relations have improved in those industries mainly because large numbers of employees have become shareholders. The best way employees can have representations and communication with management is by their becoming shareholders, because shareholders can hold the management responsible for their actions by exercising their rights at annual meetings and even by dismissing the management if they wish. That pattern has been followed to tremendous effect in all the privatised industries.

I was a little surprised that the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) did not say one word advocating that employees of British Gas plc should be encouraged to become shareholders. I should be more sympathetic to the new clause if union leaders were to give positive rather than the negative advice given in other privatised industries to the effect that union members should not subscribe for shares. Union leaders have given unfortunate advice to employees in companies such as the National Freight Consortium, British Aerospace and British Telecom not to subscribe for shares. Those who took that advice have suffered financially.

I would have hoped that the right hon. Member for Salford, East would, as part of his case for proper industrial relations and representation, have incorporated a plea that the union leaders in British Gas should be advising their members to become shareholders, thereby influencing the management and improve industrial relations by becoming owners of the business.

Mr. Pike: I support the new clause. We have already heard that only 2 per cent. of the shares in British Telecom are now held by BT employees. If the Government were really sincere, they would permit a workers' representative on the board of directors. However, they have failed to do so in respect of any of the industries that they have so far privatised, yet they talk about giving employees greater participation. Given the small percentage of British Gas shares that will be held by employees, it is unrealistic to expect that they will be able to elect a director who will specifically represent them.

Conservative Members frequently knock the role of trade unions, but they fail to recognise the important part the trade unions play in the running of industry. The trade unions and management have one mutual interest—to see industry succeed. They do not want to see the production line grind to a halt. That is bad for management, because profits go down, and it is equally bad for the workers, because they lose wages. It is obvious that in conjunction with management the trade unions and the gas industry have had a tremendous record of achievement, and it is equally obvious that the procedures have worked well.

In Committee, the Minister said that an undertaking has already been given that the current procedures will be carried forward once privatisation take place. If that is so, there is no reason at all why the Government should not be prepared to accept this moderate and reasonable new clause. It will ensure that suitable procedures are carried forward, not only for the benefit of the workers but for the benefit of the industry and the nation as a whole. This is a sensible and modest new clause, and I hope that it will be supported.

Mr. David Hunt: This has been an interesting debate. I hope that Opposition Members will recognise that in drawing up the legislation the Government have made every effort to ensure that employees enjoy the same rights after privatisation as they do now. British Gas has made it clear in its privatisation reports for employees that the existing negotiating machinery, which is the substance of the proposed new clause, will be carried forward. That will apply at both national and regional levels.

Industrial relations is a matter to which the corporation rightly affords a high priority, and the record of the industry is a testament to the success of its attitude to staff. All sides of the House greatly welcomed the fact that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) participated in the debate. In paying him that tribute, I hope he recognises that I do not accept what he said. However, the hon. Gentleman has a tremendous knowledge of this industry. I understand that he was apprenticed as a plumber to the Newcastle gas industry in 1937. He knows the importance of industrial relations to the present management of British Gas, and its record is a testament to the success of its attitude to the staff.

The new clause would require a public gas supplier to recognise the industry's trade unions and to establish joint negotiating machinery. There can be no doubt that British Gas has given full recognition to representative trade unions and that it will continue to do so.

The second limb of the new clause again seeks to re-establish section 35 of the 1972 Act, which placed a duty on the corporation to seek consultation with organisations on machinery for settling terms and conditions of employment and for the promotion and encouragement of safety, health, welfare, training and education. Again, the record of British Gas in these areas is second to none, and it is simple commercial prudence to ensure that it develops the skills of its staff in the interests of efficiency and customer service in general.

British Gas has already assured those involved in the operation of the present negotiating machinery that it does not intend to make any changes in its approach as a consequence of privatisation, and the same assurance has been given to employees generally. If the existing arrangements prove inadequate in some way over the passage of time, any changes will be the subject of joint consideration between management and unions.

The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Dunn) said that he had seen nothing in the privatisation reports to show that British Gas would continue the present arrangements. He said that it was for that reason that the Opposition proposed the new clause. I am happy to give him the opportunity now to withdraw the motion because privatisation report No. 6, under the heading of industrial relations, states:

> "British Gas has stated that it sees the existing negotiation and consultation arrangements which have served industry well in the past carrying us into the future. Over time we may need to alter our arrangements according to any new circumstances which may arise—but that would be a matter for joint consideration between management and Trade Unions."

Mr. Orme: My point was that that is not controlled by legislation. We are arguing that the management of British Gas could change and there could be an entirely different management. We therefore see nothing wrong in incorporating the provisions of the 1972 Act into this Bill.

Mr. Hunt: I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman. I thought he said that he could find nowhere in the privatisation reports an assurance that British Gas would continue the present arrangements. I thought I understood him to say that it was for that reason that the Opposition proposed the new clause.

We have already had a substantial debate in Committee on these questions, and in direct response to the right hon. Gentleman I made it clear that in the Government's view it would be wrong to write into this statute obligations that were not written into statute for other private sector companies. I then gave the Committee the assurances that I give now—that British Gas does not envisage any change in the existing negotiating machinery, and that it will continue its fundamental commitments to consultation and discussion on matters affecting employees.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: The Minister must surely appreciate the fears of the present employees of British Gas. If this provision is not written into statute, as it was in the 1972 Act, there is nothing at all to prevent the newly privatised management from suddenly becoming bloody-minded—as we have seen in the newspaper this week—and taking action that would be anathema to the entire British trade union movement. That could have dreadful repercussions for the nation.

Mr. Hunt: I understand the fears that the hon. Gentleman has expressed, but I believe that they are groundless. I hope that employees will recognise, in view of the assurances that they have received from the existing management, that there is no need to be concerned about the future of industrial relations, given the great tradition of this important industry in the past.

I very much welcome the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost). He has considerable knowledge of privatisation and profit-sharing. He rightly pointed out that there was Opposition silence on the question of buying shares, and that in the past there has been no encouragement from trade union leaders.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) misunderstood the importance of employee participation through share ownership. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) also made a speech. The hon. Gentlemen are not correct. Nationalisation has not meant ownership by people or by employees. In reality, it has meant ownership by politicians and the Government. There is no need for the new clause to entrench in any way arrangements which have existed until now. The legislation affords for the first time true public ownership of the gas industry.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

FIXING OF THE STANDINC CHARGE BY A PUBLIC GAS SUPPLIER

'(1) A standing charge fixed by a public gas supplier shall in any one year rise no higher than the retail price index.

(2) Before a standing charge is fixed by a public gas supplier he shall notify the Director who shall investigate the components and levels of such a charge.

(3) Where in the light of such investigations the Director is satisfied.

(a) the services provided and paid for by the standing charge have been reduced; or

(b) the public gas supplier has achieved significant cost reductions in the components making up such a charge then the Director may give direction to the public gas supplier to reduce standing charges or to increase them by amounts in any one year less than the increase in the retail price index.'.—[Mr. Rowlands.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Few hon. Members will have failed to notice the growing anger, frustration and bitterness among an increasing number of consumers of gas and electricity about standing charges. During the past four years, while I have been an Opposition spokesman on energy, I have received many complaints and heard many arguments about standing charges. Indeed, enough pressure built up inside and outside the House to compel the Government to cajole the gas and electricity industries to introduce new codes on standing charges. The feelings of frustration, anger and bitterness come especially from the elderly. Sometimes, the cost of the gas that they consume is less than the cost of their standing charges.

As a result of the pressures, the gas and electricity councils introduced codes to govern standing charges and ensured initially that the charge would be no greater than the cost of gas consumed in any quarter. However, as hon. Members on both sides of the House will recognise, the gas and electricity industries were not enthusiastic supporters of the initial proposition and have tried to nibble away at the voluntary arrangements. That was the background to our debates in Committee on the Government's proposals for standing charges.

The new clause endeavours to ensure that standing charges will not increase by more than the rate of inflation. In some circumstances, and after the director general has investigated, the increases should be less than the rate of inflation. Indeed, in some cases there should be decreases in standing charges.

We tried to entice the Government into supporting a similar provision in Committee, but we failed. Unless we get satisfaction tonight, we shall press the new clause to a Division because of the weasel words that are used in a condition to the 25-year monopoly licence that will be given to British Gas. The condition attached to the proposed draft licence states that the supplier—British Gas — shall use its best endeavours to ensure that standing charges do not increase above the retail prices index. It does not say that the supplier will be unable to increase charges above the retail prices index; simply that he should use his best endeavours. The Opposition distrust those words. They are weasel words that could be used as a let-out, so that the supplier could wriggle out of the commitment which the Government believe they have established.

We distrust the condition, not only because of the words, but because of the information that we have received on the background to the condition. We understand that when the Bill was published last November, internal management documents from the BGC expected that the formula for standing charges in the draft licence would be RPI plus Z. The BGC expected, not unreasonably, that such a formula would be included in a draft licence. We were extremely suspicious when that was brought to our attention and we believe that, late in the day, the Government realised how much outrage would be caused by such a formula. As a result of the pressure that built up, the Government managed to obtain a compromise arrangement. The words "best endeavours" are no more than a compromise between the condition wanted by the BGC—RPI plus Z—and the present formula for the condition attached to the licence.

We passionately believe that there is a case for ensuring statutorily that the upper increase limit on standing charges should be no higher than the increase in the retail prices index. However, we also believe—this relates to the other half of the new clause—that the director general should have the power to investigate the components of a standing charge. If he discovers that the supplier has made savings in services which are supposedly covered by the standing charge, he should recommend an increase less than the RPI, or a decrease.

Let me illustrate the point that I am trying to make. It is possible, and even probable, that British Gas plc will try to make savings on meter reading. Instead of reading meters quarterly, there will be longer periods between readings, estimates of bills will be sent to customers and the company will wait for customers to inform it of the correct amount. The result could be considerable savings. Meter staff and reading are two components of the standing charge, so if the director general discovered such savings, he could attribute them directly to the standing charge and suggest either a lower increase or a reduction in charges. There have also been many changes in meter technology and in the way in which supplies into our homes can be metered.

The Government might say that such savings are indirectly reflected on other aspects of the price formula, but where the savings can be related specifically to the components of a standing charge, they should reflect directly on increases or decreases in the charge. Therefore, the director general has a useful and important role to play in monitoring and investigating standing charges. If the public gas supplier can achieve significant cost reductions in the components of a standing charge, the director general may direct the supplier to reduce standing charges or at least to increase them by less than the increase in the retail prices index.

We are introducing some flexibility, not in the increase of standing charges above the RPI, but, where savings might be made, in the increase below the rate of inflation. We submit the new clause in a spirit of moderation and to respond to the growing feeling of frustration and anger felt by a large number of elderly consumers about the level of standing charges.

Miss Black has not been a notable critic of the Government; she has not been up front on many of these major issues. I hope that she and the Gas Consumers Council will support the arrangements that we propose, because we believe that we are justifiably responding to the feelings, demands, anger and bitterness about standing charges that have been made clear to the House in the past four years.

Mr. Rost: I am sorry to have to tell my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench that I am slightly tempted to support the Opposition's new clause, unless my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary can, somehow or other, dissuade me from doing so. I was one of those—there were a number on the Conservative Benches—who, on Second Reading, raised the question of standing charges. We were rather disturbed to see the wording in the draft authorisation as simply imposing on British Gas a requirement that it would use its "best endeavours" to keep increases below the rate of inflation. Some of us felt that that needed re-wording to make it a little more precise and forceful. I did not serve on the Committee, and I am surprised to find on Report that we have made no progress.

The Select Committee made recommendations on standing charges which the Government do not appear to have taken on board, and I find myself in something of a dilemma in supporting the Government. We know that there is a great deal of irritation about standing charges, particularly among low-income consumers, and I should have thought that it would be reasonable to provide, before fixing the standing charge, not only that the director general should be notified, but that he should be obliged to investigate whether the increase is justified.

Standing charges can be a skilful way of concealing rises in tariffs. If there are to be rises in tariffs through standing charges, there must be a way in which they can be prevented if British Gas says that it has acted in its "best endeavours" but requires more income and intends to get some through increased standing charges rather than through increased tariffs. That could have an undesirable impact on certain consumers.

Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend, before the new clause is pressed to a Division, will make some much more reassuring noises than my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was able to do on Second Reading.

Mrs. Clwyd: My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has made the case for our new clause forcefully. I draw the attention of the House, as I am sure it will be drawn later tonight, to the latest report of the Select Committee on Energy which talks about the unacceptable and shameful

> "lack of heat in poor homes this winter . . . a winter which should have concentrated the Government's mind both on the hardship and danger to life caused by unacceptable and shameful levels of fuel poverty."

In Committee, we made clear our concern about standing charges and their importance in fuel poverty. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security during a debate last year said:

> "energy prices . . . are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy."

He spoke about:

> "the extent to which the cost of fuel is relevant to those on low incomes . . . Fuel is clearly a basic necessity, especially for the elderly and the sick. I recognise the concern that is felt by many on low incomes when it comes to paying for fuel."—[Official Report, 16 December 1985; Vol. 89, c. 134.]

8.15 pm

However, we know from the Social Security Bill that the Under-Secretary's understanding has lost the day, because the Bill proposes to abolish heating additions and single payments to help with fuel bills. We are concerned that the Gas Bill does not oblige British Gas to keep any increase in standing charges within the rate of inflation. We do not understand the phrase "best endeavours", despite the Minister's attempts to explain it in legal terminology in Committee. I am sure that no other Opposition Member understands that phrase and nor do members of the public.

Do the majority of Conservative Members have any understanding of what fuel poverty means to so many people? Evidence has been given time after time to the Select Committee on Energy from Age Concern and the National Right to Fuel Campaign about fuel poverty. How can the Government still shelter behind the phrase "best endeavours"? The National Right to Fuel Campaign gave detailed evidence about domestic gas disconnections, which it admitted were fewer than for electricity. However, there is worrying evidence, about which we should all be concerned, and the number of disconnections is still too high. They continue to occur in households for which alternative measures and aid would reduce hardship. Age Concern and the Child Poverty Action Group have shown that the present level of social security benefit given to low income households is inadequate to help those who experience difficulty in paying their fuel bills. We gave many such examples in Committee.

For example, at the beginning of last year an article in The Guardian talked about "A 13-year-old boy whose mother and sister were found dead in the council flat where the heaters were cold, died in St. Thomas's Hospital, London, yesterday. He was found with his mother, aged 31."

Intense cold and the problems of paying for fuel bills are not associated only with the elderly. The family were living in a flat in central London. The article said that gas central heating in the flat was working two days before Mrs. Smith and Natasha were found dead, but a preliminary investigation after the family was found showed that the main jets would not ignite. Mrs Smith, a student, could have decided to do without heat

"because she had been worried about the prospect of mounting fuel bills."

As a result of that tragic case, various voluntary organisations pressed for more Government action to prevent hypothermia and other cold-induced illnesses. This country has a greater number of deaths from hypothermia than north America and north Europe. We should be thoroughly ashamed of that in this day and age.

Many of my constituents turn off the heat because they are afraid of the size of their fuel bills. I am referring not only to poor pensioners, those on supplementary benefit or the unemployed, but to relatively well-off pensioners, who are scared stiff about the size of their fuel bills. For all households who rely upon low incomes, the expenses incurred in paying their fuel bills are already high. Since the energy crisis in the late 1960s there have been escalating increases in electricity prices and Government-induced increases in gas prices.

Fuel poverty since 1979 has become even more prevalent. Both the Social Security Bill and the Gas Bill completely ignore the fact by refusing to recognise that fuel costs are incurred disproportionately and that low income households spend a greater percentage of their income on fuel than do higher income households. That is part of the reason for fuel poverty becoming so prevalent. The real needs of low income households in relation to fuel expenditure have not been recognised. If implemented in its present form without the Opposition amendment, the Bill will only compound this very serious problem.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am left with only one or two minutes to speak because the Minister has to reply to this debate. It is disgraceful that a subject that is as important and serious as this for many thousands of our fellow citizens cannot be properly considered because of the operation of the guillotine.

I trust that the Government recognise that the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) is sensible. It is free of the gobbledegook which disfigured the Government's earlier approach. There are standing charges not only for gas but for water, electricity, telephones, and so on. All of them present very serious problems. We are concerned that that problem should not be intensified.

Mr. David Hunt: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) began by reminding the House that there were extensive discussions in Committee about standing charges. However, he referred again to the anger that is felt about standing charges. I have no alternative but to remind him that a wide ranging interdepartmental committee was set up by his right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). In February 1976, under the signature of the right hon Gentleman, who was then Secretary of State for Energy, it said:

"The Government asked an interdepartmental group of officials to review the scope for helping poor consumers by adjusting the structure of energy tariffs or by other means".

After considering the group's report the Government concluded that none of these possibilities offered a satisfactory way of helping poor consumers with their fuel bills. In paragraph 8, on the specific point raised by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, the interdepartmental committee concluded:

"We are satisfied that there is a sound case in economic principle for a tariff structure under which standing charges are maintained separate from the unit consumption charge."

The hon. Gentleman referred to the anger that is felt about standing charges. He should not try to rewrite the history books. If he is to be fair to the House of Commons tonight, he should remind hon. Members that it was a Labour Government who reached that conclusion.

The hon. Gentleman is right to remind the House that the clause deals mainly with limiting the increase, which is what this debate has been partly about, subject to other points that have been raised. But standing charges are only part of the price that is paid by the customer. The price formula that is set out in condition 3 of the draft authorisation covers both the standing charge and the rate per therm. Under that price formula, British Gas will have a clear incentive to achieve a real reduction in all the costs under its control, whether they be the costs recovered through the standing charge or through the rate per therm. Efficiency factor "X" in the formula ensures that customers will benefit from increased efficiency.

There is an important question as to the appropriate distribution of the total between the standing charge and the rate per therm. The Government believe that the fair approach is to prevent standing charges from rising faster than the rate of inflation. I note that the new clause adopts the same approach. However, to put that requirement into the legislation would limit the flexibility of the director general to propose adjustments to the regulatory controls in the light of changing circumstances. That is the reason for setting out appropriate regulatory requirements in the authorisation and providing in the Bill a mechanism for making amendments to the authorisation. The new clause would introduce unnecessary and undesirable inflexibility into the controls over standing charges. It is much better to leave the controls in the authorisation.

Mr. Lofthouse: Does the Under-Secretary of State recall that in his evidence to the Select Committee the Secretary of State was as much confused as everybody else about the words "best endeavours"? In reply to a question from me he said:

"In the Committee stage I shall be perfectly willing to examine this. That is my objective, although to you as a layman and to me as a layman this phrase sounds like 'If you can't make the effort, bad luck.'"

Mr. Hunt: I have not reached that point yet. I hope that the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) recognises that I have gone through the argument about why it is in the authorisation rather than in the Bill. That answers the points put to me by his hon. Friends. I have still to deal with the exact words.

The new clause also provides that the director general shall investigate the components and levels of such a charge. That, too, is unnecessary. The director general will have full powers to investigate the make up of the standing charge and he may call for any informaion that he believes is necessary. That is provided for in condition 7 of the draft authorisation. If he took the view that the controls on standing charges in the authorisation were producing results that were contrary to the interests of consumers, he would be able to take steps to rectify the situation by initiating a modification.

The final part of the new clause provides that if there have been significant cost reductions in the components making up such a charge, the director general may intervene. Under clause 14 of the Bill, in fixing tariffs British Gas must not show undue preference or discrimination. This means that standing charges must be fairly related to fixed costs, otherwise small consumers would either be subsidising or being subsidised by larger consumers. The allocation of cost is not an exact science. That is why, for the additional protection of customers, explicit control over standing charges is set out in condition 4.

I seek to convince my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), as I was able to convince other Conservative Members, that the phrase "best endeavours" has a great deal of legal force. In Committee I quoted the case of IBM (UK) Ltd. against Rockware Glass Ltd. In that case the extent of the plaintiff's obligations to use best endeavours was described by Lord Justice Buckley as "obliging the plaintiffs to be bound to take all those steps in their power which are capable of producing the desired results."

In Committee I quoted other cases. In all of those cases it is accepted that to use best endeavours imposes a clear obligation to comply with that requirement.

Condition 4 states clearly that the supplier shall use its best endeavours. That important provision is a satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. If, however, there were a significant reduction in fixed costs and this was not reflected in the balance between standing charges and the rate per therm, the director general could intervene to enforce the non-discrimination provision if he took the view that it was being infringed.

I realise that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney cannot agree with me. Indeed, it would be asking too much of him suddenly to agree with me. However, if he reflects upon it for a moment, I think he will see that I have endeavoured to set out these arguments step by step, that his proposal is unnecessary and that it would remove much of the director general's ability to ensure that those who are paying standing charges are properly protected.

Mr. Bruce: Is the Under-Secretary of State able to assure the House that if the general price per therm was not being increased, or was not being increased in line with inflation, standing charges would be, at worst, increased at the same rate as the increase in unit cost, or preferably at less than that rate?

Mr. Hunt: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman understands what I have been saying. I have given a clear assurance. In the authorisation there is the provision, which my right hon. Friend repeated earlier, that standing charges will not be increased higher than the rate of inflation. That is clearly set out. The supplier shall use its "best endeavours" to ensure that. I have further assured him that—this is an important provision—the director general has an opportunity, if he feels that the balance is beginning to infringe the duty——

And it being half past Eight o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order [17th February] and the Resolution this day, to put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 7

AUTHORISATION OF PUBLIC GAS SUPPLIERS

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 5, line 13 at end insert—

'(4) Before granting an authorisation, the Secretary of State shall require any public gas supplier, following consultations with the Director and the Council, to prepare codes of practice specifying

(a) the nature of service available to tariff customers in relation to gas supplied by the supplier;

(b) the conditions attached to the payment of gas bills including guidance to domestic customers if they have difficulty in paying; and

(c) the provision of special services for elderly and disabled persons and any public gas supplier shall arrange for the publication of such codes of practice, in such form and such manner as the Director may consider appropriate.

(5) The Director and the Council shall collect information on, and keep under review, all matters relating to such codes of practice under sub-section (4) above with respect to which the functions of the Director or the Council are exercisable.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 5, in page 7, line 7 leave out subsection (13).

No. 7, in clause 9, page 8, line 33 at end insert—

'(2A) It shall also be the duty of a public gas supplier to employ a sufficient number of qualified staff trained to an appropriate standard to fulfill the obligations placed upon the supplier by Schedule 5 of this Act'.

No. 14 in clause 23, page 26, line 16 leave out subsection (1) and insert—

'The Director may modify, with the consent of the Secretary of State, conditions of a public gas supplier's authorisation in respect of conditions relating to prices and charges made by the supplier; and in respect of conditions relating to the level of service provided to customers.'.

No. 15, in page 26, line 38 leave out 'the consent of' and insert 'consulting'.

No. 42, in schedule 5, page 73, leave out lines 20 to 23 and insert—

'(a) seek an order from the court to cut off the supply to the premises by disconnecting the service pipe at the meter (whether the pipe belongs to the supplier or not) or by such other means as he thinks fit; and

(b) if such an order is granted recover any expenses incurred in so doing from the customer.

In deciding whether to make an order for the purpose of sub-paragraph 5(a) above the court shall have regard to provisions of the Code of Practice for payment of bills.'.

No. 43, page 73, line 24, leave out subsection (6) and insert—

'(6) In this paragraph "the court" means the High Court or a county court and a county court shall have jurisdiction in the proceedings if the charges due do not exceed the county court limit.

(7) Where a public gas supplies has cut off the supply of gas to any premises as a result of an order made in accordance with subsection (5), the supplier shall not be under any obligation to resume the supply of gas to the customer until he has made good the default and paid the reasonable expenses of re-connecting the supply.'.

Mr. Rowlands: One of the most constant and widespread criticisms, not only of the Bill, but of the Government's whole approach to privatisation, which has been reflected in our debates and in journals and newspapers, ranging from the Financial Times to the Morning Star, is that by privatising British Gas the Government will create a new monster private monopoly, while at the same time failing to provide any meaningful or effective regulation of it. That is the fundamental charge made against the Bill and the whole process of privatisation adopted by the Government.

In their turn, the Government have claimed that this private monopoly monster will be controlled by a combination of competition and regulation. However, for the vast majority of gas consumers competition will be non-existent. In Committee we investigated the Bill in detail, together with the draft conditions attached to the 25-year monopoly licence to be granted to the new BG plc. We found that the system of regulation, and the functions and powers given to the director general, would not provide any meaningful regulation or protection for consumers in key areas of consumer interest.

These amendments together with the next two sets of amendments, which I understand will be moved by the Chairman of the all-party Select Committee, go some way towards remedying the defects and towards giving some substance to the concept of regulation and the power of the director general.

Amendment No. 1 has been promoted by the Gas Consumers Council and is fully supported by it. It seeks to ensure that the gas supplier has to prepare a series of codes of practice specifying the nature of the service available to tariff customers and, in particular, the conditions attached to the payment of gas bills, including guidance to domestic customers if they have any difficulty in paying. The gas supplier is to provide a code that covers the provision of special services to the elderly and disabled. Such a code must be prepared following consultation with both the director general and the Gas Consumers Council. We believe that that is vital to the needs and interests of many consumers.

We fear, not that British Gas will not initially maintain a variety of voluntary codes, but that a future British Gas may decide to cut corners, to reduce services or to cut the number of meter reading staff, while not passing on those reduced costs of the consumer. We wish to ensure that the Bill gives statutory support to the idea of codes relating to the payment of gas bills or to the disconnection of supply for failure to pay them.

A voluntary code has been agreed. Some 35,000 gas consumers were disconnected in 1985 because of failure to pay their bills. Thus, we are not talking about something modest. It is necessary that codes of practice as outlined in the amendment should be in force and should be the subject of consultation. We strongly believe that the provisions laid down by the Government, in the conditions attached to the 25-year monopoly licence granted to British Gas, do not provide the full range of statutory support that is necessary for standards of customer service. Thus, we believe that the gas supplier should be compelled to prepare codes of practice specifying various things, and that they should be the subject of consultation with the director general and the council.

We also believe that the director general and the council should have the power to collect the information and to keep under review all matters relating to such codes of practice as are suggested in the proposed subsection (4). We place great emphasis on the ability to obtain and collect information, because of the experience of telephone user groups in relation to British Telecom. Before privatisation BT issued a lot of information about problems, breakdowns and failures. However, after privatisation it used the cloak of commercial secrecy as an excuse for not providing such information.

We do not want those mistakes to be repeated. Consequently, it is vital that the director general and the council should have the power to collect information. British Gas should not feel, after privatisation, that it can wrap some of its information in a cloak of commercial secrecy, as BT has done. Therefore, there is a strong case for proposals such as those the Gas Consumers Council has suggested, which are incorporated in amendment No. 1.

In amendment No. 5 we go further in giving some power and meaning to the director general's role. We give the director general the power to modify, with the Secretary of State's consent, certain conditions that are attached to the licence in relation to prices, charges and the level of services. In Committee we debated some aspects of that. At present, the Bill allows the director general to do only two things: he can modify the licence if he obtains agreement from British Gas under clause 23, or, if he does not get agreement, he can modify it if he makes a recommendation to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which in turn takes the necessary decision.

We believe that saying that modification should occur only by agreement or through the elaborate procedure of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission makes the Director General of Gas Supply a pathetic creature, without any meaningful power in the key areas. Apart from enforcing the existing arrangements or authorisations, all that he can do is to recommend changes, which have then to be submitted to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. The director general's power is reduced to that of postman. Any of his recommendations to British Gas to modify a 25-year-old licence will have to be passed to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Anyone who has followed the activities of that commission in the last few months will wonder whether such a cumbersome outfit, already overstretched and coping with the merger mania which has struck us, is an appropriate body to deal with the range of probably modest modifications which cannot be achieved by agreement with British Gas. Is that not an incredibly cumbersome process?

We debated the matter in general in Committee, but we have returned with a modification of our own proposals. We suggest that the director general should have limited powers to modify a licence. We provide the safeguard that the director general must have the consent of the Secretary of State, but we believe that if Ofgas is to be set up, the only function of which is to consider complaints about gas supply, the director general should have the right to decide on modifications to a licence in relation to services, charges and prices — with the Secretary of State's consent. The director general should not be expected to pass his recommendations on to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which might know very little about the nature, background and reasons why such modifications of the licence are proposed.

The Government's plan will insert another tier of obstruction into the flexible arrangements which the Government describe as necessary. It will undermine the potential authority of a regulatory body. We plead with the Minister to reconsider this "either or nothing" arrangement. The director general has either to get agreement or pass on his recommendation to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. If we are to create the director general, we must give him a proper job to do. We should give him limited power to modify a licence and the conditions attached to it.

In Committee I explained how nonsensical it would be if, when the director general wanted to recommend a modification to the conditional connection charges, or to the codes for payments of bills or services, he had to refer this to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. That commission deals with other matters, such as competition. It does not normally consider the moderate and sensible modifications that might be proposed by the director general on charges, pricing and standards of service.

I hope that the Government will respond to our plea to make the director general and the Department more meaningful, with a reasonable set of functions. I hope that our plea will not fall on deaf ears as it did in Committee. We have a strong case for giving the director general more powers than are offered in the Bill.

Another amendment refers to safety, which we debated at length in Committee. We believed then, as we believe now, that the Government have made an exaggerated case, to the point of being bogus, in their claim to improve safety by reducing the statutory time given to British Gas to deal with gas escapes from 24 hours to 12 hours under schedule 5. The majority of regions respond within two hours to a gas escape report.

As important as the speed with which a gas escape is dealt is who deals with it. Will the person be equipped, trained and qualified to deal with it? Our amendment suggests that a duty be placed on the public gas supplier to ensure that such people are qualified and trained to a certain standard. We debated those standards at length in Committee when we discussed the training of staff.

Even before privatisation the problems and arguments are with us. The problems exist now, before the privatised company, which will be more interested in profit than service and might cut corners, is established.

I shall quote an extract from a letter from employees in Plymouth. It says:

"The Plymouth area of British Gas has not taken on an apprentice gas fitter for at least four years, and even if it were to do so it now would mean a gap of eight years before a qualified and certificated fitter became available. Within that eight-year period there has, and will be a reduction in the direct labour force due to retirement, ill health etc. Already contractors are being used to deal with peak work loads and if those employers are not inclined to set up their own apprenticeship schemes which should adhere to British Gas standards, where are the qualified persons to come from? We fear there is a great danger of cowboy operators, with limited knowledge, moving into the industry, perhaps producing sub-standard work which eventually could cause damage to life and limb, and of course property."

The letter suggests that I bring these fears to the attention of the appropriate committee. I bring it to the attention of the House. The letter concludes:

"a fully certified operator should be the only person allowed to fit and maintain any gas appliances. This should also apply to contractors engaged on mains and service work whose training programme leaves a lot to be desired."

Mr. Robert C. Brown: It is appalling that some gas depots have not employed an apprentice for four years. Is my hon. Friend aware that this is typical of area boards throughout the country, and that in many instances many more years than four have passed since an apprentice was employed?

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for intervening. As we know, he has great knowledge of these matters.

I hope the Minister will not contend that we are engaging in scaremongering. I did not prompt the letter from which I have quoted. I have not been to Plymouth to arrange for such a letter to be written, and I have not sought to arouse the feeling which is expressed within it. I assure the House that the letter was written spontaneously. I hope that the Minister will heed the authentic words and views that have been set out on behalf of those who work in the industry.

Worries and concerns are being expressed before British Gas is privatised, and amendment No. 7 will impose a duty on public gas suppliers

"to employ a sufficient number of qualified staff trained to an appropriate standard to fulfil the obligations placed upon the supplier by Schedule 5 of this Act."

This is not a marginal issue, and it cannot be described as an academic consideration. We are discussing a factor which is central to safety issues.

9 pm

British Gas has tried to maintain high standards and it has a tremendous record of training apprentices. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) and many of his contemporaries are examples of the training that has been provided. We are worried about the deterioration in training standards. If the Government decide to embark upon a further privatisation measure and to create a new public company, we feel that the duty should be placed upon the company to ensure that training takes place and that a sufficient number of qualified and trained staff are available to meet the challenge of ensuring safety in future.

We are worried about an increase in the number of cowboys in the industry. There is great concern about some of the gas applicances, including gas cookers, which are being supplied. There is increased competition in the selling of gas cookers and a significant percentage of the 110,000 cookers that have been imported from the continent and elsewhere are not reaching the safety standards that have been set by British Gas. We know that strong statements have been issued by Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry to the effect that unsafe goods constitute unsafe competition. We have not yet seen the draft regulations on the safety of appliances that have been promised, although we have pressed harder and harder for them to be produced and introduced.

There is a huge gulf between the Government's rhetoric, the words in the Bill, the conditions in the licence, the system of regulation and the powers that have been given to the Director General of Gas Supply. We do not believe that the draft licence that will be granted for 25 years will meet the needs as we see them. They will not meet the needs of the consumer. The Gas Consumers Council will be able only to advise on the presentation of some of the codes, as laid down in condition 14. That demonstrates how derisory and modest is the role of the council in preparing and drafting codes that will be of great concern to domestic gas consumers.

We believe in strengthening the statutory backing of the codes, in strengthening the role of the Gas Consumers Council and the director general in the preparation of the codes, and in giving the director general important and useful functions by being able to modify the licence without embarking on the enormously cumbersome procedure of making recommendations to yet another quango, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. For all these reasons, I hope that the Minister, even at this late stage, will accept some of the arguments that we have been advancing.

Mr. Bruce: I shall speak briefly on amendments Nos. 42 and 43, which I tabled and to which the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has been addressing himself. Although this may not be apparent at first sight, the amendments are designed to provide protection for those who have difficulties in meeting the payment of their bills and are faced with disconnection. Even under the present system, consumers can be disconnected in circumstances which would be regarded as unjust and unfair and which aggravate the difficulties being experienced. We need a service that is designed to try to help consumers cope with their difficulties. In most instances there is not a refusal or a show of unwillingness to pay. Instead, there is more often than not genuine financial hardship that leads to difficulty or inability to pay.

It is argued — in my view quite rightly — that consumers who are in difficulties should be faced with court action. I am not encouraging British Gas or any gas authority to take court action. Instead, I am trying to avoid the circumstances which arise now and which could become worse under a private company that will face, perhaps, more commercial pressures. I am trying to avoid arbitrary disconnections which do not relate to a code of practice. I do not want consumers who face difficulties enough being confronted with what would seem to them to be abrupt disconnection.

The basis of the amendments is not abstract. They are based on considerable evidence and experience over the years, which I am sure is shared by many hon. Members, of people who have suffered considerably as a result of arbitrary disconnection in circumstances in which it should not have happened. As I do not wish to detain the House unduly, I will give just one example.

Last year, a London consumer who had been away for six months received an estimated bill. He queried the estimate, but while he was awaiting a reply he received a second bill — not an unfamiliar experience — and the supply was then disconnected although there was a two-month old baby in the house and the consumer had offered to pay the £59 that he owed. He was then asked to pay not just the amount that he owed, but a reconnection fee, although I am sure that hon. Members would agree that the supply should never have been disconnected. Apart from anything else, it seems extremely dangerous to disconnect a house in which there is such a young baby, and I do not believe that that would have been done even by the electricity industry. The consumer had said that he had been away, he had queried the bill, and he had offered to pay the amount that he owed. To disconnect the supply in those circumstances seems arbitrary and heartless in the extreme.

The amendments would require the gas board to take court action, so the circumstances that I have described could not have arisen. The time needed to take court action would have ensured that the circumstances were brought to light and would have given the advice and aid agencies time to provide a legal defence if necessary or to ensure that the case did not proceed in view of the circumstances. In fact, the details of the case that I have described were provided by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. At present, because there is no legal requirement to the contrary, the supplier can disconnect the supply without recourse to law, resulting in the injustices and uncertainties to which I have referred. In the case that I have cited, the disconnection was unfair and unjust, but no harm was done. It is not difficult, however, to imagine circumstances in which disconnection could have serious consequences, for example, for an old person or a household with very young children and without any alternative form of heating in very cold weather.

I believe that the requirement that disconnection should be undertaken only after court action would be welcomed by many people. It is quite wrong for people who have no direct dealings with cases of this kind to assume that people do not pay their bills because they are unwilling recidivists and wish to defraud the gas board. The evidence shows that in 99 per cent. of cases it is because people are experiencing genuine hardship and real financial difficulty. Those people need help. They certainly do not need an abrupt and arbitrary withdrawal of essential supplies.

I can understand why some hon. Members would rather the courts were not involved, but the purpose of the amendments is to protect the individual by making it clear that the gas authority cannot disconnect any consumer, even if bills have not been paid, without taking the matter to court where all the facts and arguments can be considered and it can be clearly determined whether the person is simply refusing to pay or has genuine difficulties which can be much better resolved by the various aid and support agencies. I commend these as fair, balanced and reasonable amendments.

Amendment 43 makes it quite clear that, where it is proved that the person has not paid the bill because of unwillingness or refusal to pay or where there are no circumstances which justify extra aid or help, the consumer will not get his supply reconnected until the bill has been settled. That seems to be reasonable because it puts an onus on both sides. In my view, the amendments would ensure that those facing real difficulites or hardship would be removed from the threat of arbitrary disconnection and would have the protection of the courts to ensure that they could not have their gas supply terminated unless it was conclusively proved that they were guilty of an offence. I think that that would very much improve the present position. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): My justification for speaking briefly in this debate is my former membership of a consumer council, albeit, I admit, not in the gas industry but in the electricity industry. However, I think that there are some important similarities between the two and I hope that on that basis I shall be allowed to say a few words.

The Opposition have tonight demonstrated more than anything else their fundamental disagreement with the principle of privatisation. That can be no surprise to any of us. They seek, therefore, to surround a Bill such as this with the kind of controls which a new private company does not need in order to be successful. It is interesting that the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), sought information on faults and instanced the example of British Telecom. I am hopeful that there will be a general improvement in the performance of British Gas when it becomes a private company. I do not look for information on the bad things but an improvement which will be demonstrable to all consumers. I think that that says something about the attitude of the Opposition.

It is unfortunate that the Opposition regard the British Gas of the future as a monster. I think that that was the word used by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. Why should it be a monster? Why is there this deep-rooted suspicion that the new private company will want to cut back on services? I should be interested to know why that should be. To take the example of the disconnection code of practice which the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) mentioned, it seems to me that it is in the interest of a private company to maintain the best possible relationship with its customers in order to maintain good public relations. In the long term, those customers will pay for the success and profitability of the company. It seems extremely unlikely that the company would want to cut people off until all other methods of achieving payment had been tried. Certainly, it may go to the courts but I would have thought that the last thing the company would want would be to disconnect a consumer, because the gas industry is not such a monopoly as some hon. Members have suggested. It always has the competition of the electricity industry. A person who cooks by gas can transfer to electricity if he does not like the service which is being provided by the gas industry.

The fears which the attitude of the Opposition have raised deserve some form of answer from the Government. I take it as natural that in the future the industry will want to provide, for example, special services for the elderly and disabled. Services currently provided include free safety checks and special appliance adaptors. Research should continue into new facilities such as special meters for the blind. I hope that we are all of one mind in seeing that as the right way to go in the future. Is my right hon. Friend the Minister of State satisfied with the assurance that he has been given by the British Gas Corporation that it intends to continue along those lines in future?

Despite my right hon. Friend's confidence about the industry's future behaviour, confidence that I share, what would happen if there were changes, and if the fears that have been expressed tonight turned out to be justified? Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that the protection for the elderly and disabled would be maintained? Who would the consumer go to first with his complaint? Does my right hon. Friend expect to see the same dedicated band of men and women who currently serve the consumer councils at local level continuing in the future through the flexible arrangements that are being introduced in the Bill? It would bring considerable comfort to many of those who have been frightened by the Opposition's campaign against the Bill to be given an assurance tonight. I invite my right hon. Friend to say how the Government would react if some of those fears turned out to be justified.

Mr. Pike: I agreed with the hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) when he said that the Opposition have made it clear from the start that they are totally opposed to privatisation. That is exactly our position. I regret that I did not agree with most of the other conclusions that he reached.

In spite of our total opposition to privatisation, throughout the debate, as an Opposition, we have tried to pursue three aims—to protect our national energy, to protect the consumer interest and to protect the industry's employees. This group of amendments is aimed at protecting the interests of consumers.

The hon. Member for Swindon referred to the monopoly. British Gas will have a monopoly for the average gas consumer. Throughout the Committee, it was made clear that in most gas appliance sales, British Gas has a near monopoly at present and will continue to have one after privatisation. The hon. Member for Swindon said that a person with a gas cooker could easily go out and buy an electric cooker. He failed to recognise what sort of people we are trying to protect with the amendments that we are debating. Even those on a reasonably good wage cannot afford to suddenly go out and buy a new gas or electric cooker without difficulty—it is an expensive item. Therefore, it is unrealistic to say that there is competition.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: What about central heating?

Mr. Pike: I was going to mention that. Once someone has installed gas central heating, he is bound to that system for some time. Even if the boiler needs to be changed, the average person cannot suddenly say, "I have had enough of British Gas. I want to transfer to oil or coal." Therefore, in many respects, British Gas will continue to have a monopoly. It is right that we should put into the Bill and into primary legislation consumer protection.

We have now reached a stage where we can predict Ministers' replies to our debates. They say that we do not need to put provisions into primary legislation because what Opposition Members are seeking would be in the interests of British Gas, and would be done anyway. We disagree with the Government. We believe that the Bill's provisions must be strengthened to give consumers the safeguards we seek.

Amendment No. 7 states that a public gas supplier must "employ a sufficient number of qualified staff trained to an approporiate standard".
There is no reason for the Government not to accept that, but the Minister is almost certain to state that the public gas suppliers will employ a sufficient number of such staff. If he believes that, he should accept the amendment because it will not change the position. However, we believe that this provision should be written into the Bill to ensure that a sufficient number of trained staff are employed. It is important in dealing with such a highly volatile material as gas to have properly trained staff to ensure that work is properly carried out and that consumers are fully safeguarded. I see no reason why the Government should refuse to accept amendment No. 7.

Subsection (4)(b) in amendment No. 1 refers to "the payment of gas bills including guidance to domestic customers if they have difficulty in paying".
That is an extremely important provision. No doubt the Minister will say that British Gas plc will continue to publicise details of the codes of practice. We believe that this provision will ensure that the public gas suppliers will do that properly.

The Labour party has never pretended that, because British Gas is publicly owned, everything is perfect and there is no need for improvements. We have tried on a number of times to make improvements. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) pointed out that in 99 per cent. of cases it was a matter not of people deliberately refusing to pay their bills but of people not being able to afford to pay them and thereby having to make the difficult choice of whether to provide heating or food at the weekends. Often they are the people who are at least able to defend themselves and to understand what protection and facilities are available to assist them.

As we know, many people do not understand how to claim payments under the exceptionally severe weather regulations. Many people operated their heating systems at low levels during the very cold weather in February but they suddenly found that assistance was available if their heating bills were higher than they were a year ago. In many cases heating bills will not be higher because people deliberately turned down or turned off the heating because they were afraid that they could not meet their bills. Some people have paid the penalty and died from hypothermia. That is why protection must be clearly written into the Bill.

Subsection (4) (c) refers to
"the provision of special services for elderly and disabled persons".
We should ensure that privatised British Gas assists the elderly and disabled people. There should be no doubt about their position. The Minister may say that British Gas plc will undertake all these measures anyway and that, therefore, these provisions are not necessary. That is not satisfactory. If the Minister believes that, he should accept some of the Labour party's amendments. I believe that these are sensible, moderate amendments which only strengthen the position and try to give the public the protection to which the Labour party believes they are entitled.

Mr. Michael Cocks: The speech of the hon. Member for Swindon (Mr Coombs) was a parliamentary gem. He said that we were raising a bogy man, and he huffed and puffed and blew the matter up so large that in the end he frightened himself to death. He ended by pleading with the Minister to give him some assurances that he could take back to his constituency to satisfy the disadvantaged and the disabled so that they would not be frightened.

These amendments reveal the difference in philosophy between the two sides of the Chamber. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) said that we do not argue that the existing gas structure is beyond criticism. However, some flexibility exists. We know that if we get in touch with the gas authorities, we shall get some satisfaction in respect of the complaints that we raise.

Only this morning, like my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), I received a letter from a lady who said that she was being asked to pay £11 to have her meter emptied. It has not been emptied for 15 weeks and contained between £150 and £200. She was afraid of a burglary, because she was going on holiday and had already been burgled once. She is a 66-year-old pensioner and fosters a child for Mencap. I am quite sure that when I telephone the office of the chairman of the south-west gas board tomorrow discretion will be used and that something will be done about this case. Can we really believe that the use of such discretion will be extrapolated into the new situation that the Government are creating?

The Minister should think hard before rejecting these amendments, because they go to the heart of the matter.

[Mr. Michael Cocks]

It is not that the present gas structure is a large bureaucratic organisation, because it contains people who are not entirely wedded to the profit motive. We said in Committee that there was an inherent tension between the maximisation of profit and the rendering of a public service, and we are afraid that that will be eroded. I therefore hope that the Minister will give us some reassurance, and even set at rest the mind of the hon. Member for Swindon. This is an extremely important detailed human point.

Mr. Hardy: My right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) has made an important point. We are seeking to maintain the civilised and caring approach that exists in the gas industry. We want to see it continue, even though the pressure to maintain or enhance profit may become very strong.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) advanced a powerful case. He appeared in the most reasonable manner to be appealing to the Government just this once to drop their hitherto hard approach and to recognise that, although they are maintaining a pretence that they wish to stand aside from the economy, they are still sitting in the directors' box. Unfortunately, the referee, in the person of the director of Ofgas, has been given neither rules to follow nor an effective whistle to blow. We want his position to be important, if only to protect the people to whom my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South referred.

The last debate was sadly curtailed because of the guillotine. We did not even get a complete response from the Under-Secretary. I know that he would have replied very fully to that brief debate, but he was prevented by the guillotine — a form of political suicide that I find deplorable.

That debate was relevant to this one, because it was an expression of our concern for the hundreds of thousands of people who are in need. They are the sort of people whom the hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) may not have been thinking of when he said that they could easily switch from a gas cooker to an electric one. Such people cannot afford to buy another very expensive appliance simply because they are currently dissatisfied with one supplier. The hon. Gentleman may not think that it is particularly expansive, but thousands of the constituents of Opposition Members cannot afford to buy a different appliance. Thousands of people, indeed probably millions, are like that. They will not reap any benefit from privatisation. They cannot join the rush to make a great deal of money because they do not have money to accumulate or to buy shares, or capital to invest. They have problems of considerable intensity, which is why we have considerable sympathy with the arguments of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce).

I accept that the hon. Gentleman is a trifle more mechanistic in his approach to the needy, in seeking to establish the structures by which disconnections can be achieved. Our concern is to ensure that a proper code of practice exists, and that a caring element is engendered in the gas industry to prevent disconnections as often as possible. We are grateful that the hon. Gentlemn has taken part in the debate, unlike the other half of the alliance. The debate has continued for nearly six hours, yet no SDP Member has been present. This shows how greatly the SDP is concerned about the millions of people for whom we speak.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) expressed our concern for the needy. Their numbers are growing. The number of unemployed is substantial, and the figures that the Government produce are only a small part of the whole story. The number of elderly people is also substantial. The Government are well aware from our arguments in Committee during this particularly bitter winter how serious the problem is. Because the problem is serious and extensive, it is absolutely necessary to have a code of practice and for the director general to have a meaningful position. Unless the groundwork for rules and practices is laid down, the director general's position is nebulous.

If the Government do not go some way along the road which my hon. Friend advocated, no responsible person will wish to accept that important job. However, it can be important only if it is meaningful, and in the present circumstances without the proper code of practice the job may have the characteristics of cotton wool. Society has serious needs and we should not restrict ourselves simply to making money. The maintenance of a proper service is also essential.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: We have had a useful debate on a wide range of topics, some of which we considered in Committee. The Opposition do not have a monopoly of compassion and caring. I wholly understand, as do all hon. Members, the problem that our constituents occasionally face in relation to some of the matters that we have discussed. Therefore, the motivation to ensure the provision of care for the less well-off and those who are less well able to defend themselves is an objective that is certainly shared on both sides of the House.

We begin to part company on the best ways of achieving that. The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhynmey (Mr. Rowlands) adopts a more structured approach, as does the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), than exists at present. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked about the codes of practice. It is important to be clear precisely what they are, how they can be applied and how changes can take place. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) raised that point.

Clause 7 enables the Secretary of State to include conditions in the authorisation granted to a public gas supplier covering a wide range of matters. Condition 12 of the draft authorisation requires British Gas to publish codes of practice on the nature of the gas supply service available to tariff customers and on the matter which dominated the debate—the payment of bills. I accept that the codes of practice do not come into effect immediately on the authorisation, and that there is a gap after the passage of the Bill, but there will be plenty of time for them to be in place before British Gas plc comes into operation.

Condition 12 requires British Gas to consult the director general and the council in the event of a substantive revision to the codes of practice. I emphasise that it is a draft authorisation, and we have debated fully some of its provisions. We shall reflect on some of the points that have been raised about the final draft authorisation.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister says that he will reflect upon the matter. We have raised this issue almost from Second Reading. Our fundamental complaint about condition 12 is that paragraph 2 confines the process of consultation to the presentation of each code. Will the Minister give a firm commitment that that will be revised to include a provision about the substance of each code, not just its presentation? That has caused great offence.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman forgets that British Gas has made it clear that it will continue its present codes of practice. Those codes are clear, and I have heard no criticism in the House of how they operate. I have not been satisfied of the Opposition's case by the debate, but I shall continue to reflect on the authorisation. If the existing codes are continued, there may be a question of how the codes should operate. If there is a change in their operation, we must know what procedures will be used to deal with that.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: Throughout the debate, Ministers have quoted assurances given by British Gas. British Gas will have no more power than Her Majesty's Government to dictate to British Gas plc after privatisation unless the power is written into the statute.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I was about to respond to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon. The director general and the consumers council will play a role in the operation of the codes. The Opposition have overlooked that point. The council will wish to investigate any representations about standards of service, and if it seems to the director general that British Gas is falling short, he can modify the authorisation. I assure my hon. Friend that, in the event that the codes are not operated properly, the director general has the power to modify the authorisation. The new Gas Consumers Council will monitor the operation of the code of practice on the payment of bills, just as the existing council does.

That shows the fundamental difference between the two sides of the House. As my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon said, the Labour party wishes to overstructure the position and make the codes of practice over-rigid. It cannot be in the interests of British Gas, if it is to be successful, not to fulfil the undertakings that it has given.

We are concerned about the special needs of the elderly and disabled, as we said in Committee, and the BGC has said that it will continue free safety checks for the elderly. On the needs of the disabled, it is our intention that at least one member of the Gas Consumers Council should have experience of this sector. The code on this has worked successfully, although we can all give examples of where individual cases may have gone awry, and I have not heard any criticism from either side of the House that the code of practice has not worked satisfactorily.

We have an undertaking from the BGC that it will continue the codes, and there is an assurance that if it does not continue to operate those codes satisfactorily, the matter can be taken up by the Gas Consumers Council and by the director general, and modification of the code can be required. It is better to achieve proper standards in this way than by the overstructuring suggested by the amendments.

Mr. Rogers: Does not the Minister understand that in Committee we were attempting to tell him that what exists now is not necessarily what will exist after vesting day? He is still telling us that he has had assurances today from British Gas, but that is British Gas as a public company, responsible, through the Secretary of State, to Parliament. It is not British Gas plc, which will be a private company and responsible only to its shareholders — that is the critical difference. By introducing the amendments, we are not attempting to overstructure. We are anxious only to ensure that there will be a statutory basis for the protection of consumers after vesting day. The Minister must accept that any assurances given now are not binding on British Gas plc.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been listening to what I was saying. We are privatising British Gas, but with the same management. The hon. Gentleman is saying that that management's assurances are worthless.

Mr. Rogers: Absolutely.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I happen to disagree. It is a responsible management, and I believe that it will honour the undertakings that it has given. However, I have made it clear that if it fails to do so, and it falls short on other practices, it is open to the Gas Consumers Council to take up the matter in the event of complaints from consumers, and to report to the director general, who can initiate the modification procedure.

Amendments Nos. 14 and 15 are about procedure for modification. Again, we come to a fairly fundamental difference between the two sides of the House. Clause 23 deals with modification in circumstances where the public gas supplier consents to modifications being made. There have been criticisms of our procedures of reference, when there is not consent, to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, saying that it is too cumbersome and top-heavy. I do not think it is because it is the protector in cases of monopoly abuse. If modifications need to be made, this body, much more than the director general, can review the position not only of British Gas, but of monopoly measures more generally. The MMC has much more experience than the director general. This is, therefore, a reasonable way to approach the matter. First, there should be consultation. In the case of supplies to tariff customers the Monopolies and Mergers Commission route should be used, where agreement is not possible, or if the director general decides that an investigation is desirable. The director general may feel that it is best to use that body because it has the qualifications and the experience to investigate the matter. I accept that our approach is fundamentally different from that of the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme), but I hope that my hon. Friends will not support this amendment.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney also referred to safety and asked two questions specifically in the context of training. The first was whether the number of staff available will be adequate to deal with the responsibilities of British Gas in connection with emergencies, repairs and other safety matters. His second question related to staff qualifications. British Gas has always said that its level of recruitment will vary from year to year, according to the demands that are placed upon it. It cannot guarantee necessarily to employ the same number of staff each year to deal with the specific questions that were referred to by the hon. Gentleman. However, any changes that are made are introduced after consultation with the employees and their trade unions. I referred in Committee to the fact that in its privatisation report No. 6 British Gas made it clear that consultation will continue.

Failure by a public gas supplier to comply with the obligations placed upon it by paragraphs 1 to 4 of schedule 5 are enforceable by the director general under the clause 28 powers. Failure to prevent escapes of gas within 12 hours is a criminal offence under paragraph 13 of schedule 5. It will be necessary, therefore, for British Gas to maintain its level of recruitment and training in order to fulfil its obligations. An explicit duty of the kind proposed in the amendment is unnecessary.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney may believe that it will be worth while for him to pursue with the chairman of British Gas the particular instance that he quoted this evening, but I think that British Gas has a good training record. It has an annual recruitment policy and it provides formal training and practical experience for all of its recruits. This ensures that tasks that must be performed under schedule 5 to ensure safety are always performed by competent and experienced staff. British Gas has developed its training programmes on an entirely voluntary basis. There is no reason to suppose that after privatisation there will be any diminution in the British Gas Corporation's commitment to recrutiment and to training adequate members of staff to fulfil its obligations.

The hon. Member for Gordon dealt with disconnections in amendments Nos. 42 and 43. Disconnections are serious. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving the House another opportunity to discuss the problem. He knows that public gas suppliers, like the British Gas Corporation, will be under a statutory obligation to supply the vast majority of their domestic consumers. Customers already have 35 days in which to pay their bills before action to disconnect the supply is taken. It would be unfair, and could be economically damaging to the industry, to remove the ultimate sanction—I know that the hon. Gentleman is not going that far, but this is worth saying—of disconnection where statutory supply obligations arise. It is against that background that we must view disconnections.

The involvement of the courts could have two consequences. First, the customer's debt could be increasing during the time that the court action would take because obviously there will be an interval between the time of the reference to the courts and the time when the court examines and decides the case. Secondly, one could run the risk of a significant new burden being placed on the courts. Courts are already involved in a number of disconnection cases where entry for that purpose is refused. In those circumstances, a magistrate's warrant has to be obtained and before granting such a warrant he has to be satisfied that a right exists and that the requirements of the relevant enactment have been complied with. Therefore, that provides consumers with a valuable protection against wrongful disconnection. That element of protection does not go as far as the hon. Gentleman would seek, but he is going further than is necessary.

In condition 12 of the code of practice to which I have already referred British Gas is under an obligation to publish a code of practice on the payment of bills, including guidance to domestic consumers if they have difficulty in paying. We envisage that the new Gas Consumers Council will monitor the operation of that code in the same way that the National Gas Consumers Council does now. In the disconnection cases that I have had to handle in my constituency the role of the National Gas Consumers Council, which will continue, is a useful and helpful one. British Gas has publicly stated its commitment to the continuation of the code and it will follow its provisions and draw it to the attention of customers in difficulty before taking any decision to disconnect.

Therefore, the framework that we have provided in schedule 5 for the recovery of gas charges is reasonable and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will think about it in the light of what I have said and perhaps withdraw the amendment.

The House will realise that I share the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon. I have sympathy with the motivation behind almost all the amendments in making sure that the less well-off consumer and the consumer less well able to stand up for his own interests is properly protected. In the light of the commitments from British Gas that there will be codes of practice and that any abuse of them can be monitored and investigated by the new Gas Consumers Council, and ultimately that the director can introduce a modification if the codes of practice are not seen to work, our approach is the better one and does not need to be structured in the way that the amendments have suggested.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Michael Neubert and
Mr. Peter Lloyd.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): I beg to move, amendment No. 2, in page 6, line 12, at end insert—

'(d) conditions requiring the public gas supplier to encourage the efficient use by consumers of gas supplied through pipes, by means of advocacy, advice, and, where economic, the provision of loans for energy efficiency investments;'.

Mr. Speaker: With this we shall take amendment No. 6, in page 8, line 27, Clause 9 at end insert—

'(aa) to promote the efficient use by consumers of gas supplied through pipes;'.

Mr. Lloyd: I begin by thanking all those who served on the Select Committee on Energy which produced the first report for 1985-86 on the regulation of the gas industry. I thank those hon. Members who helped to conduct the Select Committee inquiry and who served as members of the Standing Committee. I think that energy knows no greater devotion than that.

So anxious were the Government to make progress that the sittings of the Standing Committee began before the Select Comitee had completed its inquiry and reported to the House. That complicated, but did not exactly thwart, our proceedings. It would have been tidier and more logical—always desirable criteria—if our deliberations in Committee had followed the publication of the Select Committee's report and, perhaps even more importantly, the publication of the government's reply. None the less, my hon. Friends the Members for Rochford (Dr. Clark) and for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), who were well supported by the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse), who referred to my report at one stage as his bible and was described as the Select Committee's shop steward in Committee, ensured that the Select Committee's views were heard regularly.

As always, if I judge correctly from the 1,338 columns of Hansard in Committee, though those views were heard with attention and courtesy—we always expect no less from my right hon. and hon. Friends who sit on the Treasury Bench—for the most part the trumpets were sounded in vain, which is not an unusual state of affairs. I say "for the most part" because the Committee welcomed the evidence that the Government were prepared to accept a number of the Select Committee's principal recommendations, even though it was not until 1,164 columns of debate had been printed in Hansard that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Energy announced, whether with pride or with shame— it is difficult to discern which—that a few pieces of plaster had been knocked off the walls of Jericho.

The purpose of the amendments is to knock off a few more pieces of plaster. We have no unreasonable ambitions to cause the walls to collapse. Indeed, we consider—at least, some of us do—that the walls are rather good, or perhaps that the city inside is worth defending. If the city of privatisation is to be defended, it might as well be defended properly. The amendments are concerned primarily with the concept of the efficient use of energy. That was described as a common aim of the Select Committee and of the Department of Energy. We are all against sin and all for energy efficiency. We are aware that energy efficiency features in many of our reports and many of the reports that are produced by the Department, and are the subject of favourable comment in the press. We have endeavoured to obtain by the amendments a somewhat clearer and more formal recognition of the subjective.

The Select Committee recommendations are highly relevant. Paragraph 65 concluded that the "national case for promoting energy efficiency must . . . be one of the determining principles in setting the statutory framework for the regulatory authority which will control the new private-sector corporation."

and that it was

"'Quite inconceivable' that the energy efficiency would not be 'built into' the consideration of the regulatory authority."

The purpose of the amendments is to achieve just that little bit more building in. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State stated in Committee that when regulation is appropriate it should be clear, strong and firm. The Select Committee certainly believes that this is such a case and that the Government's declared policy could therefore be reinforced without creating the unnecessary bureaucracy and constraint so properly feared in all parts of the House.

The Government's response, however, in Cmnd. 9759, was that "the imposition on the energy supply industries of a statutory duty . . . would add little to the industries' already extensive energy efficiency activities."

It continued:

"In returning British Gas to the private sector, the Government would not want to impose upon it unnecessary statutory obligations which go beyond those that apply to normal Companies Act companies. The Gas Bill places upon the Director a duty to carry out his functions in such a way as to promote the efficient use of gas."

The comments of the Select Committee, which I certainly share, are that it is rather strange to describe the new company as a normal Companies Act company. Whatever else it may be—and doubtless it will be many things—it is certainly not that.

Secondly, the statement that the director general needs clear, relevant and appropriate powers certainly applies in this case. We wish to stress that. And when regulation is appropriate it should be clear, strong and firm, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State suggested.

Where there are strong reasons for stating and achieving such an objective, the duty of the Director General of Gas Supply should, in our judgment, be matched by clear-cut, relevant and appropriate powers defined in the statute. In our view, the director general cannot achieve that objective unless the corporation has a complementary statutory obligation. The prize is large, the stakes are modest and the risk of failure is small. If the nettle of indifference is firmly grasped, the objective can certainly be achieved.

One more question—is it impractical? We do not think so. The Association for the Conservation of Energy probably provides the most relevant remarks in this context. Commenting in its memorandum to the Select Committee on the situation in California, which is similar in area and population to the United Kingdom with perhaps an even larger gross national product, the association said that "the utilities are the best vehicle available to organise and implement policies promoting energy efficiency, particularly in the domestic market. Elsewhere in the United States, Public Utility Commissions have insisted upon the adoption and publication by the utilities of annual programmes of conversation investment, and equally regular reports of their associated achievements."

That seemed to me to be a very clear and decisive comment on the whole area of regulation and what can and cannot be done.

If energy wastage in the United Kingdom is, as we are informed and as the Government admit—I do not think that there is any dispute about the amount—about £7 billion, and if the proportion wasted in houses is about £2 billion, there is plenty of room for what might be described as a little policy overkill. That, I think, is all that can be said of these two amendments.

10.15 pm

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): One of the outstanding features of the work of the Select Committee on Energy has been the recognition of the Secretary of State's enthusiasm for energy efficiency. We have accorded to the present Secretary of State not only our fullest support, but, out of step with the normal practice of criticism, we have underlined our enthusiasm for his influence in this area through the work of the Energy Efficiency Office. It is in that spirit that we should be seeking to gain the support of the Secretary of State in what is an interesting amendment but, nevertheless, an essential one.

Of course, British Gas plc may well say that these matters are self-evident. It may say that it can give advice about energy efficiency and that it will be the best advocate in the United Kingdom for the proper use of what it supplies. It may say, "Of course we will provide the right investment programme to meet the objectives that the amendment appears to have". That is not the point. We do not yet know what the animal will be like.

The present management will certainly, for a short time, project the standards and the purposes of British Gas. We are proud of British Gas, but some years will pass, new management will take over, and it is not without experience in the House that we are able to say that often new policies provide different economies which are sometimes harmful to essential parts of an industry.

We have seen that happen in the private sector on many occasions, often in research and development. The programme of investment diminishes if there are serious strictures on the economy in a particular financial year. Therefore, we are saying that the Secretary of State is not taking on board more than he advocates himself in accepting this set of amendments. Certainly we would like to see the provision of loans for energy efficiency investment.

It is clear that in the domestic and commercial sector, especially the latter, we have some reluctance to deal with energy efficiency. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) referred to the enormous losses involved in the use of gas in spite of the advocacy of British Gas and its present chairman. Therefore, there is much to be done.

For the sake of brevity I shall underline what the Chairman of the Select Committee has said. The proposals that have been put before the Secretary of State in our recent report make it abundantly clear that we are keen to have the Government take on board what is good common sense and certainly good national housekeeping. We have to do much to conserve our energy resources and the response from the Government hitherto has not been encouraging. We are puzzled that the Secretary of State has an abundance of enthusiasm for his Energy Efficiency Office, yet somehow there is less response to our report. We have spent many hours and considered the submissions of many witnesses over a long period of time. Therefore, I suggest that it would be helpful to the House if the Secretary of State responded with more enthusiasm.

This is not an addition to the structure of the Bill, to which the Minister referred earlier, but a few words supportive of the objective which is that it is in the national interest to support the resources that we have in such a way that the demand for energy and the supply of it is harmonised with conservation, efficiency and the proper use of British Gas when it is privatised. That objective was one of the aims of the Standing Committee, because that matter was brought to its attention. It is one of the objectives of the Select Committee on Energy, conforming with the majority opinion in the country.

Mr. Rost: It gives me great pleasure to support the amendment so ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), and spoken to by the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter).

The House may not be aware that this appears to be the first occasion, at least in my short lifetime in the House, when a Select Committee has gone to great lengths to have an input in legislation as it proceeds through the House, first, by producing a report, which appeared just as the legislation was going into Committee, and, secondly, by adopting the rather unusual procedure of tabling amendments across party lines on behalf of the Committee to support certain points which we as a Select Committee felt strongly should be in the legislation. We recommended in our report that they should be included.

My main concern, in supporting the amendments promoting energy efficiency, is the consumer, because in the end it is the consumer who suffers if he is not given the best advice, guidance and support. British Gas is in a unique position to help to promote greater energy efficiency, because it has direct access to the consumer through regular billing, meter reading and correspondence. It also has the management and staff infrastructure to provide that advice and service.

Secondly, the utility is in a unique position to promote energy efficiency because it has exceptional marketing skills. British Gas can promote energy efficiency far more aggressively and effectively, in the interests of its consumers, because of that marketing ability. Like other members of the Select Committee, I have had opportunities to study the utilities in other parts of the world, particularly North America, where the gas utilities are private enterprise utilities. Despite that, or perhaps because of that, they have a statutory obligation to demonstrate that least cost resource acquisition of gas is applied. They also have an obligation to promote energy efficiency in the interests of their customers, as well as to apply demand management. Where it is more cost-effective to invest in greater energy efficiency rather than to persuade customers to consume more wastefully, they have an obligation to invest on the demand management side rather than expand on the supply side.

We believed, in our Select Committee investigation, that there should be a similar obligation on British Gas and that it would not be unnecessarily cumbersome or involve bureaucratic red tape to build into the legislation a general directive, an obligation that British Gas should promote energy efficiency. Although we acknowledge, as I certainly do, that British Gas already does a great deal —no doubt my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will reply along those lines, saying that it makes great efforts—I believe that no harm would be done in writing that obligation into legislation to ensure that that effort is maintained and, indeed, increased.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Havant ably moved the amendment, he referred to evidence that we received in the Select Committee during our inquiry into the Energy Efficiency Office. We asked the Director-General of the Energy Efficiency Office whether more could be done to promote energy efficiency by the energy utilities—gas and electricity. He said that in his view it was inconceivable that energy efficiency would not be built in to the consideration of the regulatory authority for British Gas. However, it seems that it is conceivable, because the Government have not done that. The vague references in clause 4 are not an adequate substitute for a more formal commitment in legislation.

I believe that there should be a general obligation on British Gas to promote the efficient use of gas. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should set British Gas annual guideline targets, and British Gas should report annually to the Director-General of Gas Supplies on its achievements in increasing energy efficiency with respect to tariffs and the contract market.

My right hon. Friend the Minister may suggest that it would be wrong and unfair to impose that obligation on British Gas because no such obligation has been imposed on the electricity industry. I would reply that, in that case, such an obligation should be imposed on the electricity industry as well. Two wrongs do not necessarily make a right. We have an opportunity to make at least a start, and I hope that we shall do so.

Mr. Lofthouse: As the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) has said, this is an unique occasion. I believe that it is the only time amendments to major legislation have been made through a Select Committee. I was delighted to hear the Select Committee's Chairman, the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), the hon. Member for Erewash and my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter). I feel like a striker on a football field who has been running up and down a football field by himself for a few weeks waiting for the support players behind him to give him the ball to feed into the net. I regret the absence of many of the hon. Members who put their names to the amendments. I had hoped that they would be here to give support. I hope that they will vote later.

Much hard work within a short period went into producing the Select Committee's report with a view to assisting the deliberations of the Standing Committee. Unfortunately, the Government have not taken much notice of the Select Committee'a report. There may have been a hiccough here and a sneeze there but generally they have taken little notice of the recommendations. Ministers must show that they have taken some notice of them.

The weekend press told us—I do not know whether it was right or wrong—of the contempt of the Secretary of State for the Back Benchers on the Committees. The right hon. Gentleman does not want to hear that, because he is not listening. My colleagues on the Select Committee have probably, therefore, been wasting their time. The Bill was presented in indecent haste, without a White Paper. Hon. Members were given no time to digest it, and that arrogance is still with us.

I shall not go over the ground I covered in Standing Committee except to refer to the debate on Amendment No. 158, which I had the privilege of moving, which was similar to the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Havant in Select Committee. There is hardly any difference at all. I draw the attention of the House to cols. 471-2, 741-3, 790-2 and 873-5 of the Official Report of Standing Committee F. I do not wish to take too long, so it is better if I leave it there.

10.30 pm

For very small amounts of money we could have further conservation. In fact, many local authorities throughout the country, particularly in London, carry out the improvement and insulation of properties at an average cost of £600 per job. As a result, the amount of electricity burnt has been decreased, from about 8,900 kW/hours to about 4,500—a saving of nearly 50 per cent. One can appreciate the financial savings that means to the lower paid and the unemployed. If the private sector had a statutory obligation to provide assistance for such insulation, the saving to the country in terms of gas supply and the saving for those who can ill afford to pay would be great.

No hon. Member, least of all the Secretary of State or his Ministers, can have any real confidence that under a newly privatised British Gas the motive will be anything other than pure and simple profit. I doubt whether the consumer will be foremost in the minds of those who hope to buy parts of British Gas. It will simply be profit. I even doubt whether the motivation that now exists within the BGC will continue. These private companies should have a statutory obligation to provide finance to enable gas to be saved and prices to be cut.

I hope that the Government will listen to the Select Committee. At present there are many wasted hours. By that I mean that on many occasions people are kept on their toes because they know that they may have to face the Select Committee, but I can recall few occasions on which the recommendations of a Select Committee have been taken on board by the Government.

Mr. Leadbitter: My hon. Friend referred to columns 471-2 and others of the Official Report of the Standing Committee, and also said that a similar amendment was considered by the Committee. Am I correct in thinking that some Conservative Members, who have appended their names to this amendment, did not vote for that similar amendment in Committee?

Mr. Lofthouse: It is worse that that, because they failed to vote for the amendment when I, as their shop steward, appealed to them to do so.

Mr. Bruce: I support the amendment tabled by the Select Committee. It is weaker than I would have wished, but I presume that that is to maximise the breadth of support for it, and to enable the Government to accept it, as I hope that they will.

I should point out that the phrase "all-party Select Committee" is used rather freely as only two of the nine parties in the House are represented on it. However, I do not wish to detract from the good job that it did on the report, which we had before us at the start of the Standing Committee and on which most hon. Members who were trying to work effectively drew heavily. Regrettably, Ministers did not, and although they paid tribute to the Select Committee's work, so far they have accepted few of its recommendations. I hope that in this last gasp they will put the record straight on that.

The hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) who was not a member of the Standing Committee, used the expression "least cost resource". Those who were members of it will recall that I proposed an amendment to persuade the Government that least cost resource should apply when determining the acquisition of new supplies. Regrettably, they were unwilling to take that point on board. I, too, quoted from the useful documents produced by the Association for the Conservation of Energy called "Lessons from America", especially from number five. I commend the document to hon. Members who are interested in the matter because it draws heavily on the American example, and seeks to highlight some of the points against which the Government have argued.

Mr. Rost: I would hate the House or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to get the impression that my remarks were based on second-hand material from the Association for the Conservation of Energy, however much I respect its research. In recent years, some hon. Members have had the opportunity of visiting utilities in America, and of seeing them at first hand. That was the basis of my argument.

Mr. Bruce: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had made that plain. I hope to do the same this summer. My only regret is that I must do so after, rather than before, the Standing Committee. I accept his point, but take it that he is not contradicting the evidence, and that he has come to the same conclusion as the Association for the Conservation of Energy.

Conservation is rightly described by the ACE as the fifth fuel, and it should be treated in that vein. In other words when one considers the ways of supplying energy in future, we should not simply look at how to acquire new supplies, but should compare the cost of acquiring new supplies with the cost of investing in conservation, which is the point about least cost resource. If it is demonstrated that the investment in conservation would release more for less investment, that is the right avenue to follow and is better than investing in new sources of supply in advance of need. In the long run we shall always need those supplies, but we do not need always to address ourselves to acquiring those supplies.

The North of Scotland hydro-electric board, for example, is laying a cable across Skye to the Western Isles to provide electricity there. It would make sense to see whether that is the best investment, or whether it is better both for consumers and the board to invest in energy efficiency measures to ensure that the people there get the same level of comfort at a similar cost, simply by using the energy from existing supplies more efficiently.

That is a simple example of the sort of thing that should be considered. There is a whole range of such examples, on which any hon. Member could draw. I urge the Government to recognise that a modest amendment, such as this, which simply exorts British Gas to put energy efficiency as a specific requirement on its list of priorities, is the least that they could accept. Given the all-party basis on which the amendment has been endorsed, I hope that the Minister will accept it.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): As a member of the Select Committee on Energy, may I add my comments to those of the Committee's Chairman and other members. I join in requesting the Secretary of State to accept the amendments in the spirit in which they were tabled—that it would be in the best interests of all consumers, industrial and domestic, to encourage efficiency in the use of gas supplies. Everyone knows the Labour party's opposition to the Bill, but if we must have privatisation, we believe that the Bill must contain provisions for efficiency, to ensure that the gas supplied is used to the best advantage. Gas is used in glass making and other large industries, so it is important that it is used as efficiently as possible.

We must ensure that advice is given to domestic consumers on the best use of gas. The amendments also suggest that where efficiency requires investment, loans should be made available to consumers. That would be in the interests of British Gas, the consumers and the country. Against that background, I hope that the Secretary of State will accept the amendments.

One hon. Member called the amendments modest. Perhaps they are modest, inasmuch as they have been tempered to ensure that they do not breach the spirit of the Bill. I plead with the Secretary of State to accept the amendments and include those provisions in the Bill, because they will benefit the efficient use of the gas supplied to consumers.

Mr. Rowlands: The Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen support wholeheartedly the amendments that were moved by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd). I do not reveal any secrets when I say that during 156 hours of debate in Committee one approaches amendments with varying degrees of commitment and belief. However, as we considered this issue, I became more convinced of the special role that the public utilities could play in energy efficiency and conservation.

Take the example of British Gas plc. It will purchase every cubic foot of gas that comes from the North sea. British Gas plc will control the entire national gas system which delivers that gas to the homes of more than 16 million customers. It will control between 60 per cent. and 70 per cent. of the sales of gas appliances. Therefore, British Gas plc will be part of the commanding heights of the nation's energy resources and their use. Given that incredible position—this is not a normal company, as the hon. Gentleman said—and the huge and specific responsibilities, as well as privileges, that will be placed upon British Gas, it is reasonable for us to expect British Gas to accept the duties that the amendments seek to place upon it.

It is complacent now, as it was in Committee, to make the observation that BGC already does much in a voluntary capacity. By adopting, a little more than it does now, the arguments about conservation, efficiency and a balance between conservation and energy efficiency versus investment in new development, it could have a tremendous impact on depletion policy in the North sea and on the cost of gas to the customer.

10.45 pm

This is not a fanciful argument to make, as members of the Select Committee and others who speak from experience have shown. Reports by the Association for the Conservation of Energy have shown that in America, from Texas to California, major public utilities in that essentially private enterprise economy, under regulation from the Public Utilities Commission, have been the leaders in promoting energy efficiency to individual householders, industry and commerce. The amendment does not cut across private enterprise, commercial practice and capitalism. In the most private enterprise society, a combination of regulation and duties is placed upon the public utilities to develop energy conservation.

The argument applies to all parties, as the support given to it by all members of the Select Committee on Energy shows. Therefore, the Minister will have to produce much better justification than he did in Committee. Among other things, he has to justify why, of the 14 conditions enforced on the 25-year private monopoly licence that the Government want to give British Gas plc, not one deals with energy conservation and efficiency. That shows the contempt and lack of interest that Ministers have shown towards conservation and the role that public utilities should play in it.

I see the Secretary of State shake his head. I point out to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy, that his Committee has been treated with the contempt that the Secretary of State showed to the Standing Committee. He spoke for about four or five minutes in 156 hours, and spent the rest of his time in perpetual motion talking as he is again this evening.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): Shame.

Mr. Rowlands: It is a shame. The right hon. Gentleman has shown unbelievable behaviour. He was not even listening when my right hon. Friend the Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) made a number of basic points. It is time to tell the Secretary of State that his behaviour has not been up to the standard that one expects of a Secretary of State. The issues raised by the hon. Member for Havant, and all members of the Select Committee, show that the Government should heed such widespread requests and support the principle of these amendments.

Mr. David Hunt: It is sad that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), having made a pretence of welcoming cross-party support for the amendments, should then make a disgraceful attack on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who has taken every possible trouble to produce careful legislation to ensure that when privatisation takes place it is a major success story both for the Government and for the nation. It is inappropriate for the hon. Gentleman to make such comments. Throughout most of the Report debates today the hon. Gentleman has had behind him no more hon. Members than he had behind him in Committee. One would have thought that on such a major and important Bill the Labour party would have produced more than 10 Back Benchers for most of today's proceedings.

The hon. Gentleman should not have started this argument. He has lowered the standard of this debate by making such a disgraceful attack upon my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. I ask him to turn away from partisan arguments and return to the position from which he started.

The hon. Gentleman began reasonably well, by paying tribute to the all-party support for energy efficiency. These amendments deal with matters which the Government believe to be of great importance. My right hon. Friend has designated 1986 as Energy Efficiency Year. He and my right hon. and hon. Friends are making unprecedented efforts to spread the word about energy efficiency and about the benefits that can be reaped by all sectors of the community.

At breakfast specials, more than 16,000 top executives have listened to the energy efficiency message. This morning I addressed 400 top executives in Nottingham. That followed my right hon. Friend's addresses to more than 2,000 top executives in Solihull and London in the new round of Monergy breakfast specials.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) paid tribute to the work of his Select Committee. I join him in congratulating the members of his Select Committee, and I congratulate him on his leadership of the Committee and on the extent and depth of the investigations that were conducted by the Select Committee. It has been of enormous help to many hon. Members on both sides of the House to have the Select Committee's report on the regulation of the gas industry, and its report on energy efficiency policy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant referred to the £7 billion of energy that is being wasted. It is a national scandal. As a conservative estimate, that is 20 per cent. of our total energy bill of £35 billion. His Committee was right to highlight the appalling waste of £2 billion by the domestic sector and to report that it is the most deserving of immediate attention. However, I hope my hon. Friend realises that this Government have done more than any other Government have done since the war to promote the cause of energy efficiency.

I ask my hon. Friend to recognise that the Government's commitment in the Bill to energy efficiency has been followed through by placing upon the Secretary of State and the director general a duty to exercise their functions in a manner that is best calculated to promote the efficient use of gas by consumers who are supplied with gas through pipes. This duty will stand alongside the others in clause 4. It will give to the director general and the Secretary of State general guidelines about the way in which they should exercise their functions.

The director general will have to bear this duty in mind when exercising all his functions. However, we imagine that he will want to lay emphasis on this duty in relation to his other functions under the Bill, under which he is obliged to give assistance and advice to consumers. He will also wish to give his support to the tremendous activities that are undertaken by British Gas to ensure that its customers use gas efficiently, both in their own interests and in the interests of the British Gas in order to secure the long-term future of its markets?

I do not think that the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) did justice to his hon. Friends on both the Select Committee and the Standing Committee. He made some deprecatory comments about their contribution to the work of the Standing Committee. He said that he often felt that he was standing by himself. However, my hon. Friends the Members for Rochford (Dr. Clark) and for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) made a considerable contribution to the work of the Standing Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Southgate moved a very important amendment relating to competition. He ensured that the Government were made aware of the important and decisive views of the Select Committee on that subject. It was the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford who said that the BGC had nothing much to brag about on energy efficiency. That rather runs contrary to the belief of other members of the Select Committee that British Gas did make a great contribution. My hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) made a point about that just a few moments ago.

British Gas told the Select Committee in clear terms exactly what its contribution was to energy efficiency and it gave examples of how it was helping domestic consumers to use their energy efficiently. It promotes energy efficiency through a number of services and schemes—the BGC school of fuel management; the BGC technical consultancy services; the gas energy management awards for industry and commerce; the designs for energy management; the energy management competition; support for energy managers generally; support for the Energy Efficiency Office showroom advice experiment and the building centre energy advice centre. It has also done much to promote energy education in schools, and it explained to the Select Committee that its proper role was to develop and promote energy efficient practice and to educate customers about it.

Mr. Lofthouse: The hon. Gentleman has been telling the House of the Government's record on energy efficiency and conservation. Does he agree that the Government have cut the money available for insulation? Indeed, in real terms the money available now is only 58 per cent. of that available in 1979-80.

Mr. Hunt: That is not correct. If the hon. Gentleman looks carefully at the figures he will see that there is a history of underspend on that scheme. He will also recognise that we have debated that many times in the House, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has not just allocated what he believes is sufficient money to meet the need this year, but has said that when it comes to additional bids he will bear in mind that we are in Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Leadbitter: The hon. Gentleman referred to clause 4 in an attempt to persuade the House of Commons that that supports energy efficiency. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has not read the amendment. Clause 4 addresses itself specifically to those authorised to supply gas. The amendments are concerned with the consumers of gas. That is an important point for him to bear in mind. Why are we chewing over four lines tonight when they could be put into the Bill and forgotten about?

Mr. Hunt: I know that the hon. Gentleman feels strongly about the issue, but it is not as simple as he has sought to suggest. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said that he could not find it in the authorisation. It is in the primary legislation.

Clause 4 is an important clause. It imposes the clear duty

"to promote efficiency and economy . . . and the efficient use of gas supplied through pipes".

We are talking about duties on the public gas supplier. In seeking to challenge me on that the hon. Gentleman is talking about the customer or consumer, and that is the relevance of the amendment. But he should recognise the clear obligation that is on the director general, and if he looks elsewhere in the Bill he will see that the director general has obligations, as I have already said, to the consumers, and that is an easy way to explain what I believe is an effective duty already there.

In that context let me examine the wording of the amendment. I appreciate the way in which the hon. Gentleman paid tribute to my right hon. Friend and his tremendous enthusiasm to promote the cause of energy efficiency, which receives considerable all-party support. I recognise that my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash has also paid tribute to my right hon. Friend on many occasions. I equally recognise that my hon. Friend has carried out considerable research into this question.

I must tell the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) that the Select Committee recognised that initiatives taken by energy utilities in the United States to reduce energy consumption were not necessarily appropriate in the United Kingdom. Had the hon. Gentleman explored further he would have reached that conclusion. He now has to make his decision before he sees at first hand the relevance of that.

The Association for the Conservation of Energy has a good record in urging Governments to take up the cause of fuel efficiency. I pay tribute to that association, but in this context—I shall explain why—the amendment will not assist.

I have examined the BGC's record. The amendment seeks to single out British Gas for this obligation. I do not know whether my hon. Friends and Opposition Members want to place a similar obligation on the National Coal Board, the electricity industry or the oil companies. If they do not, why? If they do, they must recognise that even if I do not accept their arguments they have an unfair approach to the problem. It would be far better to deal with the problem under primary legislation and by imposing that duty on all utilities and energy corporations. I do not accept that such a duty should be placed on them, but surely it is more logical to impose a duty generally than to single out British Gas, which has a tremendous record.

As the Minister responsible for energy efficiency, I have had tremendous support from British Gas in the energy efficiency campaign. I hope the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) recognises that one has to be careful about putting duties in legislation, if by doing that one complicates the situation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant made it clear that he would not support the amendment if he thought it would do other than present firm and strong words in the right direction. He has said that forcefully. The amendment would impose a bureaucratic nightmare on the industry, which deserves clear, simple wording in legislation. By singling out British Gas, and by imposing this obligation on British Gas, the amendment would create a legislative minefield. It would be an invitation to all potential litigators to single out a corporation which had done a tremendous amount for energy efficiency to complicate matters and to stop the legitimate move towards energy efficiency which is gathering pace.

The British Gas Corporation is extremely enthusiastic about energy efficiency. Why do my hon. Friends think of supporting an amendment which would make ours a land more fit for lawyers than for people who believe in energy efficiency? I ask my hon. Friends to recognise that my right hon. Friend's massive monetary campaign, already successful, represents a better path to achieve our common objective—energy efficiency.

When hon. Members come to consider the need to promote energy efficiency, they will recognise that it is not easily accomplished by an amendment which is so complicated. If they wish to press ahead with the objective which we all share, I hope that it will not be by creating an unnecessarily bureaucratic system of control, as proposed in the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Gerald Malone and
Mr. Peter Lloyd.

Question accordingly negatived.

11.15 pm

Mr. Ian Lloyd: I beg to move Amendment No. 3, in page 6, line 12, at end insert

'(e) conditions requiring the public gas supplier to publish, annually, audited accounts showing separately the profits arising from sales of gas subject to maximum price regulation, which accounts shall be certified by the Director as showing the real costs and revenues ascribable to those activities of the supplier.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 4, in page 6, line 28, at end insert—

'(c) to comply with any direction given by the Director as to the manner in which the accounts of the public gas supplier are to be prepared and published; and as to the formulation of indicators of standards of service to be published with such accounts.'.

Mr. Lloyd: Before I come to the two amendments I should like to say how much I appreciate the tribute by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary to me and my Committee. I would do very little without my Committee. There is an inescapable tension between any Select Committee and Government at any time if both are doing their jobs properly. In my judgment that tension is part of the value of the system, and if it were to disappear we would lose something. Governments must govern and they must get it right, one hopes, 95 per cent. of the time. Select Committees must give second opinions and, if they are doing their work properly, perhaps one time in 20 they will be right. Perhaps, if it is a very good Committee, that ratio may well improve.

I should like to refer to a phrase used by the right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place. He said that the Select Committee was treated with contempt. I must say that I have never, at any time, experienced any contempt from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or any of his hon. Friends and other Ministers from the Department of Energy. Indeed, if ever I thought my Committee was treated with contempt the speech I would make in this House would be very different from the one that I made earlier and that I propose to make now. Indeed, the compulsion and immediacy of Government, as experienced by any Government from time to time, could give rise to what Shelley referred to in "Ozymandias", king of kings, as the "sneer of cold command". Those at the other end of Government policy sometimes misinterpret what is an unavoidable and necessary act of policy as the "sneer of cold command".

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and all his predecessors have always gone to considerable lengths to ensure that the Committee, at least occasionally, feels that its points and arguments contribute to the formation of energy policy in this country. Naturally, we hope, as all Select Committees hope, that that ratio will be improved and that we shall make a more valuable input into the formation of policy; but contempt, no.

Mr. Orme: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman, as the distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy, is saying. As Chairman, he is lucky in view of the way in which the Secretary of State for Energy dealt with the Select Committee on Environment over the weekend. That is a different matter. He talked about Back-Bench Members who happened to be members of the Committee not knowing what they were talking about. I notice that the response to the hon. Gentleman's Committee was not the same. However, we have a right to refer to the Secretary of State's response to the Select Committee on Environment, which is not directly related to his Department, but was dealing with Sellafield. The response in that case was entirely different.

Mr. Lloyd: I note the right hon. Gentleman's comment. It is not for me to comment on other Select Committees or their fate over the weekend. That Committee has also entered into an area of great controversy, and inevitably, in some measure, the same problems arise. I think that it is true to say that while our system provides that the Executive is drawn from the House, I do not see that there will ever be a completely satisfactory solution to the problem. We must try to get the best out of both systems, recognising that there is an inherent and unavoidable conflict simply because of our constitutional practice and procedure.

No preamble to the amendments is necessary. We move here into the arcane area of mystery known as accounting. The question that the amendments imply is: how accurate, relevant and informative can the accounts of the new company be? How completely can they be made to disclose what is happening without in any way damaging the operating efficiency of the concern? I regard that as the common objective of the House.

Our arguments are set out in our report under the heading "The 'X' factor", in paragraphs 30 to 35. I shall not bore the House by reading them all, as I am sure that every hon. Member who is here will have had the chance to look at them. We recommend "that Condition 2 of the draft Authorisation be amended to require that British Gas should publish, annually, the profits that arise from sales in the regulated tariff market".

That proposal lies at the heart of our amendment. In the Government's reply, the arguments against that are, essentially, first, that the director general already has the information, and, secondly, that he has the discretion to publish it. However, the key objection that the Government have put forward to our proposal is in paragraph 54 of their reply, where they conclude:

"Any requirement to publish detailed profit figures must be compatible with the nature of the business."

I think that everyone will accept that.

"The nature of the integrated gas supply business means that it is not possible to associate in a rigorous way specific costs to individual sectors of the market."

I am in slightly less than total agreement with that conclusion. The Government continue:

"The objective accuracy of separate profit figures for tariff and contract sectors is not sufficient for regulation to require audited published accounts."

In that context, it seems to me that whatever difficulty one may experience in allocating costs, there is seldom any real difficulty in allocating revenues. Even if one has a partial allocation—less than satisfactory, but certainly better than a global aggregation or agglomeration of figures—that will reveal some information that will be valuable.

In our judgment, it is essential that the public should have great confidence in the integrity of the accounts of the new corporation. The amendment is significant, but not unduly ambitious. It merely calls for an honest effort by all parties to produce fair, reasonable and informative figures. I do not think that anyone can object to that. The objective, especially of amendment No. 4, is that, in the accounts of British Gas, there should not only be no possibility of concealing what might be described as energy accounting skulduggery — we are all familiar with what that can mean—but it should be seen by the public at large, and indeed by the experts who study those figures with great assiduity, and burn the midnight oil in so doing, that no such concealment has been attempted, taken place or indeed, in a near ideal world, was ever likely.

Mr. Leadbitter: I hope that, before the guillotine falls and we all leave this place, harmed and hurt, the Minister will resolve not to create an international crisis, as his colleague the Under-Secretary of State tried to do with the last group of amendments. I thought, on listening to the hon. Gentleman, that the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries was going to call an emergency meeting and that the lawyers were sharpening their knives for another feast. Frightening questions of litigation were raised and the great shadow of a new bureaucracy loomed — all over four lines of a simple common-sense amendment.

At this time of night, hon. Members sitting here, or, in my case, standing — I do not know for how long because I am beginning to enjoy myself — want the Minister of State to make a response that differs from the theatricals of the Under-Secretary of State. Interesting though the hon. Gentleman's speech was, it was irrelevant. The Labour amendments provided for nothing less than what the hon. Gentleman said would be expected of good private enterprise. However, in this and in the previous group of amendments, we are not dealing with privatisation. There is no such thing as "privatisation" here. That is a cannibalisation and a prostitution of the word. We have here a private monopoly.

As a state monopoly, British Gas is accountable to Parliament. It prepares accounts. All those people interested in its affairs who send letters to the board receive not only letters of courtesy and explanation but an expensively drawn-up annual report. We have learnt a great deal from that close working relationship, which has been valued in the House.

We are creating a new animal. For a moment, there will be a honeymoon. The chairman will be there, unlike Lord King, who does not care who owns the shop so long as he manages it. The present chairman of British Gas has fought hard for the company, because he believes in it. The Government wanted to fragment British Gas. They wanted to get rid of the shop window dressing which told all the consumers how wonderful British Gas was. The chairman won his battle, but the outright obduracy of the Government prevailed. They said, "We cannot get our way on fragmentation, so we shall get rid of the lot." Once "the lot" is gone and parliamentary accountability is diminished, no hon. Member, no Secretary of State and no Prime Minister can give an undertaking that the new private monopoly will do what the Government want. The new company will be accountable to its shareholders. The priorities in energy use may be put at risk if there are any economic strictures in a particular year.

I recall how, under another Administration, a valuable piece of investment which was of paramount importance to the United Kingdom in the world of transport was brought to an end in one weekend because of the plea that economies had to be made.

These amendments call for accountability. We want accounts to be made available and annual reports to be made public. We want to know what the profits are and how they have come about. We want to know how much profit is associated with the maximum prices that are prevailing at the time. Such accountability helps the House of Commons to analyse, scrutinise and monitor in such a way that the Mother of Parliaments can say, "Halt, private monopoly gas! Your are going too far. Some of the priorities that we feel essential are being diminished—in this instance, these priorities concern the users of gas."

It is important that the Minister considers these amendments with great care. He should remember that on balance it is sometimes much better to accept the good sense of the House of Commons than the advice that he receives from the Ministry.

11.30 pm

I have paid tribute to the Secretary of State. As the Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy knows, I am an ardent Labour supporter and am the longest-serving member of that Select Committee. For many years before that I was a member of the Select Committee on Science and Technology. I have been adamant in supporting the objectives and purposes of the Select Committee, and have always been generous in conveying my appreciation to Ministers, particularly to the present Secretary of State.

Having said that, I remind the House that the reputation of the Department of Energy as having a monopoly of initiative has not been too high. Anyone reading the Select Committee's report on conservation will understand our battle to persuade the Department of Energy to get out of its sleepy posture. We are proud that at last we have had some influence.

It is often better for Ministers to take account of what the House of Commons is saying. This is the best university in the world. There is a great deal of experience and learning in this House. It does not follow that because a man becomes a Minister, he is overnight given a wisdom that he never had before. When Ministers listen to their advisers, they should remember that there is nothing to suggest that they are any better or worse than the advisers who attend the Select Committee. We are privileged to have a great deal of knowledge. It is therefore important that the Government should reciprocate more generously in their response to the work of the Select Committee.

As has been pointed out, this is the first Select Committee to have tabled amendments to the outcome of a Standing Committee's deliberations. There may well have been good reason to have done so previously, but we are now at the moment when the Government should understand why we have tabled these amendments. The hesitancy of Select Committees over the years to table amendments in the House is an indication of the care that we take not to abuse the House or stretch its tolerance too far. Therefore, the Minister should bear in mind that after all the years of agony of persuasion, the Select Committee has established with the Department a relationship that calls for a more generous response. The amendments are important because they will enable the House to see what the new private monopoly does. In the short term, we are not so worried, but with a change of board and chairman, and with the monopoly taking hold and becoming more predominant than the interests of the House, we must take great care to establish in the Bill the statutory requirements so that the responsibilities will emerge in the interests of gas consumers.

Amendment No. 4 suggests that this form of accountability should take into account the formulation of indicators and standards of service to be published with the accounts. Those indicators are important because the standards are different from the efficiency of the service. There can be efficiency without the highest standards. Again, we want to establish the harmonisation of efficiency and standards in such a way as to maintain the high reputation that British Gas has established over the past few years.

The amendments are contained in a matter of three or four lines. That is not a great deal to include in the Bill. It will not add to the structure or create a great bureaucracy. Lawyers will not be affected. After all, they get a good share of what goes on in the House. They are overloaded with case work and litigation. Anyone who knows much about lawyers knows that they know full well how to look after themselves, without the Minister doing so. It is harder to get the truth or information out of the mouth of a lawyer without a fee than it is to open an oyster without a knife. Ministers do not need to make pleas on behalf of lawyers or to produce a frightening theatrical exercise about litigation. We are asking for accountability, and that is enough for this time of the night.

Mr. Rost: In supporting the amendments I shall not attempt to emulate the eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) or the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter). I remind my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that on Second Reading many hon. Members on both sides of the House raised anxieties about whether the legislation would impose on British Gas the obligation to publish adequate financial information, and some of us continue to have doubts. In Committee we have not written in sufficient safeguards to ensure proper accountability.

It is unsatisfactory that British Gas should not be obligated to disaggregate its costs and profits between different functions and activities. That is important to ensure there is no question of unfair cross-subsidisation concealed by not providing adequate information.

British Gas should be obliged to publish adequate financial information on the separate components of its business. That is not an unreasonable obligation to write into the legislation. Indeed, it occurs in all good corporate practice in the private sector. Many major companies voluntarily publish a detailed breakdown of their turnover and profit centres, as opposed to one side of their business and the other. They do so to inform their shareholders. If that applies to private sector enterprise, it must apply even more rigorously to an effective monopoly. It should have an even greater obligation to specify that the director general can obtain all the information that he might require to exercise his duties. In demanding that in the amendments, we are not asking for any more than is enshrined in the legislation on British Telecom, where the Director-General of Oftel can order any information which he requires to exercise his duties.

The director general should have the power to specify what information is included in the accounts over and above the minimum legal requirements of the Companies Act, and to request that that should be included in the legislation is not unreasonable. Hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially Conservative Members, should be sympathetic towards that aim. I hope that my right hon. Friend will reconsider whether there are adequate safeguards and will table amendments in another place to ensure complete safeguards.

I am not satisfied that the legislation as drafted will provide for the publication of minimum contract prices. That is important to put beyond doubt that there shall be no predatory pricing. Unless we insist that minimum as well as maximum contract prices are published, the legislation will remain weak. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take that point on board.

Mr. Hardy: I join the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) in his plea to the Minister. The hon. Gentleman is entitled to make the request, because his conduct during the past hour had been a demonstration of consistency and logic. He was the only Conservative Member to join us in voting for the Select Committee's amendment, and he was entirely justified in doing so. This amendment has almost become a consideration of the position of the Select Committee, from which it originated. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) reminded us, this is the first occasion on which a Select Committee has tabled amendments to a Government Bill. Therefore, it is regrettable that the amendments should have been so badly supported by the majority of the members of the Select Committee, some of whom have not even bothered to attend the debate.

The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) said that the public should be aware that there is no concealment. Every hon. Member should support that view. There is already enough concealment built into the Bill. No hon. Member has reminded the House that there will be substantial concealment of shareholdings. In Committee, we pressed for proper protection for the public and for those who hold shares on the privatised company, and we argued that there should be no anonymous holdings. The Minister assured us of the protection of the Companies Act, under which anyone who holds more than 5 per cent. of the equity would have to be known by British Gas. Five percent. of a tiny business may not be significant, but in the largest gas undertaking in the world, a 5 per cent. holding will allow people to hold about £400 million worth of equity without being identified to British Gas plc.

We have had passing reference today, and detailed consideration in Committee, of foreign ownership. As the hon. Member for Havant said, there is cause for concern about concealment. The possibility of massive secret holdings, and of foreign holdings, of which individual holdings could amount to £1,200 million or more, depending on the size of the flotation, suggest that the Government need to be particularly careful to ensure that the call of the hon. Member for Havant on behalf of the Select Committee receives a proper response. There would be cause for great concern on the Committee if its report receives the same treatment as the last one.

It would be sad, if on this significant, perhaps even historic occasion, the Select Committee, which already has grounds for ample complaint about the way that it has been treated by Her Majesty's Government, found this amendment dismissed as well. It would give even the most docile Conservative Member cause for concern that the Government seem prepared to see yet more concealment built into the privatised structure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool was justified to call on the Minister to resolve the difficulties caused by the Government's rejection of the previous amendment. I trust that the excessive docility shown by the colleagues of the hon. Member for Erewash will not encourage the Government to act with the insolent approach that has dominated their proceedings today. They seem to have mistaken verbosity for elegance and co-operativeness.

The Secretary of State has done a great deal of damage, although the Under-Secretary was quick to spring to his defence when a mild rebuke was offered earlier. The Secretary of State has had a field day in the past 48 hours, attacking one Select Committee with viturperative arrogance, and now dismissing the Select Committee on Energy because the Conservative majority, apart from the hon. Member for Erewash, is guilty of the most appalling docility. The Government have done a great deal of damage to Select Committees. It was not wise for this Committee to have adopted the stance of the Grand Old Duke of York. It may not have assisted the historic development of Select Committees in their present form, which is most important. I trust that the hon. Members for Havant, for Rochford (Dr. Clark), for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) — who has not graced us with his presence——

Mr. Bruce: He has enough troubles.

Mr. Hardy: He may have, and it may have been better for him if he had been present in the debate, as he is a member of the Select Committee.

The hon. Members for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) and for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), all of whom had their names to these amendments, should be here, and should have considered voting for the amendments more seriously than they appear to have done. They will no doubt receive another tribute from the Minister.

Paragraph 71 of the Select Committee report refers to the British Gas view that it should be free to operate within the private sector. The Select Committee found two reasons for the rejection of that view. The first was that British Gas would not be operating and competing within the private sector, but within the public sector too, thus being involved in the economically schizophrenic position normally reserved for politicians on the Right.

The second reason that the Select Committee identified was that British Gas would be operating in what is effectively a monopoly position. I am glad that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) has returned to the Chamber. I made a critical reference to his absence a few minutes ago from the Division Lobby. The hon. Member for Havant and his colleagues were right to identify those two reasons, but there is a third. In addition to the two valid arguments that were perceived by the Select Committee there is also the factor of scale. British Gas will be enormous when it is privatised. It will be enormous not only in British terms but in international terms. Its market operations could have a distorting effect. That is another reason for the Select Committee's attitude, which I hope it will sustain if the Government are not prepared to adopt a responsible attitude towards these amendments.

Earlier this evening my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) was criticised for referring to British Gas as a monster monopoly. That was a perfectly accurate description of it. I accept that the hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) assumed that my hon. Friend was using the word "monstrous" as a noun rather than as an adjective. But it is enormous. So long as it remains under its present management it could be described almost as an elephant. An elephant is herbivorous. Problems begin if the elephant becomes a carnivore. If the elephant, because of its size, becomes a marauding carnivore, it could wreak enormous damage upon the environment. For that reason, if I may be excused the zoological metaphor, it would be entirely appropriate if the safeguards that are embodied in the very modest amendments for which the Select Committee asks could be achieved. I recognise that Sir Denis Rooke might not welcome being described as a herbivore, but he has conducted himself in a responsible manner and we shall not be so anxious while Sir Denis Rooke or the existing members of the higher levels of management are in charge, but there is no guarantee——

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman is expressing a degree of disrespect to Sir Denis Rooke. I am not sure that he would be very pleased about being described as a herbivore or as a pachyderm. However, should this ferocious, marauding, carnivorous elephant come into existence, does the hon. Gentleman think that if the elephant grew too big the danger is that it might stand on a lot of people rather than goring them with its tusks, or eating them, or doing whatever other strange affectation might come to the hon. Gentleman's mind?

Mr. Hardy: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not pursue the matter because the Minister of State may wish to reply to the debate. Ministers have complained about our descriptions of them since the second week in December. I shall not add insult to injury on this occasion. However, I do not apologise for leaving the Minister of State with only a short time in which to reply because the contributions of Ministers on the previous two amendments were of inordinate length. It serves them right if they are caught out by their guillotine.

I trust that on this occasion the Select Committee will not be treated with the arrogance—[Interruption.] It is no use the Minister of State complaining. First he wanted me to sit down so that he could reply. Now he seeks to interject from a sedentary position. The fact remains that sooner or later people may be in charge of the new, privatised organisation who will have the marauding or carnivorous disposition to which I have already referred. It is in order to supply society with the kind of protection that the Select Committee perceived as being necessary that we support these amendments and trust that the Minister of State will accept them.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am glad that the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) has given me at least a few minutes in which to reply to this group of amendments.

I begin by acknowledging the contribution that the Select Committee has made to the discussions on the Bill, particularly in relation to accounting. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) referred to this as an arcane area of accounting. He is not doing himself justice. I do not think that it is arcane. It is a very important area of accounting. I agree with what he is trying to achieve. To use his words, he wants the Government to produce real information figures. I accept that it is important that we have real information figures, otherwise one could get cross-subsidisation between one area of activity and another, and that could cause problems in relation to fairness and everything else.

We have looked carefully at the accounting requirement that should be imposed on British Gas in the authorisation. I know that the Select Committee was critical in paragraph 33 that condition two regarding separate accounts for the gas supply business did not entirely fulfil the purposes which it felt were necessary. But there is a clear requirement in condition two on British Gas to draw up accounts for the gas supply business, and it gives the director general the role of scrutinising the allocation of costs between the gas supply business and any other business that British Gas undertakes. The authorisation will ensure that proper accounts are drawn up which represent a true and fair view of the gas supply business.

The hon. Member for Wentworth referred to the response of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the Select Committee's report and questioned whether we were right in saying that the nature of the gas supply business means that it is not possible to associate in a "rigorous way" specific costs of individual sectors of the market. I hope that the hon. Gentleman and other Committee members will reflect on that further, because not only do tariff and non-tariff sales share the same pipes, but they share the same emergency, purchasing and general services.

Therefore, given the way in which the provisions of long-term gas purchasers' contracts have developed over the past 20 years, there is a particular difficulty in the apportionment and proper identification of the costs which relate on the one hand to maintaining peak supply needs and on the other those which relate to meeting the base load. Therefore, there is not necessarily the kind of simple connection, which the Select Committee is recommending in paragraph 33 and the amendment, between, for example, the load factor and the costs. Costs could be allocated in any one of a considerable variety of ways, and the choice that is made materially affects the accounts. To take the test which the Select Committee has used of the objective accuracy of separate profit figures is not a proper reflection of the realities of the gas supply business and for the authorisation to require audited published accounts.

We have achieved the same purposes in the authorisation because the director general will be able to exercise his judgment in that area. That area will not always be the same. I prefer the flexibility given to the director general to scrutinise the accounts and to achieve proper allocation to the slightly greater rigidity of writing that into the primary legislation, although I understand the purpose of that. From the start the director general will be able to use his powers to call for all the necessary information covering the tariff market. He will therefore have access to information about the possible bases on which costs and revenues can be related and to the price regulatory section of the market. Those powers are clearly in clause 7.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant also raised the matter of transparency. Clause 34 gives the director general a discretion to publish information that he considers appropriate, and procedures are set out in the Bill which enable the authorisation to be modified. If the director general found that he was being inhibited in carrying out the purpose of the amendment, which I support, he would be able to introduce those modifications.

On that basis, the regulatory arrangements set out in the Bill and the draft authorisation must be looked at together. They deal with the important need to ensure that proper accounts are drawn up and published. I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Havant to withdraw his amendment, not because I disagree with its purpose, but because I believe that by what we have already done about authorisation we meet the purposes which he and the Select Committee wish. I hope that my hon. Friend will not press the amendment to a Division.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

It being Twelve o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order (17th February) and the Resolution this day, to put forthwith the Questions on amendments moved by a member of the Government.

Clause 10

DUTY TO SUPPLY CERTAIN PREMISES

Amendment made: No. 8, in page 9, line 27, at end insert—

'(3A) The Secretary of State may, after consultation with the Director, make provision by regulations for entitling a public gas supplier to require a person requiring a supply of gas in pursuance of subsection (1) above to pay to the supplier an amount in respect of the expenses of the laying of the main used for the purpose of giving that supply if—

(a) the supply is required within the prescribed period after the laying of the main;

(b) a person for the purpose of supplying whom the main was laid has made a payment to the supplier in respect of those expenses;

(c) the amount required does not exceed any amount paid in respect of those expenses by such a person or by any person previously required to make a payment under the regulations; and

(d) the supplier has not recovered those expenses in full.'. —[Mr. Buchanan-Smith.]

EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS FROM RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES ACT 1976

Amendments made: No. 30, in page 55, line 25, leave out from '1976' to 'shall' in line 1 on page 56.

No. 31, in page 56, line 5, after 'agreement', insert 'containing provisions'.

No. 32 in page 56, line 8, at end insert—

'(2) The said Act of 1976 shall not apply, and shall be deemed never to have applied, to any agreement which—

(a) is or was made on or after 28th November 1985;

(b) is or was an agreement containing provisions relating to, or to activities connected with, the supply otherwise than under an authorisation granted under section 7 above of gas won under the authority of a petroleum production licence; and

(c) satisfies such other conditions as may be specified in an order made by the Secretary of State.

(2A) The conditions specified in an order under subsection (2) above may include—

(a) conditions which are to be satisfied in relation to a time before the coming into force of this section;

(b) conditions which refer any matter (which may be the general question whether the said Act of 1976 should apply to a particular agreement) to the Secretary of State for determination after such consultation as may be so specified.

(2B) Any modification on or after 28th November 1985 of any agreement made before that date shall—

(a) if it relates exclusively to the identities of the parties to the agreement, be treated for the purposes of this section and the said Act of 1976 as a modification before that date; and

(b) in any other case, be treated for those purposes in relation to the original agreement as a separate agreement.

and, accordingly, in neither case shall the modification be capable of having the effect of requiring an agreement made before that date to be treated for those purposes as an agreement made on or after that date.'

No. 33, in page 56, line 9, after 'section', insert 'the following in particular, that is to say, exploration for gas and'.

No. 34, page 56, line 32, at end insert—

'(4A) In relation to any supply before the appointed day, the reference in subsection (2) above to a supply of gas otherwise than under an authorisation granted under section 7 above shall have effect as a reference to a supply of gas otherwise than in performance of any duty imposed by the 1972 Act.'.—[Mr. Buchanan-Smith.]

Bill to be read the Third time this day.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): In order to save the time of the House I shall put together the Questions on motions 3, 4 and 5 on the Order Paper.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79 (5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 28th January, be approved.

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Mental Health (Northern Ireland Consequential Amendments) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 28th January, be approved.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE

That the draft Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 20th February, be approved.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Question agreed to.

European Community (Intervention Buying)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

12.1 am

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceridigion and Pembroke, North): I shall not delay the House much longer at this early hour. We have had a busy day debating important issues. I am glad to have the opportunity to discuss the intervention buying system that operates within the Community. I shall be brief, but I shall ask some probing questions of the Minister to which I hope he will give a favourable reply.

My firm belief is that the intervention buying system for agricultural products is responsible for much of the bad publicity that surrounds the EEC and gives unnecessary ammunition to those who oppose our membership. In the past few years many hon. Members who are opposed to our being a full member of the European Community have raised this matter.

Nothing is more calculated to arouse the anger of the ordinary person in the street than reports of tonnes of butter being sold off cheaply to the Russians because of intervention. The Government apparently are reluctant to supply cut-price butter to Britain's old-age pensioners, even though that would cost less than half the subsidy needed to dispose of it to the Russians. That kind of economics is incomprehensible to most people, and offensive to those who wish to see a proper marketing effort for EEC goods that would benefit consumers and producers.

Are the Government planning to make the butter available to the old and needy in Britain, or to Third world countries, as a short-term food aid measure in difficult times? Many of the elderly people in our society would be delighted at the opportunity to buy cheap butter and many people would be complimentary to the Government and Ministers if they decided on that course in the near future.

The intervention system is basically wasteful. My purpose is to find out whether the Government support the system or whether they have given sufficient thought to alternative forms of marketing that would provide more efficient results. We are well aware that many European countries, especially Germany, are keen to retain the intervention system. We have been told on many occasions that the present Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is keen to hold on to the system. Let us hope that we can persuade the right hon. Gentleman to change his mind and to try to introduce a different marketing system for what we produce in Britain.

The intervention system creates problems for producers, makes some commodities too expensive and denies the British consumer the right to have fresh and reasonably priced food. Can the Minister give us an idea of the storage costs for various products within the Community? Have the Government suggested to their European partners a more efficient marketing method than selling surplus products to the Russians? I read with interest an article that appeared in one of the leading Sunday newspapers a few weeks ago. Is it true that beef cattle are bought for £500, for argument's sake, slaughtered, put into intervention for about six months and then sold to the Russians for the equivalent of £50? That would produce a colossal loss and that sort of marketing should be stopped forthwith.

Is the Minister able to tell us how much food is sold to Russia from the European Community every year? Secondly, can he tell us how much this costs the British taxpayer? Has the Minister given any thought to introducing a deficiency payments scheme for beef cattle to help beef producers? The deficiency payments scheme worked well in Britain for decades until the Tory Government of 1973 did away with it. During 1973-74 we did not have a guaranteed price for beef produced in this country and I am sure that the Minister will remember those days when the store market and the beef markets in many parts of Britain were in dire trouble. We have been told that the intervention buying for beef cattle will be abolished within the next 12 months. Can the Minister give an assurance to beef producers in Britain that the variable premium will be safeguarded and that it will remain, whatever happens to the intervention system?

Has it been calculated how the intervention system affects the British farmer? For example, if there had not been intervention, would there have been the necessity for the damaging quota system that has been imposed on British farmers to deal with the surpluses that have accumulated? Would there have been a different position for Welsh farmers, who have suffered especially badly from the imposition of quotas? With the massive surpluses of grain that are now in storage, it is likely that cereal growers in Britain will face similar quotas. Has the Minister any plans to introduce quotas for cereal growers?

Is there not a case for an improved marketing division within the European Community that could ensure the disposal of European produce to world markets without harming Third world markets, or for working out better ways of marketing within the Community? I have said for years that we can blame our own Government and other Governments within the Community and argue for days on end that we are overproducing in Britain, but it must be realised that the real fault lies with the marketing division within Europe. If we could only control our marketing structure and methods in Europe of disposing of our surpluses, I do not think that British producers would have any need to worry. I am sure that the Minister will agree that confidence is now at a very low ebb in the agriculture industry. When the industry loses confidence in its leaders and in the policy being pursued by the Government that confidence must be restored if the industry and rural life in Wales and elsewhere are to be maintained.

A press release issued by the Farmers Union of Wales on 7 March following a meeting between its president, Mr. Huw Hughes, and Welsh Office agriculture department officials at Aberystwyth on 6 March reads as follows:

"Mr. Hughes said that, against the current background in the EEC, the Union was well aware of the problems facing the Community. The estimated value of UK intervention stocks of foodstuffs—excluding feedwheat and barley—at the end of 1985, was £678 million calculated on the basis of the buying-in prices valid at that time. The estimated value of EEC intervention stocks at the end of November 1985 was around £6,000 million. The most recent estimate of storage and related costs in respect of UK intervention stocks amounted to £102 million."

That is a colossal sum to keep our products in cold storage.

The press release continues:

"He emphasised, however, that as far as European over-production was concerned, the problem sectors were wine, cereals, sugar, and milk. The Community was only just over self-sufficiency levels in beef and veal, and the position was expected to improve by the end of the decade."

If that is true, it is very good news for the livestock sector in Wales and other parts of Britain. The press release further states:

"As far as the sheep sector was concerned, the EEC was well below self-sufficiency levels and was not expected to be self-sufficient by the end of the decade."

I still blame the intervention system. Meat used to be hoarded in biblical times and all these years later we are doing the same thing. We should devise a system within Europe to stop the best products of our agriculture—beef, butter and other commodities—from being put into cold storage for months at enormous cost to taxpayers here and in Europe. Instead of falling out about whether we should have a common agricultural policy, whether we should stay in Europe and what to do about overproduction, if all the European countries got together to discuss marketing as the top priority that would be far more help to all concerned.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) in raising a most important subject.

One of the reasons why farming has acquired such a bad image in recent years is the reference on television and in the other media to mountains of surplus food. Good housekeeping should involve keeping a little surplus, but we now have vast amounts of surplus food. The cost is about 10·5 million ecus and the main surpluses are in dairy products, grain and beef. In the past 12 months the butter surplus has increased by 1 million tonnes. That is a vast quantity, which we feel should be going to the pensioners, not only in Britain, but in other European countries. That would be a far more preferable way of dealing with our surplus products than exporting them to Russia.

The dairy product surplus represents about 31 per cent. of the costs of the surplus, whereas grain costs represent about 14 per cent. of the cost. It is noticeable that the French, in particular, seem to get rid of their surpluses through national aids and apply export credit guarantees for the export of grain by their own grain producers. That is something that we do not seem to be prepared to do. I would like to see international co-operation in the disposal of grain, particularly in relation to the Third world. I would favour the creation of something like an international grain fund, which would operate rather like the International Monetary Fund and would bring surpluses of grain to a central fund so that it could be distributed to those countries most in need and the starving in those nations could be rescued.

There are 750,000 tonnes of beef in surpluses and I believe that we need to attack the system of support in Europe. As we all know, in this country we have a very good system of variable premiums supporting beef. There is no reason why the rest of Europe should not adopt that system, whereby the consumer can get beef at a reasonable price and less beef is placed in store. I believe that at present we are being placed under unreasonable pressure by fellow members of the Community to scrap the variable premium system. That is not in the national interest and it is certainly not in the interests of the European Community, which should be looking at that system as a method for reducing its vast stocks of beef and ensuring that the consumers of Europe receive that beef at a reasonable price.

The Minister of State Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I think that it is useful for us to be able to discuss the issue of intervention buying. However, it seems an odd way to approach the European Community. It is rather like saying that one will blame the lifeboats for the storm. The idea that it is the intervention system which is at fault instead of the surpluses seems to be an odd concept.

I share all the desires of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). I am a great supporter of the European Community and I am very keen that Britain should not only continue to be a member but should contribute more and more to the growing unity in Europe. However, we will not help the Community if we begin by saying that the system is wrong, rather than the amount that we are producing.

We are over-producing in this country and in the rest of Europe, but it is not just us. It is happening in the United States of America, the Third world, China and India. None of those countries outside Europe has an intervention system. Therefore, it is not the system which has created the surpluses. We have a world in surplus. Last year, for the first time, the Chinese were able not only to feed a quarter of the world's population but to export food. Last year India sent more food aid to Ethiopia than did the whole of the Soviet bloc. Therefore, the idea that there is something special about the intervention system which in some way creates surpluses seems to be a fiction.

The reality is that we live in a world of surplus. Apart from sub-Saharan Africa, and that to a lesser extent this year than before, and the incompetent Soviet Union, there is no major part of the world which cannot feed its own people. However, there are parts of the world in which the distribution, economic system or way of managing the economy means that the surpluses do not reach the poorest people.

We live in a world of surplus, and we have to start there. The idea that by changing the intervention system we would deal with the problem is a falsehood. We have to look at how best to change from a system based on the problem of shortage to a system that will meet the surplus. Intervention provides one of the most sensible ways to deal with a world in which shortfall is feared, in which equality between supply and demand is the aim and where some reasonable method of buying and storage meets that balancing desire.

In other words, that works where one does not have a surplus. Once one has a surplus, intervention becomes an unsatisfactory way of solving our problems, because it is very highly geared. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have read the Prime Minister's speech to the National Farmers Union, in which she referred specifically to the problem of gearing. A 4 per cent. surplus in beef means 50 per cent. more beef in intervention, and a 200 per cent. increase in the cost of it. The whole thing is very tightly geared. In those circumstances, we must look not so much at the system that we have, but at how to reduce the surpluses that give rise to that distortion of the system.

The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right to say that those surpluses cause considerable unhappiness about the nature of the European Community. Any of us who are determined to put forward positive aspects of the Community must be concerned about the way in which those mountains and lakes give to the narrow-minded opponents of the European Community an opportunity to attack a fine institution.

If one wants to deal with the problem, I plead that one should not seek to change the symptoms. One has to get down to the disease. The disease is the surpluses that we are producing. They come not from intervention, but from technological advance and the ability to grow four tonnes an acre where once one could grow only two tonnes. The British dairy herd has much the same number of cows as 10 years ago but is producing 29 per cent. more milk. That is the reality of the nature of technological advance, in terms of breeding and husbandry.

If that is so, what do we do about it? In answer to the questions asked by the hon. Gentleman, I have to say, first, that we need to provide a means of support for the agriculture community that does not make those surpluses inevitable, even though technology makes them possible. Therefore, in dealing with beef, the hon. Gentleman is right to applaud the fact that the Commission is putting forward proposals that will move us away from intervention and towards premium. However, the premium that we want is much more akin to the variable premium. We support the variable premium because it has the great advantage of being linked directly to the market —when the market is good the premium is low, and when the market is poor the premium is high—whereas the fixed premium has the disadvantage of giving the farmer too much when the market is high and too little when the market is low.

The proposals are grossly discriminatory against the United Kingdom, because those premiums are available only for the first 50 head of cattle. We are not prepared to accept that, because we believe that one must not discriminate as though it were possible to use one's basic agricultural support as a means of promoting a certain sort of farming against another sort of farming. That is not what we intend to do in Britain. Therefore, we are determined to see that those are non-discriminatory measures.

If we are to do that, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that we should move — we hope to convince our colleagues of it—away from intervention in that area. But it must be on a fair, non-discriminatory basis, with the satisfactory lessons that Britain has had. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not put forward the case that somehow deficiency payments in general would be a satisfactory answer. If we were to have the same deficiency payments system as before our entry into the European Community, the cost to the British taxpayer would be much greater. The cost is always based on the interpretation of the figures, but it would be up to twice as much as the present cost. It would be an expensive way of doing it.

Mr. Geraint Howells indicated dissent

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Let me give him the figures as far as I can remember them. Naturally, I was not aware that he would ask that question, but I hope that I am right in saying that the figures are something like this. The Exchequer contribution is about £1·6 billion. With a deficiency payments system, the amount would be closer to £2·5 billion, which would be a considerable increase. That is why the Liberal party does not favour the deficiency payments system. The hon. Gentleman may be in favour of it, but I do not wish to enter into party political issues. This was going to be one of those few occasions when I had an opportunity not to do so. I realise that the Liberal party is divided on this matter, but the official Liberal policy is that we should not return to the deficiency payments system. The Liberals know that the figures do not work out and that, therefore, it would not be reasonable to put that proposition forward.

As for grain surpluses, it is important that the amount of grain produced should be much closer to the amount we need. I beg the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North not to suggest to his farmers the wholly fictitious view that if only we improved the marketing we would be able to sell this grain. That is nonsense. The trouble is that there is no area in which we can sell it or even give it away. The hon. Gentleman wants to give the grain to the Third world, but that is the way to undermine all the incipient farmers there. We are desperate to rebuild those communities. The most imperialist, anti-Third-world policy would flood those markets with wheat and destroy farming in those rural communities. That is opposed by every major aid organisation. Ask the Save the Children Fund, War on Want and even those organisations which have opposing political affiliations to ours what is needed, and they will say that cash is best for aid. Giving large amounts of food aid on a continuing basis undermines the Third world's ability to create its own economy. I say to the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North that if he cares about the Third world he should not lead his farmers down that false alleyway—it is a disgraceful and dangerous path.

Some years ago I spent some time in Mauritania where I saw what happened when there was a constant supply of food aid from outside the country. The result was that indigenous agriculture and nomadic culture and husbandry, which had been the basis of the food supply, were not encouraged. That is what happens if Third world countries are flooded with the over-production of the European Community.

Our job has been to use our surpluses to help the Third world in times of famine when those countries have had no chance of recreating their agriculture, partly because their Governments have purposely destroyed agriculture through their economic policies, as happened in Ethiopia. Where that happens, there is an immediate and urgent, although not a continuing need. The idea that there is a continuing market for food or a proper area to which to give food is contrary to the experience and advice of all those who are involved in giving aid and all those voluntary organisations which we depend for advice.

It is no good telling people that, however sophisticated their markets are, the growing surpluses in Europe can be dealt with, especially the surpluses in perishable goods, such as butter. The hon. Gentleman suggested that we should give butter to the Third world as a means of overcoming the problem, but that is surely contrary to all reason. Many parts of the third world do not want butter. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman must look at the record, because I clearly noted that he suggested that butter should go to the Third world and to pensioners. Giving butter to the Third world would be a misuse of our resources, because that money could be much better used in direct cash aid than in transporting the product to the Third world in parts of which, for all kinds of religious and other reasons, it cannot be used.

I come to the question of the pensioners. The hon. Gentleman is right. It would be extremely advantageous if we could find a way of providing this butter for the pensioners, honourably and decently, to give them something that they would not otherwise have. I very much hope that he was not making a play for their support by saying that, without admitting the problem. Let me be absolutely straight. All our experience, and all the efforts, that we have made to check on this, show that if we provide cheap butter for pensioners, they buy the cheap butter instead of the butter that they would otherwise have bought, and that butter goes into the very intervention stocks that we are trying to run down. That increases the costs of the system.

The hon. Gentleman is asking for the circular system by which we spend more and more money, thus increasing the costs of intervention. I hope that he will join us in fighting to ensure that the Community reduces its surpluses. Let us get rid of the disease. Let us not—as is often the case when we deal with Liberals—deal only with the symptom. Let us stop that, let us get down to the real issue and let us stop playing party politics with this important matter.

Oral Answers to Questions

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

1. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Paymaster General how many individuals are currently receiving YTS training in the Leith area.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. However, at the end of February, the latest date for which statistics are available, there were 2,113 young people in training in the Edinburgh local authority district.

Mr. Brown: Having learnt the lessons of the case of James McCormack, will the Minister advise the Chancellor of the Exchequer to provide money to compensate trainees which have been injured or maimed through these cheap labour schemes? Will he tell the Chancellor that even a death grant must be provided to families who suffer fatalities? Is he suggesting that the Government, who are allegedly a caring Government, care only about profits and big business, not about the people who matter, particularly youngsters on youth training schemes?

Mr. Trippier: I am aware of the sad case of the hon. Gentleman's constituent and of the fact that compensation was made in that case. I find it very disquieting that the hon. Gentleman should try to rubbish the YTS by referring to it as cheap labour, just as I deplore the fact that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), the shadow spokesman on employment, chose to call the youngsters on the scheme skivvy labour. I cannot think of any greater insult to those young people.

Mr. Colvin: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that enough YTS places are provided by the Civil Service? If not, what can be done to encourage the Civil Service to provide more YTS places in Leith and elsewhere?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend raises a topical issue. We are considering that matter.

Mr. Wainwright: Is it not a sad reflection on youth training in Edinburgh and elsewhere that, at the recent skill Olympics attended by 19 nations, at which 108 medals were awarded for a great variety of skills, the United Kingdom obtained only two? They were awarded, not for engineering, electronics or manufacturing, but for ladies hairdressing and jewellery.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman will have to look more positively at YTS. It is, after all, a well tried and proven scheme which has not been found wanting. A very high percentage of youngsters who have participated in it have found full-time employment or gone on to further education. That is what we are concerned about. We know that we have a success. That is why we are developing and strengthening it into a two-year scheme.

Wages

2. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Paymaster General how the wages of the best paid 20 per cent. of employees have changed in relation to inflation since 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): Between 1979 and 1985 increases of about 13 per cent. for full-time men and about 19 per cent. for full-time women were exceeded by 20 per cent. of full-time employees.

Mr. Lloyd: Does the Minister not feel any shame in giving those figures to the House when, over the same period, the number of families on very low pay who have been forced to claim family income supplement has more than doubled? Why are we told that for the low-paid wage cuts will drive them to work, while for the high-paid nothing but massive pay increases are the order of the day?

Mr. Lang: I think that the hon. Gentleman may have his figures wrong. Under this Government the lowest paid 20 per cent. have enjoyed a real increase in income, as, with lower inflation, have many more people, whereas under the Labour Government that was all destroyed by inflation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will my hon. Friend confirm that average wages are increasing in real terms? Does he agree that, although this is fine for those in work, it is bad news for the unemployed? Will my hon. Friend impress on the CBI, the TUC and other interested organisations that real wages are increasing less quickly in competing countries?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Average wages for men are increasing by about 10 per cent. and average wages for women are increasing by about 14 per cent. If we could achieve a 1 per cent. across-the-board cut, it might create about 100,000 new jobs.

Mr. Leighton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the highest paid register the least unemployment and the lowest paid register the highest unemployment? Is he aware that the Contract Cleaning and Maintenance Association told the Select Committee on Employment that, after a Treasury directive following abolition of the fair wages resolution, wages for cleaners in Government Departments and the number of staff were reduced? Has the hon. Gentleman noticed what is happening at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre at Swansea where cleaners on £27 a week have been asked to take a 30p per hour wage cut and to lose their holiday entitlement, and where staff numbers are to be cut from 139 to 102? Does that not make nonsense of pricing people into jobs? Is it not the Government's policy——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Lang: May I reply to the hon. Gentleman with another example—the electrical contracting industry. In that industry wages for young people were reduced by one third and the number of apprentices recruited increased almost fourfold.

Mr. Prescott: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the income increase in real terms for the top 20 per cent. has been far higher than the increase in real terms for those on low incomes? Low incomes have decreased and unemployment has occurred. Deregulation in the wealthy City sector of the market has meant more money and jobs for some but less for those on low incomes.

Mr. Lang: There has been a divergence as we moved from the distortions of the last Government's pay policy. The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that our first Budgets in 1979 took out 1·3 million low-paid taxpayers left in the tax net by the outgoing Socialist Government.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

3. Mr. Lawler asked the Paymaster General what is the number and percentage of the total of people on the enterprise allowance scheme under 25 years of age.

Mr. Trippier: On 31 January 1986 there were 13,449 people—25·6 per cent.—under 25 years of age out of a total of 52,516 currently in receipt of the enterprise allowance.

Mr. Lawler: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply, which shows that the spirit of enterprise is flourishing among young people. Is that proportion increasing? Will my hon. Friend assure the House that every opportunity will be made available to trainees to give them guidance and encouragement on how to become self-employed and how to set up their own businesses?

Mr. Trippier: The figure has increased since the scheme went nationwide on 1 August 1983. The number of young people involved in the enterprise allowance scheme has increased from 17·2 to 25·6 per cent. I shall certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. A number of programmes are already developing, even in YTS, in which we are trying to stimulate the expansion of enterprise. A number of those youngsters are now working for themselves.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that a significant number of youngsters in King's Lynn have applied to join the scheme but have been turned down? Does he agree that, although this is an excellent scheme, the criteria should be relaxed?

Mr. Trippier: The criteria will be relaxed as from 1 April, when we are reducing the qualifying period from 13 to 8 weeks. I make no apology for the fact that we still want anyone who applies for the EAS to have access to £1,000. If people do not have the wit to get access to £1,000, I very much doubt that they will ever have the wit to run successful businesses of their own.

Youth Wages

4. Mr. Sheerman asked the Paymaster General if he will give the figures for the percentage increase in youth wages since 1979.

11. Mr. Randall asked the Paymaster General what has been the change in wage levels for under 18-year-olds since 1979.

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Between April 1979 and April 1985 the average earnings of girls increased by 77 per cent. and those of boys by 72 per cent.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that those figures prove that the incomes of young people are increasing much more slowly than adult incomes? Is he aware also that youth unemployment is twice adult unemployment? Is it the Government's policy to prepare a large number of young people for low wages in a dual wage economy of the future?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member should be pleased that youth unemployment is falling so steadily in Britain. In the three years up to January 1986 unemployment among young people under 18 years fell by 13 per cent. It is important that young people should not expect too high a rate of pay in their first years of work before they acquire the training and experience of their older colleagues.

Mr. Forth: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is totally irresponsible for the Opposition and the trade unions to encourage young people to expect excessively high wages in the early stages of their careers? It is important for us to understand, as the Germans have, that while young people are undergoing training they must expect relatively low rates of pay so that they may justify the full rate when they are fully trained to do the job.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Opposition spokesmen no doubt calculate that it sounds attractive to young people, but their policies would price many more young people out of jobs. The attacks by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) on the youth training scheme are nothing short of disgraceful, as he has tried to discredit a successful scheme.

Mr. Nellist: If the Minister had given the figures for inflation alongside the figures that he gave in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), they would have shown that for boys leaving school there has been a 12 per cent. fall in their net pay compared with adults in 1979, that there has been a 13 per cent. fall for girls, and that at the same time youth unemployment has trebled. It ill-behoves a Minister of the Government on almost £1,000 a week to tell young workers on £40 or £50 to cut their wages to get more jobs. Wages for youth have fallen and youth unemployment has trebled.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is ignoring the fact that it is only in the past two or three years that young people's pay has fallen relative to adults' pay. It is only in the past two or three years that the rate of unemployment among young people has fallen. That may be in conflict with the hon. Gentleman's policies, but the facts refute his claims.

Mr. Cockeram: Under the wages council's regulations, are not the wage rates for school leavers 60 per cent. of the adult rate? Is that not one of the highest school leaver rates in western Europe, and is it not a contributory factor to unemployment among school leavers?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. That is why we have the Wages Bill before the House. We are reforming a system that has priced too many young people out of the first job that they could have had when they left school.

Job Creation

5. Mr. Foulkes asked the Paymaster General what steps he will take to co-ordinate growth and employment generating measures with other members of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Clarke: Within the European Council of Ministers, I have been pressing for a change in the agenda of the Social Affairs Council so as to give much higher priority to measures that will promote economic and employment growth within the member states. I am glad to say that there is now widespread agreement among our partners that we should discuss such measures based on sound economic policies which provide for the competitiveness of industry and commerce, the control of inflation and the adaptability of the labour market. I hope we shall be able to make further progress with discussions during the United Kingdom presidency in the second half of the year.

Mr. Foulkes: Does the Paymaster General agree with the Commission, which in its annual economic report said that safeguarding adequate demand is the task of Governments. It also stated that unemployment could be reduced by up to 40 per cent. in the next few years by a co-operative growth strategy. Will the Minister say exactly what he will propose in the Council of Employment Ministers to achieve that sort of growth strategy?

Mr. Clarke: There is a wide range of agreement within the European Council amongst Ministers from all countries and political persuasions that the economic policy based on the principles that I set out was the one to be followed. At the moment the OECD forecast for next year is that the level of unemployment in Europe will remain about stable. That is because it is expecting a fall in unemployment in the United Kingdom and in Germany, which will be offset by a rise in Socialist France and Italy.

Mr. Thurnham: As employment is growing much faster in this country than in the EEC as a whole, will my right hon. and learned Friend make sure that any co-ordination is in an upward direction?

Mr. Clarke: As the number of new jobs created in Britain appears to exceed the number of new jobs created in the rest of the Community, I believe that the Community would be well advised to pay heed to our experience.

Mr. Wigley: Is there not evidence that the imbalance between the "Golden Triangle" and the peripheral regions is still worsening? The principles that the Minister has enunciated this afternoon tend to exacerbate that trend. In view of that, will there not be some development of a strong regional policy within the EEC to get jobs into the regions around the periphery as well as in the centre?

Mr. Clarke: The Council of Ministers that I attend deals mainly with the social fund, but that proves of considerable benefit to Britain, particularly for those parts that are designated as priority areas. It is important that we continue to receive benefit from the social fund for the benefit of the less advantaged parts of the country.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I welcome the fact that the European countries are at last pulling together in employment policies, but will my right hon. and learned Friend congratulate British industry, as he frequently does, on the fact that it has created more new jobs in the past seven years and that Britain has a higher proportion of people working than any other European country?

Mr. Clarke: I think that Denmark is slightly ahead of us. But, with that slight proviso, my hon. Friend is right to say that a higher proportion of people of working age in the United Kingdom are in employment than in any other EC country, with the possible exception of Denmark, and I hope that we can overtake it.

Labour Statistics

6. Mr. John Fraser asked the Paymaster General how many people are now unemployed in Lambeth; and how many were unemployed on 14 April 1981.

Mr. Lang: On 6 February 1986 the number of unemployed claimants in the London borough of Lambeth was 26,362. Comparable figures for April 1981 are not available.

Mr. Fraser: Will the Minister take it from me that since Lord Scarman's inquiry was set up the number of people unemployed in Lambeth has at least doubled? To what extent do the Government take any responsibility for that?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman should also take into account the fact that the number of job vacancies in Lambeth has also been rising. Some 2,000 people in Lambeth are benefiting from our employment and training measures. The urban programme is also putting over £13 million into Lambeth.

Mr. Watts: By how much have the rates in Lambeth increased over the same period, and does my hon. Friend see any connection between the two increases?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is on to a good point. Lambeth is one of the highest overspending authorities in the country. The rates rose 107 per cent. in the three years between 1982 and 1985, and a second year of rate capping is good news for business and employment in Lambeth.

7. Mr. Nellist asked the Paymaster General on how many occasions since 1979 the method of counting unemployment has been altered.

Mr. Lang: Since 1979 there have been five changes which have had a discernible effect on the unemployment count, and three of them have been minor. As we announced on 19 February, a further change is about to be made to correct most of the current over-recording.

Mr. Nellist: Would not the effort expended on removing 1·25 million people from the unemployment register be better expended by the Government on a crash programme of public works, such as building houses, schools and hospitals? Is it not the final indignity for the Paymaster General to say, as he did five minutes ago, that youth unemployment in Britain has fallen, when he knows that there has just been a staistical change—a sideways shift into the youth training scheme—not the creation of real jobs for our youth?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman takes an unduly gloomy view of these matters. His interest in statistics has recently been confined to trying to discover which 50 constituencies have had the biggest rise in unemployment in the past year. I hope that he was not too disappointed that Coventry, South-East was not among them. Unemployment in Coventry, South-East fell by 1·33 per cent.

Mr. Maclean: Will my hon. Friend admit that it is disgraceful that under all Governments those in self-employment and the armed forces have been ignored in compiling unemployment figures? Does he agree that any change which takes account of the excellent job done by our men and women in the armed services and the self-employed is to be welcomed by both sides of the House?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. Self-employment has been increasingly important in recent years and now accounts for the highest proportion of the total in employment since 1921. The House might also like to be reminded that the previous Labour Government changed the method of counting. In March 1976 they excluded adult students, which at some times of the year could affect the count by 200,000.

Mr. Flannery: Is not the reason why the Minister could not give comparable figures for 1981 that since then there has been another trick in the method of counting the unemployed by the removal of people over 60 and he will not give any figures once a change has been made, but pretends that they do not exist?

Mr. Lang: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman thinks that we should have left figures that we knew to be inaccurate or whether he believes that we should publish accurate figures, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has agreed should be the case. Among the changes that we have instituted, two of them — fortnightly registration and the inclusion of the severely disabled—have increased the count by 20,000 and 23,000 respectively.

Mr. Ashby: When will a proper analysis of the unemployment figures be made so that we might see the true number of people who are unemployed? Many people will ask how a Government can possibly plan for the future without an accurate knowledge of those who are truly seeking work?

Mr. Lang: As my hon. Friend knows, we are working towards producing a more comprehensive and helpful picture of the unemployed. I am sure my hon. Friend recognises that the unemployment count is based on a kind of snapshot taken on one day of the month. On average, 30,000 people find a job on every working day, which shows how impossible it is ever to have total accuracy.

Ms. Richardson: Does the Paymaster General agree that the exclusion of some married women from the register gives a wholly distorted picture of the number of people wanting work? Will he give the House an estimate of the number of women, for example, who are left out of the register who are ready for work but cannot find child-care provision or someone to look after an adult dependant?

Mr. Lang: I do not have those exact figures with me. However, the hon. Lady may know that part-time employment of women has risen by over 500,000 since 1979. There are people included in the count who are not seeking work, but it is also true that there are people not included who are seeking work.

Mr. Wainwright: Will the Minister get his statisticians, at the same time as they refine the count of those claiming benefit, to publish a monthly estimate of the large number of people who have no benefit to claim but are unemployed and are actively seeking work?

Mr. Lang: There are 870,000 people looking for work who are not on the count and claiming benefit, but, according to the same labour force survey, there are 940,000 people who are not looking for work who are in the count.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my right hon. and learned Friend comment on the observation by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) that we should spend more money on building hospitals, and compare this Government's programme of hospital building with that of the previous Labour Government?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Our capital investment programme bears comparison with that of any other Government.

Special Employment Measures

8. Mr. Dixon asked the Paymaster General when he now expects to respond to the Employment Committee's report on special employment measures and the long-term unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are studying the report very carefully and will submit a detailed memorandum to the Committee as soon as possible.

Mr. Dixon: That answer is not good enough. Is the Paymaster General aware that in my constituency 3,885 men and women have been out of work for over a year and that 43·1 per cent. of those unemployed are long-term unemployed? When will the Paymaster General get off his backside and do something positive about it?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the long-term unemployed are now our most serious social problem. They are not yet sharing fully in the recovery in the jobs market. I would also point out that in the hon. Gentleman's own area of south Tyneside we have greatly increased the amount of adult training that we are giving to people to enable them to be better equipped for jobs. Over the years from 1984-85 to 1985-86 the numbers receiving adult training increased from 1,752 to 4,800. That is a 174 per cent. increase in the south Tyneside area.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that until we operate the work test we shall never know the true unemployment levels? Is any work being done on the possibility of instituting a proper work test and work fare measures?

Mr. Clarke: All those on the count currently should be genuinely available for work. The most recent labour force survey showed that over 9,000 had not looked for work recently. We also know, as people have said, that there are those not on the count who are seeking work. The trouble is that every time we try to improve these obvious imperfections in the figures the Opposition raise cheap jibes of fiddling because they do not really want to know the true position.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Paymaster General aware that there are many voluntary groups which are already doing job creation along the lines recommended in the Select Committee's excellent report and that they are stifled and inhibited from doing more only by the Manpower Services Commission's bureaucratic regulations? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman examine the possibility of relaxing the regulations to enable more work to be done along the lines of the report?

Mr. Clarke: The Manpower Services Commission has greatly increased the direct employment measures and training provisions that it provides on behalf of the Government. I will always look at examples of bureaucracy getting in the way of expansion of that, but the community programme, in particular, has been expanded flat out recently and I do not think that it would be practicable to take more people on it.

Mr. Evans: Will the Paymaster-General confirm that there are now more than 1,350,000 people classified as long-term unemployed in this country, that more than 550,000 of them are men aged over 50 and that that is a tragic waste of one of the nation's greatest resources? Does the Paymaster General appreciate that the message of the Select Committee on Employment was a ray of hope to those people? Why does he not accept it and give them more hope?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman knows that we have been concentrating in nine pilot areas on measures that can give help to the long-term unemployed. We have been able to offer individual assistance to the long-term unemployed by giving them a range of job opportunities and training, including the teaching of work application methods, which have benefited individually those who have come forward in our nine pilot areas. Although I share the aims of the Select Committee's report, its proposals are largely impracticable. For example, I do not believe that it would be possible to provide 100,000 one-year jobs for the unskilled and the untrained in the National Health Service and the social services. We have to look for practicable measures, and that is what we have been doing.

Mr. Rowe: When my right hon. and learned Friend last answered questions on this report he gave the very clear impression that he was working to prepare the ground for a guarantee for the long-term unemployed. Since then the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission has told the Select Committee that he could implement such a guarantee, were it to be introduced. I wonder whether this means that my right hon. and learned Friend can bring forward the time when we can look for a guaranteee for at least some of the long-term unemployed?

Mr. Clarke: I have been trying out various ways of bringing additional help to the long-term unemployed. I have visited a scheme in Bolton that offers a guarantee of employment to those who have been unemployed for three years or more. My hon. Friend must await the results of all our considerations.

Youth Employment

9. Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the levels of youth employment.

Mr. Trippier: Our youth training measures will help young people to take advantage of the extra jobs which our economic policies are producing.

Mr. Pike: Are the Government not concerned about the very serious high level of real unemployment among the young? Are they not concerned about those who will leave the youth training scheme in April? No provision has been made for them. They will face real unemployment. When will the Government take positive steps to get the young people of this country into jobs?

Mr. Trippier: I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman heard the replies that were given by my right hon. and learned Friend about the reduction in the level of unemployment among the young. Between January 1985 and January 1986 there was a reduction of 10,900 in the number of young people out of work. Far fewer young people are out of work this year than were out of work last year. That is a smaller proportion of the total number of people who are unemployed.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Will my hon. Friend draw to the attention of a wider audience the extraordinary potential for developing self-employment and encouraging enterprise that the Genesis programme offers within the youth training scheme? Is my hon. Friend able to assure me that the Genesis programme has a secure future?

Mr. Trippier: I have been very impressed by what I have seen of the Genesis programme. It is a management agency which is trying to develop the ethos of self-employment among youth training scheme trainees. Many of those who are on the scheme have set up in business on their own account. I understand that some of them are employing others. The Manpower Services Commission is working on a module which will try to develop and strengthen enterprise within the YTS programme.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister understand that the continuing and cavalier dismissal of the recommendations of the Select Committee on Employment concerning youth unemployment and general unemployment is disgraceful and that his right hon. and learned Friend has again said that many of the proposals are impracticable? However the Government may massage the unemployment figures, the fact is that this Government are presiding over the highest level of youth and other unemployment in the history of this country and that they are doing very little about it.

Mr. Trippier: I have adequately covered the hon. and learned Gentleman's last point. There has been a reduction in the number of unemployed young people under the age of 18. We are not in any way treating in a cavalier fashion the Select Committee's recommendations. They will receive our full consideration. However, what we want to know, and what my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury wants to know from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), is who will pay the bill at the end of the day.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that most of the young unemployed had few or no qualifications when they left school and that the teachers' strike has not helped them? Will his Department do everything possible to bring the teachers' industrial action to an early end?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is very wide of the question.

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for drawing my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that that is not a matter for me. However, the point raised earlier by my hon. Friend is a matter for me. There is clear recognition by the Government that our young work force lacks skills. There is a shortage of young people trained in skills, and we have therefore designed programmes and schemes to cope with that.

Mr. Sheerman: May I puncture the Minister's complacency by telling him that one third of a million young people are unemployed and have never been employed? Is he aware that it would take a tripling of the community programme to cater for those up to the age of 25? What do the Government propose to do about the one third of a million young people who have never worked?

Mr. Trippier: We are by no means complacent about the level of youth unemployment. We have been working hard trying to develop schemes and programmes to help those youngsters get jobs. We are clearly on the right lines, as shown by the figures that have been given by my right hon. and learned Friend and by myself.

Lost Working Days

10. Mr. Gale asked the Paymaster General how many working days have been lost in industrial disputes over the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A provisional total of 4·4 million working days were lost through stoppages of work due to industrial disputes during the 12 months to 31 January 1986.

Mr. Gale: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there has been a marked improvement in the industrial relations record of recently privatised industries? Does he further agree that that strengthens the case for the early privatisation of other major nationalised industries?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The figure that I have cited includes nearly 2 million days that were lost during the miners' dispute in the year in question. I agree with my hon. Friend that when one looks at the number of stoppages in the year to January 1986, one sees that the figure is the lowest that we have had since the comparable period up to January 1936—50 years ago. There has been a welcome improvement in industrial relations, particularly in the private sector of industry.

Mr. James Lamond: Does the Minister not realise that any drop in the figures is not due to workers being more content with their lot under this Government, but rather is due to the fear of unemployment that hangs over the head of every employed person? The trade unions have been so fettered by the Government that they are afraid to bring out their members to exercise the right that they have had for the whole of this century—the right to stop work if they are dissatisfied with their conditions.

Mr. Clarke: A great deal of the improvement has to do with the introduction of democracy into the trade union movement—pre-strike ballots and the free and secret election of those who lead the trade unions. Those improvements are threatened by the proposals being brought forward by he trade union and labour movement, which, I understand, are to be considered by a conference tomorrow.

Mr. Tim Smith: How many working days were lost because of industrial disputes in the last 12 months of the last Labour Government?

Mr. Clarke: Off the cuff, I do not remember the number of days lost in the winter of discontent, but certainly that was one of the worst years most of us can recall and it shows how dramatic has been the improvement since this Government came to power and improved our industrial relations system.

Mr. Prescott: Will the Paymaster General tell us whether he has carried out a comparison between the last six years of the Labour Government and the six years of this Government? I readily concede that the numbers of disputes has fallen by half, but does he not accept that the number of working days lost is almost approximately the same? That means that the average number of days lost per dispute has risen from 5,000 to nearly 9,000. That is a reflection of the bitterness and the length and cost of strikes and is the result of the Government's trade union legislation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman knows that there is a simple reason why our record is much better on the number of disputes but is almost comparable on the number of days lost. It is because of the huge number of days lost in one dispute, the miners' dispute, which was the last fling of violent, undemocratic industrial action and was supported by the Opposition.

Mr. Stokes: Is it not a great mercy that beer and sandwiches no longer need to be provided at 10 Downing street because strikes no longer take place?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have far fewer disputes and we have long given up the ridiculous process of trying to settle them over beer and sandwiches at 10 Downing street or at the Department of Employment.

Labour Statistics

12. Mr. Loyden asked the Paymaster General if he will give the latest figure of long-term unemployed in the Merseyside travel-to-work area.

Mr. Lang: On 9 January 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, 55,814 claimants in the Liverpool travel-to-work area had been unemployed for over one year.

Mr. Loyden: When will the Government recognise that unemployment is not a matter of statistics but represents human misery? In the Merseyside travel-to-work area the figure is a scandal. Nothing is being done by the Government about the problem. The bankruptcy of their policies is now exposed. When will they recognise that they have to do something positive for the long-term unemployed?

Mr. Lang: We certainly recognise the misery and anxiety behind the statistics of the unemployed. We are concerned about the problem and are anxious to help. That is why the Government have a wide range of schemes, which are designed specifically to bring help to the long-term unemployed in Merseyside and elsewhere.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend agree that the unemployment level in Merseyside is so high because of the disgraceful behaviour of councillors in that area?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend has a good point. If the public relations policy of councillors, let alone the way in which they run the council, was better, the many good things about Merseyside would become apparent. For example, the vast majority of firms in Merseyside have never been involved in industrial disputes.

Mr. Alton: Is the Minister aware that 78,000 men and 29,000 women in the city of Liverpool alone are currently out of work? Is he aware that prerequisites for employment are a willingness on the part of the local authority to show less aggression and confrontation and a willingness on the part of the Government to provide a major infrastructure scheme to take skilled people off the dole?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is right about local government. In regard to the role of the Government, I must tell him that Government aid to Merseyside amounted to over £1 billion in the last year, so nobody can say that the Government have not been giving help to Merseyside.

Long-Term Unemployed Persons

13. Mr. Holt asked the Paymaster General if there are any indications of the effect of in-depth counselling sessions on the employment opportunites of the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 6 January 1986 we established a scheme in nine pilot areas to find out whether the long-term unemployed would benefit from individual help and advice. Of those seen, 80 per cent. have been submitted to a job or to other employment or training opportunities, which should enhance their employment prospects.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for that reply, which is most encouraging. Will he extend that policy to new areas, including my constituency? When he is doing so, will he consider the great problems of relocation for many people who can find jobs but for whom moving to a new house in another area is impossible?

Mr. Clarke: We have always said that we would draw such lessons as we could from our scheme in the nine pilot areas as quickly as possible. I take on board my hon. Friend's second point. A great difficulty faces people who leave areas such as his when they find employment in the south-east and have to find a home. I appreciate all the work that my hon. Friend has put in to assist his constituents.

Ms. Clare Short: Does the Minister understand that the cause of unemployment is not the inadequacy of the unemployed in applying for jobs? Does he agree that if the Government continue with these schemes we shall have the most sophisticated unemployed job applicants in western Europe? What we need is a change of economic strategy to provide real jobs at decent wages so that people can make a contribution to society. None of the Government's schemes will help.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Lady ignores the fact that a rapidly increasing number of new jobs are being created in the economy and that there is a rapid increase in the number of vacancies being notified to jobcentres and remaining unfilled. One problem that the long-term unemployed often face, particularly in the more prosperous cities, is that they remain unemployed in a city where plenty of good jobs are available because they lack the skills. That is what we are trying to remedy.

Non-assisted Areas

14. Mr. Stern asked the Paymaster General if he will seek European Economic Community funding for special measures to promote employment in non-assisted areas.

Mr. Lang: Support is already available from the European social fund for some types of training and employment schemes in all parts of the country. While the fund's support is rightly concentrated on the areas of highest unemployment, we continue to support its role in promoting employment and training, particularly among disadvantaged groups, in all areas of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stern: I am grateful for that reply. Does my hon. Friend agree that in many pockets outside the assisted areas, including some in my constituency, unemployment is every bit as high as, if not higher than, unemployment in assisted areas? Will he use his best endeavours to ensure that it is made easier for such pockets of unemployment to obtain the European assistance that is already available in assisted areas?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. The boundaries for the priority areas are drawn up, not by us, but by the European Commission. Bristol has gained from the fund; over £1·5 million was spent there in 1985.

Youth Unemployment

15. Dr. Marek asked the Paymaster General if he will give the figures for the percentage increase in youth unemployment since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: Direct comparisons of unemployment by age since 1979 are not possible because of changes in the way the figures are collected. However, between January 1979 and October 1982 the number of unemployed registrants in the United Kingdom aged under 25 increased by 148 per cent. Between October 1982 and January 1986 the number of unemployed claimants aged under 25 increased by 4 per cent.

Dr. Marek: Does the Minister agree that the figures he has now given to the House about the recent small decline in the number of unemployed youth are only there because he has failed to consider those numbers in relation to the total percentage of youth available for work; that his Department has fiddled the figures by readjusting them every two years; that he has taken many of the young off the unemployment register because of their employment in the youth training scheme; and that young people, if there were real jobs and if they had real training, would go for those real jobs? Would he further agree that he has presided over the highest level of youth unemployment in living memory?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman cannot possibly say that the Department has fiddled the figures, when his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) admitted on a television programme that if he had been in the same position as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State he, too, would have accepted the advice of the Department's statisticians.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Fatchett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Fatchett: Last week the Prime Minister said that it was the responsibility of individuals to secure their own homes against the rising crime wave. Could she now tell the elderly of this country who are this week faced with enormous winter heating bills how she expects them to pay for their increased security, or was her reply last week just another example of her not caring for the people of this country?

The Prime Minister: The elderly can get help with crime prevention through the community programme and through the urban programme. In general, it is the personal responsibility of people to secure their own homes against crime, and it is well within their resources, at a time of a record standard of living, to do so. I recognise that the moment personal responsibility is mentioned the Opposition run a mile.

Mr. Onslow: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to congratulate British Aerospace on the spectacular success of its Giotto spacecraft as well as on the fact that, overall, British Aerospace has the largest order book of any British manufacturer? Will she also join me in wishing that the BBC and members of the Opposition would sometimes do more to proclaim the national and international achievements of that privatised company?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I gladly join my hon. Friend in congratulating British Aerospace both on its commercial success and on its excellent performance in research and development, evidence of which is the Giotto project, which excited many of us when we saw it on television last week.

Mr. Steel: Following her meeting yesterday with the chairman of British Airways, Lord King, and the apparent favouritism shown to the General Motors bid for Land Rover, will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to dispel the impression that she is hostile to management-employee ownership of firms?

The Prime Minister: We could hardly be that when we got a management buy-out for Vickers.

Q2. Mr. Hirst asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hirst: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the right to freedom of speech is a hallmark of a civilised and free society? Does she deplore the recent behaviour of a vocal minority of troublemakers on our university campuses who have sought to deny that right to Members of Parliament, Ministers and even university professors?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. Higher education requires freedom of thought and freedom of speech. It is not for people who expect to have that for themselves to seek to deny it to others. I believe that most people condemn that action and that most vice-chancellors, particularly after the statements they have made, will be very anxious to do all they can to ensure that it does not occur again.

Q3. Mr. Corbyn asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Prime Minister aware that her Government's first Budget in 1979 gave away more than £2 billion to those earning more than £20,000 a year, and that since her election in 1979 her Government have given £15,000 million in tax benefits to the wealthiest sector of the country? At the same time, taxation rates have never been higher for those earning less than £20,000 a year and unemployment has never been higher? Does she not agree that her Government's record is one of selflessly working for the wealthiest minority in the country?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. Income tax has been cut by £6 billion, which is the equivalent of £260 a year for a married man on average earnings. Real take-home pay for a married man on half average earnings has risen since 1979 by 11 per cent., compared with only 2·5 per cent. under Labour.

Q4. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Prime Minister is she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thorne: Will my right hon. Friend take time to consider the extraordinary behaviour of the leaders of the Opposition in their attitude—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask a question about a subject for which the Prime Minister has responsibility.

Mr. Thorne: What is my right hon. Friend's response to the Opposition's behaviour—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: That still does not fall within the Prime Minister's responsibility. The hon. Member can have one more go.

Mr. Thorne: Will my right hon. Friend consider the attitude of politicians who behave in such a way as to censor journalists acting for News International by refusing to contribute to its newspapers? Is that not one of the major reasons for the amount of violence on the picket lines at Wapping?

The Prime Minister: We totally condemn the censorship which is being practised in certain parts of the House against Mr. Murdoch and News International. We also condemn the censorship being practised against the Mirror Group in Scotland. We hope that others will join us in condemning such action.

Q5. Mr. Evans asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Evans: Why is the Prime Minister continuing her vindictive and cruel vendetta against the democratic, civil and individual rights of trade unionists at GCHQ?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary is seeing the GCHQ unions later this afternoon. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the action, which has been condemned, that Civil Service unions took during the strike, and of the selective action that they took against the security organisations upon which we depend so much for our defence.

Mr. Jim Spicer: Will my right hon. Friend accept the thanks of all the workers at Westland Helicopters for the efforts that she made on their behalf to secure the Indian contract?

The Prime Minister: The Indian order for Westland Helicopters has now been signed. That is a great relief and is very welcome. I first broached the subject with Mrs. Gandhi many years ago.

Q6. Mr. O'Neill asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. O'Neill: Will the Prime Minister tell the House and the country why she felt it more important to address Conservatives in Lowestoft last Saturday than to pay tribute to Olof Palme at his funeral?

The Prime Minister: I hope—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: I hope that most people will understand that party political conferences, which are fixed from year to year, naturally command the attention of a leader. I shall be attending Mr. Palme's memorial service on Thursday morning.

Mr. Gow: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it remains the Government's policy to return British Airways to genuine public ownership at the earliest possible moment?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that many hundreds of worthwhile and vitally necessary, voluntary organisations in various localities have not yet been told whether they will continue to receive support after the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils cease to exist at the end of this month? As she must recognise the value of those organisations, and as her Ministers gave assurances about the continuation of support for them, will she ensure that emergency attention is given before 1 April?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, many of the obligations were taken over either by central Government, as is the case with many organisations linked with the Arts Council, or by local authorities. Local authorities must consider those matters that have not yet been satisfactorily resolved.

Mr. Kinnock: In view of the Government's undertakings and the nature of many of the organisations, such as Age Concern, the widows' organisation, Cruse, playgroups and pensioner groups, will she accept that it is unfair to inflict further worries on the people who run voluntary organisations and on the many people who use them? Will she revise her answer to ensure that the Government accept their full responsibility?

The Prime Minister: The Government already give many headquarters grants to an enormous number of voluntary organisations. Indeed, speaking from memory, I think that taxpayers give more than £400 million to voluntary organisations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Macclesfield district is one of the best in the country for youth training and youth employment prospects because of the responsible local authority in the area and the positive attitude of employers? Of the 2,000 school leavers on the last occasion, only 35 are now unemployed. Does that not give her encouragement that her policies are working? Even at this late stage, will she prevail upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to impose any added costs on industry and commerce?

The Prime Minister: On the latter point, my hon. Friend must await what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to say. I congratulate my hon. Friend's local authority on its work with youth training schemes. It is important that we have the co-operation of local authorities and the supreme interest of employers. I congratulate my hon. Friend on what the local authority has done, and commend its example to others.

Oswaldtwistle

Q8. Mr. Hargreaves asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to pay an official visit to Oswaldtwistle.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Hargreaves: The people of the Quadrangle area of Oswaldtwistle will share my disappointment at that reply. Does my right hon. Friend agree that home improvement grants are the most cost-effective method of providing decent houses for our people? If so, will she have a final word with our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer so that he also gets the message?

The Prime Minister: Home improvement grants have been an excellent way of renovating many houses, and the level is still comparatively high compared with what it was when we came to office. A number of good rehabilitation schemes involving housing associations and the Housing Corporation have raised the standard of housing in my hon. Friend's area. Instead of bringing the bulldozer in, they have done up some terraced houses, to the great benefit of the people who live there.

Engagements

Q9. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Prime Minister accept that the growing differential between pay for those in work, who have increased their rates beyond the rate of inflation, and those out of work is an embittering factor in our society? Will the Government's post-Budget policies narrow that differential and reduce the bitterness?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that most people in work have had substantial pay increases and increases in net take-home pay. How much those out of work get depends on their particular circumstances and social security benefits. In some cases it is necessary to widen the gap between what they receive in social security benefits and what they receive in work.

Mr. Grylls: Is my right hon. Friend aware that most people will applaud the Government's decision to allow Vickers Shipbuilders to be returned to the private sector by means of a management buy-out? Will she assure the House that the Government will give careful consideration to the proposed management buy-out from Land Rover group, which has blue chip financial backing, and will allow the company and the people who work in it to enjoy the future success of Land Rover?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is giving close consideration to all the bids for parts of British Leyland, and will make a statement when he is in a position to do so, but that is not yet.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Prime Minister find time today to take to heart the anger of the leaders of disablement organisations at the intention of the Government to emasculate the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, which provides for those most in need, the carers who look after disabled people? Will the Government reconsider their position?

The Prime Minister: As hon. Members will know, the Government's position is to try to secure a Bill that is workable and that will continue to be so. I must also point out that the record of this Government on providing increased help for the disabled is outstanding, and greatly exceeds that of any previous Government.

Q10. Mr. Martin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 18 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Martin: Is it not madness that British Rail is closing railway workshops at a time when our railway engineering stock needs modernising? Will the right hon. Lady intervene in this matter?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, some of the new rolling stock requires much less maintenance and redesigning than the old, and we are not able to keep workshops open unless there is work for them to do.

BILL PRESENTED

CHESTERFIELD BOROUGH COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS)

Mr. Tony Benn presented a Bill to confer general powers upon the Chesterfield Borough Council; to restrict the powers of the District Auditor in relation to that Council; and for purposes connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Wednesday 19 March and to be printed. [Bill 106.]

Liverpool (Delegation)

Mr. Robert Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask for your guidance on an issue which has been raised in my constituency.

On 11 February I wrote to the Secretary of State for the Environment about the problem arising from the threatened closure of Croxteth park and Croxteth hall in my constituency. On 5 March I received an answer from Lord Elton, Minister of State. Among other things, he said that he did not believe that there was anything further that could be gained from meeting a delegation. I had asked him to meet a delegation from my constituency. Yet this morning my attention has been drawn to an article in last Thursday night's Liverpool Echo which states:

"Lord Elton, a Minister from the Department of the Environment, met Mossley Hill MP David Alton and members of the Croxteth Community Forum to discuss the park's plight."

I have written to the noble Lord, because I believe that he must have known when he wrote to me, and must have had in his diary, the date of the meeting with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). We need your protection, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister is not in this House to answer questions.

Yesterday, the right hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. St. John-Stevas) stated — I believe you would be in accord with that statement Mr. Speaker — that when issues arise in a Member's constituency, that matter should be the concern only of that Member. As the only Member representing the constituents of Liverpool, West Derby, I ask you to protect me from any usurper.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We also confirm that it is the job of any Member of this House when representations are made to take up grievances which concern—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point of order is to me. I cannot hear.

Mr. Alton: It is the job, Mr. Speaker, of Members of this House, when their constituents are employed in an institution, in whichever constituency it may be, or if their constituents use a facility, to take up that issue and to do their job on behalf of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker: I must say in reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) that this took place last Thursday, and I think there would have been opportunities to raise it other than today. It is not a matter for me whether a Minister sees a delegation or not. The hon. Gentleman must take that matter up with the Minister. As to the other matter, it is a convention—the whole House knows this—that we do not take up cases in each other's constituencies. That is a convention to which I think we should hold.

WAYS AND MEANS

Budget Statement

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Before I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it may be for the convenience of hon. Members if I remind them that at the end of the Chancellor's speech, as in past years, copies of the Budget resolutions will not be handed around in the Chamber but will be available to hon. Members in the Vote Office.

3.35 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): The background to this year's Budget——

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is mass unemployment.

Mr. Lawson: —is the dramatic and unprecedented fall in the world oil price. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] But the Government's objectives remain unchanged: the conquest of inflation and the creation of an enterprise culture. [Interruption.] And the Government's policies are unchanged, too: policies of sound money and free markets, not least, because these are the only routes to more jobs, and jobs that last.

So my Budget today will carry forward the themes of my two previous Budgets, and sow some seeds for the future. In the course of my speech, I shall begin by reviewing the general economic background to the Budget, and go on to deal with the specific issue of oil. I shall next discuss monetary policy and the fiscal prospect, both this year and next. I shall then turn to the question of direct help for the unemployed. Finally, I shall propose some changes in taxation designed to assist in achieving the economic objectives I have already outlined. As usual, a number of press releases, filling out the details of my proposals, will be available from the Vote Office as soon as I have sat down.

THE ECONOMIC BACKGROUND

I start with the economic background. The strength and durability of the current economic upswing continues to confound the commentators. We can now look back to five solid years of growth at around 3 per cent. a year. [Interruption.] Even more important, 1985 was the third successive year in which we secured the elusive combination of steady growth and low inflation—the first time this has been achieved since the 1960s. In 1985 as a whole, output grew by a further 3½ per cent., which was the highest rate of growth in the European Community, and higher than the United States, too. Within that total, non-oil exports grew by 7 per cent., to reach yet another all-time record.

Despite a marked slowdown in the growth of world trade from the heady pace of 1984, the current account of the balance of payments was in surplus for the sixth year in succession—this time by some £3 billion. Inflation ended the year at around 5½ per cent. and falling. Employment continued to rise, although still not fast enough to reduce the distressingly high number of people out of work. [HON. MEMBERS: "Record unemployment."] I shall have more to say about unemployment later. Manufacturing industry, the subject of so much ill-informed comment, had another successful year, with its output up by 3 per cent., its productivity up by almost 4 per cent., and both its investment and its exports up by 6 per cent.

At the heart of this success lies a remarkable turn-around in productivity. In the six years prior to 1979, Britain's annual rate of growth of manufacturing productivity, at less than 1 per cent., was the lowest of all the Group of Five major industrial nations. In the six years since 1979, our annual rate of growth of manufacturing productivity, at 3½ per cent., has been second only to that of Japan.

Looking ahead, I expect 1986 to be a further year of steady growth with low inflation. Indeed, with output forecast to rise by 3 per cent., and inflation to fall to 3½ per cent., 1986 is set to register our best overall performance in terms of output and inflation for a generation. The pattern of growth should show a satisfactory balance, too, with exports and investment expected to grow rather faster than consumer spending as a whole — as indeed they have during the sustained upswing. But the uncertainties inherent in all these forecasts, good though their track record has been, are reinforced by constant reminders that we live in an uncertain and turbulent world.

One particularly difficult aspect of this is the febrile nature of the world currency markets. There has been some improvement here. The Plaza agreement between the Group of Five Finance Ministers last September has undoubtedly led to a more sustainable pattern of exchange rates worldwide. Since that meeting, the dollar has fallen by some 16 per cent. against the other major currencies as a whole, with the pound moving up by 7 per cent., the deutschmark by 26 per cent. and the yen by 36 per cent. —a pattern broadly in line with what those of us who were party to the agreement had hoped to see.

This process will be assisted further if the passage of the Gramm-Rudman amendment manages to secure its objective of a much-needed reduction in the United States budget deficit. Meanwhile, the Plaza agreement has already succeeded in reducing, at least for the time being, the dangerous protectionist pressures that were building up in the United States. Provided we are not over-ambitious, I believe that the Plaza accord is something we can usefully build on. But the most dramatic development on the world economic scene, and one of considerable importance to this country, has of course been the collapse in the price of oil.

OIL

I presented my Budget last year at the end of a 12-month coal strike. I observed at the time that it was a remarkable tribute to the underlying strength of the British economy that it had been able to withstand so long and damaging a strike in such good shape. We now have to face a challenge of a very different kind. Over the past few months, the price of oil has almost halved, and with it our prospective North sea oil tax revenues and earnings from oil exports. In real terms, the price of oil is now back to what it was at the end of 1973.

Not surprisingly, perhaps, this initially caused a fair amount of turmoil in the financial markets, with sterling under pressure. I decided that it was right to respond with an immediate 1 per cent. rise in short-term interest rates in early January, and this helped to prevent the downward movement of the exchange rate from developing an unhealthy momentum of its own. But equally I thought it right to resist the pressure, which for a time was very strong indeed, to raise interest rates still further. That pressure in due course subsided, and, though the financial markets remain somewhat volatile, the mood has changed considerably, assisted by a modest but welcome reduction in interest rates overseas.

Meanwhile, let me repeat that there is no question whatever, and never has been any question, of the United Kingdom cutting back its oil production in an attempt to secure a higher oil price. In the first place, the whole outstanding success of the North sea has been based on the fact that it is the freest oil province in the world—[HON MEMBERS: "We need to be."]—in which decisions on levels of output are a matter for the companies and not for the Government. In the second place, we are not only, or even principally, a major oil producer; we are also a major world producer and trader of many other goods and services, and a major oil consumer.

There is no overall United Kingdom national interest in keeping oil prices high. I am of course aware that a report, recently published in another place, and which attracted a certain amount of publicity at the time, predicted:

"as the oil revenues diminish the country will experience adverse effects which will worsen with time"— effects, it was said, of a most alarming nature. Had the authors of that report dreamed at the time they wrote it that half the oil revenues were about to disappear within a matter of months, their conclusions would no doubt have been even more apocalyptic. As the House knows, I have always believed their analysis, which was widely shared by Opposition Members, to be profoundly mistaken. Certainly, it will be put to the test sooner than anyone expected.

The United Kingdom is likely to remain an oil producer, of a gradually diminishing volume of oil, for the next 25 years or so. If we can survive unscathed the loss of half our North sea oil revenues in less than 25 weeks, the prospective loss of the other half over the remainder of the next 25 years should not cause us undue concern. [Laughter.]

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lawson: It is, of course, true that in relative terms we do lose from the collapse of the oil price—the really big gains will be made by the major non-oil-producing countries, such as Germany and Japan, where growth will be boosted and inflation, already low, is likely to fall virtually to zero.

Inevitably, we suffer a decline, too, in the value of our net oil exports. But the oil price fall will be beneficial for the industrialised world as a whole. Even for the United Kingdom, what we gain on the swings should, over time, more than offset what we lose on the roundabouts. In particular, I expect that the levels of economic activity and inflation will, if anything, be slightly better than they would have been without the oil price collapse.

What of the balance of payments? Thanks to the abolition of exchange controls in 1979, we have been able to use a good part of our earnings from North sea oil since then to build up a massive stock of overseas assets. Our net overseas assets have, in fact, risen more than sevenfold from £12 billion at the end of 1979 to almost £90 billion at the end of last year. This is a far bigger total than that possessed by any other major nation, with the perhaps inevitable exception of Japan. The earnings from those assets will be of increasing value to our balance of payments in the years ahead — so, too, should the improvement in our manufacturing trade balance.

Although the British economy may not gain a great deal overall as a result of the oil price collapse, there will be considerable differences within the economy. The major potential beneficiary will be the international trading sector of industry in general, and manufacturing in particular, which is already enjoying both lower oil costs and a lower exchange rate against most of its major competitors, at a time when inflation is falling.

This provides British industry with an outstanding opportunity both to increase its exports and to reduce import penetration in the home market, but it will only be able to seize that opportunity if it meets two conditions. First, it must keep firmer control of its labour costs. Secondly, it must spend more of its much healthier level of profits on investing for the future in research and development and in training. Both the opportunity, and the responsibility to see that it is not thrown away, rest fairly and squarely on the shoulders of British management. Meanwhile, despite the massive fall in oil prices, I expect the current account of the balance of payments to remain in sizeable surplus this year, by some £3½ billion.

As I have indicated, there will be pluses and minuses within the economy. If industry is the main gainer, the main loser, at least today, is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I can live with that, but it does mean that North sea oil revenues, which are likely to amount to some £11½ billion for 1985-86, are bound to be very much less in 1986-87. Indeed, on the assumption of an average North sea oil price for the rest of this year of $15 a barrel, which is close to the average published price for the past month of around $16 a barrel, oil revenues in 1986-87 will be virtually halved, at some £6 billion. This has obvious implications for the Budget, but the important fact is that, just as we successfully weathered a year-long coal strike, so we have been able to take the unprecedented collapse in the oil price in our stride.

We have been able to do so, first, because of the underlying strength of the economy in terms of growth, inflation and the external account; and, secondly, by virtue of the reputation we have earned over seven years for sound and prudent financial management.

MONETARY POLICY

The framework within which that sound and prudent financial management has been pursued, and will continue to be pursued, is the Government's medium-term financial strategy. It provides as firm a guarantee against inadequate money demand as it does against excessive money demand. At the heart of the MTFS lies the objective of steadily reducing the growth of total spending power in the economy, as measured by GDP in cash terms, at a pace that will gradually squeeze inflation out of the system while at the same time leaving adequate room for sustained growth in real output——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): What about money supply?

Mr. Lawson: —and that we have done.

Over the past six years the rate of growth of money GDP has been halved, and a further significant reduction is envisaged for 1986-87. This has brought about a combination of low inflation and steady growth. We shall continue to maintain steady downward pressure on inflation. That means, above all, controlling the growth of money in the economy.

Last year I set target ranges of 3 to 7 per cent. for narrow money, MO, and 5 to 9 per cent. for broad money, sterling M3. During 1985-86, the targeted measure of narrow money has grown towards the bottom end of its range. The target range for next year will be 2 to 6 per cent. as foreshadowed in last year's MTFS.

For broad money it has been clear since the autumn that the range was set too low. Throughout the 1980s—and in sharp contrast to the 1970s—broad money has grown far faster than money GDP. Experience has demonstrated that this has not posed a threat to inflation. This rapid growth largely reflects the increased attractions of holding interest-bearing deposits, at a time both of low inflation and high real interest rates, and of innovation and liberalisation in the financial system. Accordingly, I am setting next year's target range for broad money well above that indicated in last year's MTFS, at 11-15 per cent. Given the experience of the past six years, I believe this is not only a more realistic range, but one which is wholly consistent with the further decline in inflation which I intend to achieve.

Short-term interest rates are the essential instrument of monetary policy. Changes in interest rates have a reasonably quick and direct effect on narrow money, as they do on the exchange rate. Their effect on braod money is more complex and much more delayed. As explained in the Red Book, there is thus an important difference in the operational significance of the targets for narrow and broad money. Needless to say, I shall continue to monitor the evidence of other financial indicators, of which the most important is the exchange rate. I will say no more about monetary policy — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—except to repeat what I said at the Mansion house last Autumn: that while financial liberalisation and innovation have inevitably made the process of monetary management more complicated, there has been no change whatever in the essence of policy. The Government continue to attach the highest priority to sound money.

PUBLIC SECTOR BORROWING

Though there is nothing sacrosanct about the precise mix, monetary policy must always be supported by an appropriate fiscal policy. That means, in plain English, keeping borrowing low.

The outturn for the public sector borrowing requirement in 1984-85, which had to bear the bulk of the cost of resisting the coal strike, was £10 billion, or just over 3 per cent. of GDP. In my Budget last year I planned to reduce it substantially in 1985-86, to £7 billion, or 2 per cent. of GDP. In the event, despite the loss of £2 billion of north sea oil revenue, this year's PBSR looks like turning out at a little under £7 billion, given that the total for the first 11 months of this year comes to under £3 billion.

This successful outcome, which represents the most substantial reduction in the PSBR as a proportion of GDP since 1981-82, is attributable to two factors. First, public expenditure has been kept under firm control. Not only is the outturn likely to be within the planning total, but spending in 1985-86 is expected to be below the previous year's level in real terms, even after allowing for the effects of the coal strike. The second factor behind the successful PSBR outturn for 1985-86 is that the £2 billion shortfall in oil revenues has been offset by the increased buoyancy of non-oil revenues, reflecting a healthy economy and an increasingly profitable corporate sector.

Last year's MTFS indicated a PSBR for 1986-87 of £7½ billion, or 2 per cent. of GDP. Some would argue that, in the light of the £2½ billion increase in projected privatisation proceeds, I ought to aim well below that. Others on the other hand would claim that, since the sharp drop envisaged in oil revenues is more than double the rise in privatisation proceeds, a higher figure would be appropriate.

As last year, my judgment is that the wisest course is to stick broadly to our pre-announced figure, but, given the uncertainties over the oil price, I have decided, within that framework, to err on the side of caution, and provide for a PSBR of £7 billion, or 1¾ per cent. of GDP.

Needless to say, that does not enable me to reduce taxation by anything like the £3½ billion foreshadowed in last year's MTFS. Indeed, given the assumed loss of £5½ billion of oil revenues in 1986-87, compared with what was envisaged a year ago, I would have expected to have had to increase taxes in this year's Budget. However, not only have the tax revenues this year from the 95 per cent. of the economy that is not oil proved to be notably buoyant, but there is every sign that this will continue into 1986-87, assisted by a rather higher rate of economic growth than was foreseen in last year's MTFS.

The continued vigour of the non-North sea economy, which is likely to add well over £3 billion to expected non-North sea tax revenues, coupled with public spending which remains under firm control, has transformed what might otherwise have been a bleak prospect. As a result, I am able this year to accommodate a relatively modest net reduction in the real burden of taxation, of a shade under £1 billion. It may well be that the oil price turns out to be different from the average of $15 a barrel, which I have assumed for this year's Budget, but if any departure is purely short term, it is most unlikely to have any significance for policy.

HELP FOR THE UNEMPLOYED

I turn now to the continuing problem of high unemployment. It is a problem that can be solved—and there is no secret about how. The solution to the problem of unemployment — it is the only solution — requires progress on two key fronts. The first is a sustained improvement in the performance of business and industry, and thus of the economy as a whole. That is what every aspect of the Government's economic policy has been designed to assist, and it is already achieving impressive results. The second is a level of pay which enables workers to be priced into jobs instead of pricing them out of jobs, and which in particular ensures that British industry can hold its own against our major international competitors.

It is here that Britain's weakness lies. The plain fact is that labour costs per unit of output in British business and industry continue to rise faster than is consistent with low unemployment and faster than our principal competitors overseas. Productivity is, certainly rising quite rapidly, but pay is rising faster still.

It is this—and not our alleged dependence on oil—that constitutes the Achilles' heel of the British economy.

In a free economy — as the CBI has frankly and commendably acknowledged—it is the responsibility of employers and management to control industry's cost structure in general and its wage costs in particular. In the new and improved climate of industrial relations, and with inflation falling and set to fall further, there can be no excuse for failure to discharge that responsibility. I have, however, considered whether there is anything further Government can do to assist this over the longer term.

The problem we face in this country is not just the level of pay in relation to productivity, but also the rigidity of the pay system. If the only element of flexibility is in the numbers of people employed, then redundancies are inevitably more likely to occur. One way out of this might be to move to a system in which a significant proportion of an employee's remuneration depends directly on the company's profitability per person employed. This would not only give the work force a more direct personal interest in their company's success, as existing employee share schemes do; it would also mean that, when business is slack, companies would be under less pressure to lay men off; and by the same token they would, in general, be keener to take them on.

This would clearly be in industry's own interest, and most emphatically in the best interests of the unemployed. It should therefore occur without any prompting from Government. But there is considerable inertia to overcome, so it might make sense to offer some temporary measure of tax relief to the employees concerned to help get profit-sharing agreements of the right kind off the ground, and to secure the benefits that would undoubtedly accrue if they really caught on.

Inevitably, the design of such a relief, and the precise definition of qualifying agreements, would need to be drawn with considerable care. The Government therefore propose to discuss with employers and others to see if a workable scheme can be defined which offers the prospect of a worthwhile and broadly based take-up. If these preliminary discussions were sufficiently encouraging, we would prepare a consultative document setting out a detailed scheme for wider consideration.

Meanwhile, there is more we can do of an immediate nature to help the unemployed. In my Budget last year I announced the Government's intention to launch a new two-year youth training scheme, leading to recognised vocational qualifications. The new and expanded YTS will duly come into operation next month. It will be a giant step towards our objective of ensuring that no youngster under the age of 18 need be unemployed.

I also announced in last year's Budget a substantial expansion of the community programme to help the long-term unemployed—those who have been out of work for over a year, or, in the case of those between 18 and 24, for more than six months. The community programme, which offers work for up to a year on projects of benefit to the community, is currently providing almost 200,000 places. I have agreed with my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to provide the funds to raise the eventual target for this year to 255,000 places—very nearly double the number that existed a year ago..

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): You used to say these were not real jobs.

Mr. Lawson: At the same time, the average wage limit for the community programme will be increased to £67 a week from next month.

Last November, my right hon. and noble Friend announced two pilot schemes to provide further help for the long-term unemployed. These new initiative, which began in January, are a counselling scheme open to all the long-term unemployed in the pilot areas, and a jobstart allowance of £20 a week for six months for those long-term unemployed who take a job at less than £80 a week.

Mr. Prescott: Tea and sympathy.

Mr. Lawson: These pilot schemes are already producing results, and I have accordingly decided to provide the funds to develop them into a single programme covering the entire country. This means that every single one of the long-term unemployed throughout the land will be offered individual help and advice in finding a job.

Mr. Prescott: But no job.

Mr. Lawson: I shall also be providing the resources to launch a brand new scheme—the new workers scheme —to help 18 to 20-year-olds to find a job. This will provide for a payment of £15 a week for a year to any employer taking on an 18 or 19-year-old at up to £55 a week or a 20-year-old at up to £65 a week. The new workers scheme should provide a worthwhile incentive for employers to create jobs for young people.

Finally, I have agreed to a substantial enlargement of the proven and highly successful enterprise allowance scheme — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] — which makes payments of £40 a week for up to a year to assist unemployed men and women to set up in business on their own account. Funds will be provided that will enable the annual rate of entry to the enterprise allowance scheme to be increased steadily from its present figure of 65,000 to 100,000 by April 1987, and to provide more training for those involved. At the same time I propose to improve the tax treatment of payments made under this scheme.

The total public expenditure cost of the measures I have outlined, together with consequential spending in Northern Ireland, comes to £195 million in 1986-87 and £285 million in 1987-88. These gross costs will, however, be partly offset by savings on social security benefits, leaving a net public expenditure cost of £100 million in 1986-87 and £165 million in 1987-88. This will be financed from the reserve, and there will therefore be no overall addition to planned public spending.

BUSINESS AND ENTERPRISE

I now turn to the taxation of business and enterprise. [HON. MEMBERS: "Is that all about jobs?"] Hon. Members opposite would do well to listen. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] While the measures I have just announced help the unemployed directly, in the long run what really matters is the creation of a climate in which business and industry flourish. For it is companies, not Governments, which create jobs. The reformed system of business taxation which I introduced in my 1984 Budget has reached the end of its transitional phase and comes fully into force next month. From then on the United Kingdom will have, at 35 per cent., the lowest rate of corporation tax of any major industrial nation.

This year I have only two further amendments to make. First, I propose to ensure a full measure of depreciation for tax purposes for short-life agricultural buildings and works, by giving the taxpayer the option of making balancing adjustments on the sale or destruction of such buildings. Secondly, I propose to reform the mines and oil wells allowances broadly along the lines of the proposals published in last July's consultative document. The overall net benefit of this to the industries concerned will amount to £45 million in 1987-88. Otherwise I propose only minor technical changes to the taxation of North sea oil; but I am continuing to keep the economics of incremental investment under review, and shall not hesitate to introduce at the earliest opportunity any changes which may prove necessary to ensure that worthwhile projects are not frustrated by the fiscal regime.

I need to set the 1987-88 car and fuel benefit scale charges for those with company cars. At the same time, the motor industry has represented to me that the discrepancy between the engine size break points in these scales and the break points in the new European Community directive on car exhaust emissions is potentially damaging to its international competitiveness. Accordingly, I propose, from April 1987, to change our break points to those in the new directive.

At the same time, as last year, I propose to increase the restructured car benefit scale charges by 10 per cent. This will still leave the scale charges well short of the true value of the benefit. The fuel scale will also be restructured, but there will be no general increase in the charges; and as from April 1987 the same scale will also be used to assess the VAT due on petrol used by registered traders and their employees. This will be simpler and more equitable than the present system, and will also bring in an extra £40 million of revenue in 1987-88.

I propose to increase the VAT threshold to £20,500, in line with the maximum permitted under existing European Community law.

I also propose to correct an anomaly in the taxation of international entertainers and sportsmen. When British entertainers or sportsmen work overseas, the foreign tax authorities normally levy a withholding tax on their earnings, but at the present time we levy no such tax on the earnings of foreign entertainers and sportsmen when they work in the United Kingdom. I believe that in future we should fall into line with most of the rest of the world. Accordingly, I propose to withhold tax at the basic rate on the earnings of overseas entertainers and sportsmen in the United Kingdom. This should yield £75 million in 1987-88.

A key element in the Government's strategy for jobs is the encouragement of new businesses. As the House knows, I have been reviewing the future of the business expansion scheme, which is due to come to an end in April 1987. I have been assisted in this review by the independent report commissioned by the Inland Revenue from the consultants Peat Marwick which is being published in full today. I am placing a copy in the Library of the House.

It is quite clear—this is confirmed by the evidence in the Peat Marwick report—that the business expansion scheme, which my predecessor introduced in 1983 as an improvement on the 1981 business start-up scheme, has been an outstanding success. It has fully achieved its aim of attracting new equity capital into unquoted companies. The amount subscribed has been running at well over £100 million a year, and steadily rising; and a high proportion of this has gone into new and small businesses. Roughly half the companies involved raised sums of less than £50,000 each.

Mr. Straw: How many in manufacturing?

Mr. Lawson: I therefore have no hesitation in proposing to extend the life of the business expansion scheme indefinitely. But at the same time, despite the exclusions of farmland and property development in my two previous Budgets, I am still concerned that too much BES money is being diverted from the high-risk areas for which the scheme was always intended into areas where the risk is very much less. Accordingly, I propose from now on to exclude from the scheme all companies holding more than half their net assets in the form of land and buildings. I also propose to exclude companies whose main purpose is to invest in objects, such as fine wines, whose value may be expected to rise over time. [Interruption.]

At the same time, I have one new inclusion to announce. I have decided to bring within the scope of the BES companies engaged in the chartering of United Kingdom-registered ships. This will provide new opportunities for investment in shipping engaged in the coastal, short sea and offshore trades. I propose to take power to make further changes in the ambit of the scheme by order.

Finally, having taken steps to target the business expansion scheme more carefully, I propose to improve it. BES shares issues after today will be entirely free of capital gains tax on their first sale. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] As a further measure of help for small and new businesses, the loan guarantee scheme, under which the Government guarantee 70 per cent. of qualifying bank loans, will also be extended, in this case for a further three years. The House will be glad to learn that the premium will be halved, from 5 per cent. to 2½ per cent.

My last proposal in this section concerns capital transfer tax which, ever since its introduction by the Labour Government in 1974, has been a thorn in the side of those owning and running family businesses, and as such has had a damaging effect on risk taking and enterprise within a particularly important sector of the economy. In addition to statutory indexation of the threshold and rate bands, I propose this year to reform the tax radically.

In essence, the capital transfer tax is two taxes, as its two separate scales imply: an inheritance tax and a lifetime gifts tax. We have had an inheritance tax in some shape or form ever since Sir William Harcourt introduced his estate duty in 1894. But the lifetime gifts tax which the Labour Government introduced in 1974, in the teeth of united Conservative opposition, is an unwelcome and unwarranted impost. By deterring lifetime giving, it has had the effect of locking in assets, particularly the ownership of family businesses, often to the detriment of the businesses concerned.

Accordingly, I propose to abolish entirely the tax on lifetime gifts to individuals. As with the old estate duty, there will be a tapered charge on gifts made within seven years of death and provisions to charge gifts made with reservation; and the regime for trusts, which is needed as a protection for the death charge, will be kept broadly unchanged. The cost of abolishing the tax on lifetime giving will be £35 million in 1986-87 and £55 million in 1987-88.

In recognition of the radically changed nature of the tax, I have decided to rename it the inheritance tax. My two previous Budgets abolished three unnecessary taxes: the national insurance surcharge, the investment income surcharge and development land tax. The abolition of the tax on lifetime gifts adds a fourth.

SAVINGS AND INVESTMENT

I now turn to the taxation of savings and investment. In my 1984 Budget, I introduced a major reform of the taxation of savings and investment, designed to improve the direction and quality of both. Today I propose to carry this reform further forward. The Social Security Bill now before Parliament proposes important and far-reaching changes in pension provision, notably by encouraging the growth of personal pensions. Those changes—to which the Government attach the highest importance—have been warmly welcomed, both for the greater freedom they will give to existing pension scheme members and for the new scope they will offer to the millions of working people who are not in an occupational pension scheme.

In the light of these changes, I intend later this year to publish detailed proposals designed to give personal pensions the same favourable tax treatment as is currently enjoyed by retirement annuities. Publication of these proposals will enable there to be the widest possible consultation prior to legislation in next year's Finance Bill. Meanwhile, I can assure the House that, as I made clear last year, I have no plans to change that favourable tax treatment.

However, I do need to deal with the growing problem of the rules governing pension fund surpluses. The dramatic improvement in the financial climate compared with a decade ago, most notably as a result of the sharp fall in inflation, has seen a number of pension funds become heavily over-funded. This presents a double problem, both aspects of which the Inland Revenue is at present having to deal with through the exercise of its discretionary powers.

In the first place, excessive surpluses, even if they arise unintentionally, represent the misuse of a tax privilege which was intended to assist the provision of pensions, and for no other purpose. So the Inland Revenue requires from time to time that surpluses be diminished. However, at the same time, the Inland Revenue feels obliged to turn down many of the increasing number of requests from companies which, often for good reasons, wish to take refunds from their pension fund into the company itself.

The absence of clear rules on how surpluses should and may be dealt with, and the consequent reliance that has to be placed on the exercise by the Inland Revenue of its discretion, have created considerable uncertainty and have unnecessarily constrained trustees' freedom of action. Therefore, I propose to replace these discretionary arrangements with clear and objective statutory provisions.

In future, the amount of any surplus in a fund will be determined for tax purposes in accordance with published guidelines, based on a secure funding method and prudent actuarial assumptions, as advised by the Government Actuary. Where a surplus is 5 per cent. or less of total liabilities, no action will need to be taken. Where it is higher than that, action will be required to eliminate the excess.

It will be entirely a matter for the trustees and employers to decide whether the reduction is to be achieved by increasing benefits, or by reducing contributions, or by making a refund to the company. If, and only if, they choose to make a refund, the employer will be liable to tax at a rate of 40 per cent. of the amount refunded, so as broadly to recover the tax relief previously given. The effect of these new arrangements is likely to be a yield of £20 million in 1986-87 and £120 million in 1987-88.

Next, stamp duty. I have no change to propose in the stamp duty on houses and other property, which I reduced to 1 per cent. with a higher threshold in my 1984 Budget, but there is a formidable case this year for a further reduction in the rate of stamp duty on share transfers. The City of London is the pre-eminent financial centre of Europe. The massive £6 billion it contributes to our invisible earnings is but one measure of the resulting benefit to the British economy.

Competition in financial services nowadays is not continental, but global. The City revolution now under way, due to culminate in the ending of fixed commissions, the so-called big bang, on 27 October, is essential if London is to compete successfully against New York and Tokyo. If London cannot win a major share of the global securities market, its present world pre-eminence in other financial services will be threatened. Successful competition depends on a number of factors, but one of the most important is the level of dealing costs. The abolition of fixed commissions will certainly help, but with no tax at all on share transactions in New York, and roughly ½ per cent. in Tokyo, under the existing tax regime London will still be vulnerable.

I therefore propose to reduce stamp duty on share transactions from 1 per cent. to ½ per cent. as from the date of the big bang. It is right that the full cost of this should be met from within the financial sector itself and accordingly, I propose to bring into tax at the new ½ per cent. rate a range of financial transactions which are at present entirely free of stamp duty. These include transactions in loan stock other than short bonds and gilt-edged securities, transactions unwound within a single stock exchange account, letters of allotment, the purchase by a company of its own shares, and takeovers and mergers. There will also be a special rate of 5 per cent. on the conversion of United Kingdom shares into ADRs and other forms of depositary receipt. Some of these changes, including the new ADR charge, will take effect immediately: others will be delayed until the big bang.

This further halving of the stamp duty on equities should enable London to compete successfully in the worldwide securities market, and it will also provide a further fillip to wider share ownership in the United Kingdom. Just as we have made Britain a nation of home owners so it is the long-term ambition of this Government to make the British people a nation of share owners, too; to create a popular capitalism in which more and more men and women have a direct personal stake in British business and industry. Through the rapid growth of employee share schemes, and through the outstandingly successful privatisation programme, much progress has been made —but not enough. Nor, I fear, will we ever achieve our goal as long as the tax system continues to discriminate so heavily in favour of institutional investment rather than direct share ownership.

Accordingly, I propose to introduce a radical new scheme to encourage direct investment in United Kingdom equities. Starting next January, any adult will be able to invest up to £200 a month, or £2,400 a year, in shares. These will be held in a special account which I am calling a personal equity plan. As long as the investment is kept in the plan for a relatively short minimum period of between one and two years, all reinvested dividends and all capital gains on disposals will be entirely free of tax. The longer the investment is kept in the plan, the more the tax relief will build up and the greater will be the benefits, and there will normally be no need for Inland Revenue to get involved at all.

Although the scheme will be open to everyone, it is specially designed to encourage smaller savers, and particularly those who may never previously have invested in equities in their lives. The plans will be simple and flexible to operate. Anyone who is legally able to deal in securities will be eligible to register as a plan manager, but the investor himself will own the shares and the rights that go with them, including voting rights. It will be for the investor to choose whether to make the investment decisions himself or to give the plan manager authority to act on his behalf. The cost of the scheme will be around £25 million in 1987-88, but will build up in later years as more plans are taken out.

This is a substantial, innovative and exciting new scheme. I am confident that, over time, it will bring about a dramatic extension of share ownership in Britain. Although wholly different in structure from the Loi Monory in France, I expect it to be every bit as successful in achieving its objective. I am sure the whole House will welcome this far-reaching package of measures to reform the taxation of savings and investment.

CHARITIES

I turn now to the tax treatment of charities and charitable giving. In almost every facet of the nation's affairs, it becomes increasingly clear that private action is more effective than state action. This is particularly well illustrated by the success of charitable organisations up and down the land in the fields of famine relief, social welfare, medicine, education, including the universities, the arts and the heritage.

The Government have already done a great deal to assist charities, both through the tax system and in other ways, but the time has come to take a further step forward. The first question is whether any further fiscal relief should be given to the charities themselves, through relief from VAT, or to the act of giving.

In the light of representations from the Charities VAT Reform Group, I am prepared this year, exceptionally, to make a number of specific concessions on the VAT front. I propose to relieve charities from VAT on their non-classified press advertising; on medicinal products where they are engaged in the treatment or care of people or animals, or in medical research; on lifts and distress alarm systems for the handicapped—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—on refrigeration and video equipment for use in medical applications purchased by charities from donated funds; on all recording equipment for talking books and newspapers used by charities for the blind; and on welfare vehicles used by charities to transport the deaf, blind or mentally handicapped.

But in general, I am convinced that the right way to help charities is not by relieving the charities themselves from VAT, but by encouraging the act of charitable giving. I say this for two principal reasons. First, it is clearly better that the amount of tax relief is related to the amount of support a charity is able to attract, rather than to the value of goods and services it happens to purchase. Secondly, whereas a pound of VAT relief is worth precisely that, a pound of tax relief on giving is likely to generate more than a pound of income going to charity.

My principal proposals therefore relate directly to the act of giving to charity. First, I propose to abolish altogether the upper limit on relief at the higher rates of income tax on charitable covenants. At the same time, I propose to act to stop the abuse of the tax system by ensuring that tax relief goes only to money which is used for charitable purposes.

Next companies. It is widely believed that corporate giving to charity would be more generous than it is at present if tax relief did not depend on the company entering into a four-year covenant. Accordingly, I propose to allow public companies to enjoy tax relief on one-off gifts to charity up to a maximum of 3 per cent. of the company's annual dividend payment to its shareholders. There will, of course, continue to be no limit on the amount a company can covenant to charity.

Many charities, however, have made clear to me their fear that to introduce a similar relief for one-off donations by individuals would weaken them by reducing the stability they enjoy as a result of the binding force of covenants. Instead, therefore, I propose to encourage individual giving to charity by a different means, that of tax relief for payroll giving. From April 1987 it will be open to any employer to set up a scheme under which employees can have charitable donations of up to £100 a year deducted from their pay, and get tax relief on them.

All in all, the proposals I have announced today add up to a very substantial package of assistance to charities and charitable giving. Their cost to the Exchequer will depend on how generously companies and employees respond to this initiative, but my best estimate is that it could amount to as much as £70 million in 1987-88. This will be partly paid for by the measures to curb abuse, which may save some £20 million a year. I hope that the additional charitable giving these concessions stimulate will be at least twice the amount of the extra tax relief given.

TAXES ON SPENDING

I now turn to the taxation of spending. So far as the indirect taxes are concerned, the overriding question this year is how far I should recover from the oil consumer the tax revenues I have lost from the oil producer, as a result of the massive fall in the oil price. Since November the price of petrol at the pump has fallen by anything up to 15p a gallon, but if the oil companies had passed on the full amount of the fall in the oil price to date, the price of petrol at the pump could have been 12p a gallon lower still. There is clearly scope, therefore, for a sizeable increase in petrol tax this year.

I have concluded, however, that at the present time, while I must certainly maintain the real value of the revenue I get from the motorist, I will not increase it. But I do believe it makes sense to look again, in the light of the radically changed circumstances, at the relative weight of petrol tax and vehicle excise duty. Accordingly, I propose to increase the duty on petrol by an amount which, including VAT, would—if it were wholly passed on to the consumer—[HON. MEMBERS: "And it will be"]—raise the price at the pump by 7½p a gallon. [Laughter.] This is 2p more than is needed to keep pace with inflation, and that 2p enables me to keep vehicle excise duty at last year's level of £100 for cars and light vans, leaving the overall burden on the motorist unchanged in real terms. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Moreover, given the very substantial increase in the oil companies' margins, there is clearly no need for the pump price of petrol to go up at all. Indeed, it ought to fall further. In the same way, I propose to increase the duty on derv by an amount which—if it were wholly passed on to the consumer, which, to repeat, it should certainly not be—would raise the price at the pump by 6½p, including VAT. This will enable me to avoid any general increase this year in the vehicle excise duty on lorries, too.

So far as the other oil duties are concerned, I have one or two changes to make—not to the duty on heavy fuel oil, which will remain unchanged as it has done since 1980, but I propose to increase the very modest duty on gasoil, by 1½p a gallon, and I propose to abolish altogether the duties on aviation kerosene, or Avtur—which at present is taxed for domestic flights only—and on most lubricating oils. All these changes in duty will take effect from 6 o'clock this evening.

Finally, so far as oil products are concerned, I am anxious to do what I reasonably can to assist the introduction of lead-free petrol. The case for this on environmental grounds is clear. I have therefore decided to create a duty differential in its favour to offset its higher production costs. My officials will be discussing with the oil companies how this can best be achieved in time for next year's Budget.

Next, tobacco. In the light of the representations that I have received on health grounds, I have decided to increase the duty on cigarettes by appreciably more than is needed to keep pace with inflation. I therefore propose an increase in the duty on cigarettes and hand-rolling tobacco by the equivalent, including VAT, of approximately 11p on a packet of 20 cigarettes. This will take effect from midnight on Thursday. As last year, I propose no increase at all on the duties on cigars and pipe tobacco, which are more heavily taxed here than in most comparable countries.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Absolutely right.

Mr. Lawson: Next, drink. As the House will recall, I was obliged in 1984 to increase the duty on beer by slightly more than I would have wished, as a consequence of the judgment against the United Kingdom in the European Court. I now propose no increase at all in the duty on beer. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear,"] Nor do I propose any increase in the duties on cider, table wine, sparkling wine, fortified wine or spirits. This last decision will, I hope, be particularly welcome in Scotland.

Finally, VAT, I propose to stop the misuse of long-stay relief for hotel accommodation, and make certain other minor changes, but I have no proposals for major changes in value added tax this year.

The changes I have announced in the excise duties will, all told, raise an extra £795 million in 1986-87, the same amount as I would have raised had I simply increased all the excise duties precisely in line with inflation. The overall impact effect on the RPI, if all the increases were fully passed on, would be one half of one per cent. This has already been taken into account in the forecast I have given the House of 3½ per cent. inflation by the end of the year.

INCOME TAX

Finally, I turn to income tax. In my Budget speech last year I undertook to issue a Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation. As the House is aware, I am publishing the Green Paper today. It discusses a range of options which will in due course be opened up by the computerisation of PAYE, from the relationship between income tax and employees' national insurance contributions to the closer integration of the tax and benefit systems.

In particular, however, it outlines a possible reform of the present system of personal allowances. The responses to my predecessor's 1980 Green Paper revealed widespread dissatisfaction with the existing arrangements, but—perhaps inevitably—no clear consensus as to what should replace them.

Married women increasingly resent the fact that a wife's income is treated for tax purposes as that of her husband, depriving her of the independence and privacy she has a right to expect. There is growing complaint, too, of the way in which, in a number of respects, the present system penalises marriage itself, and it cannot be right that the tax system should come down hardest on a married couple just at the time when the wife stops work to start a family. Yet that is what happens today.

The alternative system set out in the Green paper, of independent taxation with allowances tranferable between husband and wife, would remedy all these defects. To be acceptable, however, it would need to be accompanied by a substantial increase in the basic tax threshold.

The Government are committed to reducing the burden of income tax, and the proposal in the Green Paper suggests one way of doing that which would achieve a number of other worthwhile objectives—including the ability to take more people out of the unemployment and poverty traps for a given amount of tax relief than is possible under the present tax system. Given the timetable of computerisation, none of this could in practice be implemented until the 1990s, but we need to start planning for the 1990s today. The Government will therefore carefully consider the responses to today's Green Paper before taking any decision on how to proceed.

Meanwhile, I have to set the tax rates and thresholds for the coming year, but first I have two minor proposals to announce, both of which I hope the House will welcome. First, pensions paid by the German and Austrian Governments to victims of Nazi persecution are free of tax in both Germany and Austria. In this country, however, the tax relief on such pensions is set at 50 per cent. In future, I propose that pensions paid to victims of Nazi persecution should be free of tax altogether.

Secondly, the House will be aware that, as from next year, social security benefit upratings will be moved to April, to coincide with the tax year. This will enable them to be fully taken into account before PAYE codes are issued for 1987-88. However, to bridge the gap between the November 1985 and April 1987 upratings, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services proposes to have a special transitional uprating in July, the details of which he has recently announced. But, as hon. Members will know from their postbags, it could be confusing for many old-age pensioners and widows to undergo a special mid-year tax recoding on account of the July uprating. I have therefore decided that for pensioners and widows the benefit increases payable in July will be exempt from income tax in 1986-87. The cost of this will be £15 million.

Since we first took office in 1979 we have cut the basic rate of income tax from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. and sharply reduced the penal higher rates we inherited from Labour. We have increased the main tax thresholds by some 20 pr cent. more than inflation—and the greater part of that 20 per cent. has been achieved during the present Parliament.

It is a good record, but it is not good enough. The burden of income tax is still too great. Nothing could be further from the truth than the claim that we have a choice between cutting tax and cutting unemployment, for the two go hand in hand. It is no accident that the two most successful economies in the world, both overall and specifically in terms of job creation—those of the United States and Japan—have the lowest level of tax as a proportion of GDP. Reductions in taxation motivate new businesses and improve incentives at work. They are a principal engine of the enterprise culture, on which our future prosperity and employment opportunities depend.

The case for higher tax thresholds is well understood. In my two previous Budgets I have raised the married man's allowance to its highest level in real terms since the war, higher as a proportion of average earnings than in either Germany or the United States. But we should not overlook the need for reductions in the basic rate of tax too. The basic rate is the starting rate of tax and it is the crucially important marginal rate of tax for some 95 per cent. of all employees and 90 per cent. of all self-employed and unincorporated businesses.

Clearly, given the massive fall in oil revenues, this is not a year for substantial reductions in tax of any kind, but, provided the economy continues to grow as it has been growing, and provided we continue to maintain firm control of public expenditure, the scope should be there in the years ahead.

Meanwhile I propose for 1986-87 to raise all the main thresholds and allowances by the statutory indexation figure of 5·7 per cent. rounded up. The single person's allowance will therefore rise by £130 to £2,335 and the married man's allowance by £200 to £3,655. Similarly, the single age allowance will rise by £160 to £2,850 and the married age allowance by £250 to £4,505. The age allowance income limit becomes £9,400. I propose to raise all the higher-rate thresholds by exactly £1,000. This is fully in line with statutory indexation for the first—40 per cent. — higher rate, but less than half statutory indexation for the top—60 per cent.—rate.

Given the need for caution in the light of current circumstances, I do not have scope this year for a reduction in the basic rate of income tax beyond one penny in the pound. But this reduction from 30 per cent. to 29 per cent. still represents the first cut in the basic rate of income tax since my predecessor took it down from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. in 1979. So long as this Government remain in office, it will not be the last.

There will, of course, be a consequential reduction in the rate of advance corporation tax, and I also propose a corresponding cut in the small companies' rate of corporation tax from 30 per cent. to 29 per cent.

The combined effect of the various income tax changes I have just announced is to concentrate the benefit, modest as I readily concede it to be, not on the rich but on the great majority of ordinary taxpayers. As a result of the adjustments I have made to the higher-rate thresholds, the gain for those at the top of the income scale is more or less confined to what they would have received under simple indexation alone. By contrast, the married man on average earnings will be some £2·60 a week better off, an improvement of £1·45 a week over simple indexation alone.

The income tax changes I have announced today will take effect under PAYE on the first pay day after 17 May. They will cost £935 million in 1986-87 over and above the cost of statutory indexation.

Seven years ago, when my predecessor cut the basic rate of income tax from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. he added:

> "Our long-term aim should surely be to reduce the basic rate of income tax to no more than 25 per cent." [Official Report, 12 June 1979; Vol. 968, c. 261.]

I share that aim.

CONCLUSION

In this Budget, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have reaffirmed the prudent policies that have brought us three successive years of steady growth with low inflation and the prospect of a fourth ahead of us. I have described how we can take in our stride the dramatic collapse in the oil price, and benefit from its consequences.

In collaboration with my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, I have announced a further substantial range of measures to help the unemployed. I have proposed a radical and far-reaching new scheme for tax-free investment in equities, so that we may truly become a share-owning democracy, and I have abolished a fourth tax. I have announced the most substantial package of assistance to charitable giving ever, and cut the basic rate of income tax.

Building as it does on the achievements of the recent past, this Budget is a safeguard for the present and a springboard for the future. I commend it to the House.

PROVISIONAL COLLECTION OF TAXES

Motion made, and Question,

That, pursuant to section 5 of the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act 1968, provisional statutory effect shall be given to the following Motions:—

(a) Tobacco products (Motion No. 2);

(b) Hydrocarbon oil (Motion No. 3);

(c) Vehicles excise duty (hackney carriages and farmers' goods vehicles) (Motion No. 4).—[Mr. Lawson.]

put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 114 (Ways and Means Motions), and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I shall now call on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to move the motion entitled "Amendment of the Law". It is on that motion that the Budget debate will take place today and on succeeding days. The remaining motions will not be put until the end of the Budget debate next week and they will then be decided without debate.

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national Debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description. — [Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I shall observe the convention with the usual relish and congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the way in which he delivered his speech. This year he did not quite break his own record of one hour and 14 minutes, but it certainly assisted us to have such a clear and crisp delivery, which took such a short time.

Congratulations are especially in order because the Budget was plainly not the Budget which the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought he could introduce this year. Indeed, it was not the Budget which he wanted to introduce this year. Last year, both at Budget time and at the Conservative party conference, he looked forward to tax cuts. It is obvious that this year's Budget was to have been a bribes Budget, which would begin to make tax cuts with the next general election in mind. Instead, the fall in oil prices and the consequent fall in oil revenues has made it into a bits and pieces Budget. It is a Budget which contains promises of there being some scope next year. It is jam tomorrow from a Chancellor of the Exchequer who is plainly in a jam today.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer will have noticed from the Opposition's response that we sincerely welcome some aspects of the Budget. I think, for example, of the provisions relating to the business expansion scheme both in its continuation and its exclusions, which appear to be sensible and helpful. In addition, the provision to relieve victims of Nazism from tax obligations on their pensions is obviously just and will command unanimous support. The concessions favouring charities are equally welcome, although I hope, as the Chancellor implied, that they will be judiciously monitored, as it would be wrong for any suspect bodies to benefit from them.

I echo, and I hope reinforce, the view expressed by the Chancellor that, as a result of his approach, we can ensure that petrol prices at least stay the same. Indeed, they should fall, given the benefits that have accrued to oil companies.

Other matters, including the Green Paper, will need close scrutiny. If the Green Paper's proposals were to result in any disadvantage to married women, or were to act as a deterrent to women considering paid work, the Chancellor could expect to meet hostility both inside and outside the House.

Naturally, other aspects of the Budget can be criticised. One which stands out is the abolition of the gift tax, which is literally a handout to the rich. Following the tradition of the House I propose to leave such detailed considerations to other hon. Members to discuss, but there is one point that I wish to make, because it represents a fundamental cause for concern.

The Budget should have been particularly distinctive as it is the first Budget of the post-oil boom era. For that reason, it is endowed with a particular and historic importance. Although the Chancellor of the Exchequer is conscious of the loss of resources, and presumably of the impact of that on our economy, he has chosen to do nothing that will effectively promote the building and rebuilding of our manufacturing economy, and to do nothing to help systematically to provide our country with the modern means of making a living in the future. Such provision for training, research, design and development, and for new machines, should have been made in all the Budgets since 1979, and this year they should have been not an ingredient but a primary feature. After all, we find ourselves in difficult times with revenues falling.

The promotion of the redevelopment and regeneration of our economy is not central to this year's Budget, and that makes it a sideshow Budget, and an exercise in taxation juggling that is irrelevant to the main problems of employment and development which face our people and our businesses. The loss of industry during the past six and a half years, and the loss of revenue now facing us, should have made such considerations a primary concern of the Budget, together with compensation for those losses.

Such failures are not the only matters of concern or the only areas in which the Chancellor has sadly failed to make the necessary responses. We must be grateful for the fact that he did not describe his puny package as yet another "Budget for jobs". I suppose that he has learnt from his experience of last year. He then gave it that grandiose title, but the result was that in the first six months after that Budget there was a net increase in employment of 4,000 people—4,000 people in an economy with 3·4 million registered unemployed, and in a year in which total unemployment rose again by more than 70,000. Thus, we cannot be expected to cheer over the addition of 55,000 people to the community programme or over the fact that the wage has been increased by £2 to the princely sum of £67 a week.

The expansion of the job clubs for advice is more of a taunt than a support for the unemployed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who must be acquainted with the facts, must know that people will regard that as nothing more than an additional opportunity to have a chat and a cup of tea. In some ways, that is an advantage in itself, because unemployment can be an extremely lonely condition, but that is about as far as it goes, and the right hon. Gentleman knows that well.

During the past six and a half years, poverty has increased significantly. Double the number of families are on supplementary benefit, and an additional 2 million people are so poor that they must depend on supplementary benefit. The Budget said nothing and offered absolutely nothing to the poor. I did not expect that it would, coming from a Government who are weakening wages councils, and who during the next 12 months will make provision to ensure that the old-age pension is worth 3 per cent. less at this time next year than it is now. I could not expect a full-hearted commitment to combating poverty from such a Chancellor. With regard to the 1p reduction in the basic rate of tax, the Chancellor has only to reduce the basic rate by a further 5p to bring taxation down to the level of the 1979 burden.

The same faint-heartedness with which the Chancellor tries to wage war on poverty characterises his approach to the City. During the past six and a half years the institutions and individuals there have benefited stupendously from a variety of Government measures, yet what is to be obtained from them? The answer is nothing more than a sum equivalent to the amount lost to the Exchequer by halving stamp duty—£200 million—at a time when they are doing more than well, and when their conditions and rewards are arousing criticism in the Conservative party and from commentators who are usually slavish in their support for the Chancellor's general strategy. The Chancellor should have taken this chance to ensure that those people on high salaries with high returns pay their way as members of our society.

In all those areas—poverty, jobs and the approach to the City and those who now enjoy positions of great wealth —the Chancellor has seen the need for action, as we know from the way in which he touched on them, but he has backed off from acting effectively. That makes it the fudge-it Budget of a Government who during the past seven years have worn away the industrial base of the nation and wasted huge sums of wealth in a rake's progress financed by oil revenues. The Government have taxed ordinary people more than any other Government in history. They have borrowed more than any other Government in history. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Yes. The Government have borrowed £60 billion in five years, compared with the Labour Government, of whom the Chancellor was so critical, who borrowed £40 billion.

Sir Peter Tapsell (East Lindsey): When the right hon. Gentleman quotes those figures, will he bear in mind that this Government at least borrowed from the British, whereas the Labour Government borrowed from abroad in foreign currencies?

Mr. Kinnock: Yes, and as Mr. Tim Congdon has reminded us, as a consequence of that borrowing the Government's repayments of interest are running at £19·5 billion, compared with the total of £8 billion which the Labour Government had to pay to an assortment of people during their last period of office. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's patriotism will extend to other areas, especially to sell-offs — the way in which the Government have been raising funds to finance their programme.

The Government have been raising funds by once-and-for-all sales of assets that have been built up for generations by British taxpayers. The sum is exhaustible, and that is a ruinous way to proceed. The Government have had the unprecedented and unrepeatable bonus of £55 billion-worth of revenues from North sea oil. No other Government have ever enjoyed such revenues, and no British Government have ever so wilfully squandered such wealth.

For years the Government have been told in Budget debates, and at many other times, by us and by others that they should use that windfall deliberately and prudently to modernise and restructure British manufacturing industry. They were provided with a glorious opportunity to do that, sheltered as they were from balance of payments pressures, which have affected every Government in the decades before they came to office with the asset of oil. They did not take advantage of that. Instead, they have used the resources and revenues to pay part of the bill for unemployment, to make tax concessions to the richest and to send abroad funds that have come in handy for our competitors to finance the advance of their industries. The Government have blown our oil wealth completely and have next to nothing to show for it. Indeed, in some respects they have less than nothing.

Manufacturing investment is still nearly 20 per cent. lower than it was in 1979. Manufacturing output is still lower than it was in 1979. During the Government's seven years the healthy surplus in manufactured trade which they inherited has been turned to a deficit of £3 billion this year, having gone into deficit for the first time in modern British history in 1983. Only the Prime Minister's dwindling palace guard believes that that gap can start to be made up by the sale of services. Certainly the British Invisible Exports Council and an assortment of others who make their living in that sphere know that the gap cannot be made up by the sale of services.

In addition to the failure to sustain manufactured output, investment and trade, we have also seen a massive loss of employment. At present 3·4 million people are registered unemployed, and more people have been unemployed for a year than the total number of unemployed when the Government took office in 1979.

These seven years have been the wasted years, the locust years, and the years which on Saturday the Prime Minister with unconscious and untypical accuracy described as the years of excavation. How right she was. During these severn years great holes have been dug which not only have undermined the structure of our society, but, even more painfully and damagingly, have undermined the self-confidence of millions of people. Now, throughout the country young men and women aged 20 to 22 ask, without the merest hint of self-pity or affectation, "Do you think I will ever get a job?"

I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have encountered such young people, as I have. I am sure that Tory Members have also done so. I wonder what Ministers say when they are addressed in that fashion. Do they dismiss the questioners as grumblers, as the Prime Minister did on Saturday? Do they say, as she did, "We have had only six years and nine months and we are only just beginning."? Six years and nine months ago, the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe), began the Conservative party's period of office with his first Budget, which he described as the Budget for a new beginning. It is six years and nine months from beginning to beginning. That is the story of the Government, yet they continue to say that there is no alternative.

Hardly anyone believes the Government now. Conservative Members, and members of the Cabinet, do not believe that there is no alternative. Some actually want to be the alternative. The Confederation of British Industry does not believe it, the TUC does not believe it, the Select Committee of Employment of this House does not believe it, the Select Committee on Overseas Trade of the other place does not believe it.

I have a list of people who in different degrees have repeatedly endorsed the proposition that there is a serious and constructive alternative, which consists of bringing about a major increase in spending. There is only one thing more expensive than spending, and that is not spending, paying the bills of idleness that go with that, and in particular not spending on our young people, on training, on new technology and on research. These costs will be paid generation in and generation out, apart from the costs that are run up in our society in despair, division and decay. The Prime Minister is almost alone in her belief that the difficulties besetting our society are disconnected from the economic woes inflicted upon our society. Nobody else seriously believes that.

Apart from a commitment to development, to building, to employment, and to construction, it is also obviously necessary, as it has been throughout the years of oil revenue, for money to be expended on renovating our industrial base. That suggestion has come from many quarters, as has the proposition that in both the private and public sectors of manufacturing and services, priority must be given to investment, so that the boost in employment and enterprise is not dissipated in the consumption of imports, or in handouts, which are absorbed in the short term.

There must be strategic answers to the strategic problems which beset our economy. None of those answers has been forthcoming in this Budget. Any prudent and responsible Government would have geared their monetary and fiscal policy to the development of the manufacturing base as an essential bedrock of their economic policy, and a resource for future growth and our standard of living. They would be fighting unemployment as an economic and social evil, instead of using unemployment as an economic and social weapon.

This Government are neither prudent nor responsible. They are prodigal in their waste of resources, and reckless in their attitude to the future of our country. Yet again, this Budget shows that they will not change any of their wasteful ways. This time, that failure to change is even worse. They have been given a clear warning of what life will be like without oil revenues. They have failed to make any effective or constructive response to the reality that faces them and everybody else. That is the dereliction of duty, and that is running away from the problem, and we shall punish that desertion of duty by defeating them at the next general election.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): I have seen a lot of Budgets in the time I have been in this House. I suppose they have been in various categories. Of some Budgets we expect much and get little. With some we anticipate the worst, and get it. In other Budgets, in not expecting much, we are then surprised by the result. This Budget is surprising in its variety, and surprising because almost everything predicted has not been done, and things that we did not expect have happened. I thought the Chancellor put the Budget in its correct context when he said that it was one of swings and roundabouts.

The Budget has done a number of things which must please many people outside of this House, and certainly pleases hon. Members on the Government side of the House, even if it does not please some on the other side. I always feel rather sorry that the Leader of the Opposition has to come straight in with an instant judgment, and answer a Chancellor who has been thoroughly briefed before he rises to speak. I thought that the Leader of the Opposition today criticised across the board rather more heavily than was justified.

The story that the Chancellor had to tell at the beginning of his speech was one of success. Considering that we are losing next year £5 billion in oil revenue, I felt that the outturn in terms of tax reduction possibility was surprisingly good.

Like many of my hon. Friends and people in the country, I believe that when we come to fight the next general election, the greatest issue will be not whether people have had reductions in tax, but whether we have reduced unemployment—I would say below 3 million. It will take quite a stimulus to reduce unemployment below that figure.

If I had one disappointment today, it was not that the Budget lacked stimulus, for the measures are there to provide such a stimulus. However, the amount of money that has been allocated to the stimulus was rather less than I would have hoped for.

My right hon. Friend would expect me to say that I was delighted that there was an increase in money given to the community programme. That is good for helping the long-term unemployed. The long-term unemployed figure is now very serious. The amount of money that is to be spent on the community programme — and other similar programmes; I think I have got the figure right from my right hon. Friend—is only £198 million.

This includes what has been provided to employers to give work to people aged between 18 and 20. This new incentive to employers is helpful to those who have been on the youth training programme. Many people justifiably ask, "If the young are trained on a youth training programme, "Trained for what?" the most important factor is that when they come out of that programme that they will get jobs. This 18-to-20 proposal, to encourage employers to take on more youngsters when they come out of training, is good. The question is, is it enough?

We are told that reducing unemployment is not entirely in the hands of Government. I agree with that. Nevertheless, the Government can do a great deal, particularly on an occasion such as this, when the Chancellor is determining his financial policy for the year ahead. Here is a chance to stimulate the creation of new jobs. It is a mistake to think that Government cannot create jobs. They can help to lose jobs, although the Government are not doing that. They are trying to get industry right; they are making an effort to encourage the creating of jobs. However, if the Budget is short on anything, it is short on actually providing new employment.

Recently, I listened to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister make the point that in the United States of America, Germany and other countries of the West with capitalist societies, unemployment had been reduced without the Government spending a great deal of money. That is to misread the situation. In America, the national budget and the states' budgets — I have figures into which I shall not go now — show that the Americans spend an enormous amount on the arms and space programmes and the individual states spend large sums on their social programmes, all of which employ many, many people.

I have not looked at the Budget figures yet, so I do not know what the contingency fund for next year is to be. I believe that in that fund there may be scope for the Government, in the next 12 months, to spend more money on providing extra jobs. I hope that they will do that. If there is money in the contingency fund, it should be reduced to good advantage, and that means reducing the dole queues.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My hon. Friend is developing an interesting and positive argument. Is he aware that in the United States, where a great many new projects are Government-led, if not necessarily Government-funded, this has been done in a big way, creating millions of extra jobs, and it has been done without creating a high level of inflation, which is so damaging to the longer-term sound economy of any country?

Sir Kenneth Lewis: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the position in the United States, which also applies to a considerable extent in Germany.

I do not know how large the contingency fund is. I hope that it is as large as or larger than it was last year. If it is, I hope that the money that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has in his back pocket will be well used.

There is another matter. Although it is commendable from his point of view that my right hon. Friend has been able to keep his borrowing requirement at £7 billion, the same as last year, could we not really afford to have the borrowing requirement go up by another £1 billion? It represents only a small percentage—I believe that it is now less than 2 per cent. — of our gross national product, and we could allow that to slip a bit during the next 12 months.

Although there is much to be said for a large part of the Budget, and there is much that I like about it, there is still missing that element of concentration on getting jobs. I was surprised that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor cut the standard rate of tax as against putting up thresholds to take more people out of tax. We are always saying that there should be an incentive for people to take work, but there is an adverse effect when people can pick up as much on social security and benefits as they can through earnings.

In many parts of the country there are low earnings which are not comparable to those of London and other more prosperous areas. An example is my area. When those who are on low pay see what they can get on social security, rent rebates and the like and then look at the tax deductible from possible wages, is it surprising that too many shy away from work.

I am in favour of bringing down the standard rate of income tax, if we can do both that and raise thresholds, but this year we cannot. Therefore, on balance, to give 1p off the standard rate of income tax is too expensive for what it will achieve. In two or three months' time, nobody will see any difference between paying 30p in the pound and 29p in the pound. If my right hon. Friend the Chancellor had been able to bring down the rate by 3p in the pound, that would have been a reasonable option. Clearly, he could not do that. Obviously my right hon. Friend's judgment is not mine on this matter. Next year, if he wants to make an effective reduction in the standard rate, he will have to bring it down by three points. Will he be able to afford it? This year the 1p reduction is too small to be of any relevance to any whom it affects.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): My right hon. Friend raised the threshold by 5·7 per cent.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: My right hon. Friend raised the threshold by only just the rate of inflation, when he could have raised it by double the rate of inflation and not taken 1p off the standard rate. I am not making a great complaint. It was just a matter of judgment. My right hon. Friend's judgment is that it is better to reduce the standard rate, and my judgment is in a different direction.

Dr. Glyn: My hon. Friend is making a strong argument. Does he agree that if extra money was, as he suggested, used to raise thresholds, it would have a greater effect in inducing people to take jobs?

Sir Kenneth Lewis: This is the point that I have been trying to make.

Many of us, for many years, have wanted wider share ownership. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on creating such a scheme, and I hope that it will gather momentum over the years. We need an enlightened capitalism in which people on the shop floor have an interest not only in the company in which they work, but in others. At the moment, they all have an interest in companies through their pension funds, but they do not realise it. It is better that they should understand that having a personal stake in industry is good for industry, good for them and good for the country as a whole.

The Budget has potential. I know that in the past few years we have not had a second Budget, but in the time that I have been in the House, Chancellors have regularly had second Budgets, and some have even had a third. Perhaps, as we get towards the end of the year, if the price of oil stabilises and more money comes in from North sea oil, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will feel that he can do what I have suggested, and spend more through creative stimulus.

The old phrase "priming the pump" is not dead, though it may be forgotten. It is important that any Government facing rising unemployment should decide how they can spend money to prime the pump and allow people who feel useless on the unemployment list to get back to work, because there is plenty to do. It is there through the construction industry in housing and other areas. There is plenty of scope for work that does not bring in imports and I want to see the Government spending more on that. I believe that the Budget is very good in parts, but I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will take heed of the need during the year, for building on some very good initiatives, already taken, actually to provide more jobs.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Like many other hon. Members, I followed with great agreement the polite but firmly critical approach to the Budget adopted by the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), and the similar interventions made by his hon. Friends the Members for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn).

In 20 years I cannot recall the first speech from the Government Benches after the Chancellor had sat down being so critical. That, of course, matched the noticeably subdued atmosphere in which the Chancellor was received at the end of his speech. As many Tory Members will quietly recognise, today's Budget speech was little more than the elegant performance of a busker to a crowd of long-suffering taxpayers and the unemployed, who have now been told that the real show will not open until March 1987. Although the busking had some of the sparkle that we associate with the Chancellor of the Exchequer—thank goodness for that—it was, on the whole, deplorably complacent.

We are accustomed, in the cut and thrust of politics, to other Ministers producing these phoney figures for British recovery, which we all know are derived from the shockingly low base to which the British economy and British manufacturing descended in 1980, and to the fact that we went into deep recession nearly two years before the other industrial powers. We are used to that kind of sleight-of-hand from other Ministers, but it is a bit much for the Chancellor himself on Budget day to indulge in such phoney statistics, and that feeling will be shared by the commentators and most hon. Members. Manufacturing output has not yet recovered to its 1979 level, and those who are neglected and unrepresented in the Cabinet, who live between the Trent and the Tweed, and west of Reading, are painfully aware of that.

There was also complacency in the Chancellor's admission. After making an excessively robust and over-optimistic assumption about oil prices in last year's Budget, he came forward with only one scenario, based on the single opitimistic assumption of an average price of $15 a barrel in the coming year. Let us hope that he is right, but it would have been prudent for the Chancellor to produce also an alternative scenario with the price at about $9 a barrel. In the meantime, he is pushing his luck.

The Chancellor made a great point about the buoyancy of the other direct tax revenues—corporation tax and income tax. Only a few minutes before he boasted of that buoyancy he was deploring—with a great deal of right on his side—the runaway rise of our earnings to a level far above that of our competitors, because the Government pretend to have nothing to do with an incomes policy. The buoyancy of the revenue is a direct consequence of those runaway earnings. Far from welcoming that, the Chancellor should be seriously perturbed that the position is as buoyant as it is. The buoyancy of corporation tax must be a reflection of the poor level of capital investment by industry, which is not claiming the final year's capital allowances to the extent that one would have seen if manufacturing were in a healthy condition.

As always, the centrepiece of the Chancellor's Budget is that absurd totem of the public sector borrowing requirement, which is not even a measure of the true Government deficit and is now an object of idol worship by people who cannot admit how wrong they have been. There is no need for the public sector borrowing requirement to be confined to such a low figure, except, of course, for the fact that the Chancellor is not prepared to admit that he has changed his mind.

The world is anxious to lend Britain money. Other countries see Britain as a safe country in an unstable world, which has an established monarchy, a healthy three-party system, and which is approaching the liberating event of a general election which may restore sanity to British government. There would be no difficulty in raising money. However, the Chancellor is not prepared to be converted to common-sense economics.

The saddest feature of the Chancellor's speech was the absence of the adventurous monetarist who, if he had been true to form, would at least have wheeled in a new monetary aggregate. I was expecting the Chancellor, the old confident Chancellor, to produce M2 and to command us to worship at that new shrine. However, so weary is he of the struggle that, blow me, he simply brought back from retirement that miserable, old, failed harridan, M3. He has now said that the upper limit of M3 can be 15 per cent.

The Chancellor is telling us in one breath, as a monetarist, that inflation will come down to a rate of 3·5 per cent., but that the monetary aggregate will rise by up to 15 per cent. That is the final confession of this faltering old doctrine in which no one any longer places any faith.

The distressing part of the Chancellor's recital was his almost contemptuous neglect of the unemployed. What use is it to tell the unemployed that the basic rate of income tax has been reduced from 30 to 29 per cent.? Who has the cheek to tell the unemployed that they can now invest up to £200 a month in a special personal equity plan? What is the use of telling the unemployed that their gifts to others will no longer suffer capital transfer tax?

The Government in this Budget have done nothing worth talking about for the unemployed. The increase in the community programme is small. It should at least have been doubled, and could perfectly well have been. In particular, the biggest gap in the Budget in my opinion—which the House will hear about from the two official spokesmen from the alliance parties during the debates—is the total failure of the Government to do anything about national insurance. They have done nothing about national insurance—the tax on jobs—which reaches a level of 19·45 per cent. in the pound. That tax has remained untouched. What could be a bigger snub to the unemployed than to tell them that the tax on people who want to take them on will remain wholly unchanged? In the alliance's view, there should have been a cut of at least 10 per cent. on all the rates of national insurance contributions as a starting point to eventually getting rid of the tax on jobs.

While I am on this point, I should like to mention that, in order to help the unemployed and to finance community programme schemes and our national assets, there is one step which the Chancellor could easily have taken in the name of common justice. That is the reversal of the crazy situation that has come about under his chancellorship, whereby income from mere investment is taxed substantially less than income from the sweat of one's brow or from the exertion of one's brain in employment.

An employed person pays income tax of 38 per cent.—29 per cent. in so-called income tax, and 9 per cent. in the alternative income tax, known as national insurance. A person who sits back and waits for his dividend to come in pays tax of only 29 per cent. That is a complete reversal of the historic fiscal position whereby unearned income was always taxed more heavily than earned income.

There may be a theoretical case for saying that unearned income and earned income should be taxed at the same rate. I do not necessarily dispute that. However, it is surely unjustifiable to reverse the position so that income from work is more heavily penalised than income from investments.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will the hon. Gentleman concede that, to a great extent, much of the unearned income to which he has referred disparagingly is money saved by people while at work? Therefore, why should that income be taxed at a higher rate? Why should it include the national insurance element, which exists to pay for certain services and facilities which the individual expects from the state?

Mr. Wainwright: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman has made an elegant introduction to a point I was about to make — that there must be a reasonable threshold below which income from savings is relatively modestly taxed. Whether the threshold should be £4,000 or £5,000 a year for retired people is a matter for discussion. I accept that income from money saved for retirement should be lightly taxed. The age allowance should certainly be more generous. I was speaking, as I suspect the hon. Member for Macclesfield well knew, of the large investment incomes, of which there are an increasing number, and which are augmented in the City of London at a tremendous rate every working day of the week. People with such unearned incomes should certainly pay more, not less, than wage earners.

The tax threshold remains disgracefully low. It is appalling that some people who are in receipt of only the state pension are assessed to pay income tax because the Chancellor has refused to lift the threshold in a civilised way.

Emphasis has been placed on expanding the experimental job start system from the present nine pilot areas. An employee is paid £20 a week by the state for taking a job in which he will receive £80 or less a week from the boss. That is a subsidy to the employee to persuade him or her to take a low-paid job.

We may judge the effect of extending the scheme to the whole country by looking at what has happened in one of the nine pilot areas — Huddersfield, part of which I represent. Only nine people in Huddersfield have entered the job start scheme since it was inaugurated early this year, due to the efforts of 10 extra staff plugging the scheme. If one extrapolates the numbers involved in the Huddersfield pilot scheme and applies them nationwide —I wish that we could apply much of what happens in Huddersfield nationwide because that would solve many of our problems—one can see that only a few hundred people in the United Kingdom would take part in this rather miserable scheme. I have always thought that it was an insult to human nature to say to a person, "Go on your knees for this meanly paid job and we will make it up to you. We shall slip you twenty quid so that you do not lose too much face with the wife." I do not believe that extending this scheme to the nation will have a significant impact on the appalling and growing unemployment problems.

Liberals, with our emphasis on redistributing wealth, must be aghast at the cancellation of the gift tax without replacing it with something. We have never held a strong brief for the capital transfer tax in the form in which it was introduced by Labour, because that was a silly tax on the giver. We have always said that a substantial, rapidly ascending scale of gift tax should be imposed on the recipient, according to the size of the gift and the recipient's wealth. This would mean that a person of great wealth who was getting on in years would be given every encouragement through the tax system to divide his wealth into a large number of relatively small portions which would be liable for only a modest rate of accession or gift tax or would escape tax altogether. The millionaire who insisted on endowing only his son or daughter with the whole sum would have to warn his children that they would pay a swingeing tax immediately they received a gift of £1 million. That would have been a step forward. To abolish gift tax altogether is an appalling step back to Victorian times and one which we strenuously oppose.

Dr. Glyn: What is the Liberal party's attitude to the efforts made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor towards encouraging wider share ownership?

Mr. Wainwright: I am grateful again to a Conservative Member for introducing my concluding remarks. I like to wind up on an agreeable note.

I, for one, give an unqualified welcome to what the Chancellor calls the personal equity plan, which provides a strong tax incentive for those lucky enough to be able to make regular investments. We welcome that measure with some pride of authorship, because we proposed it for many years in various forms during Finance Bill debates. Each time we made that proposal the Treasury spokesman— whether Conservative or Labour — assured hon. Members in stern tones that it would cost the earth, that there would be no limit to the demands it would impose on the Revenue and that therefore they could not recommend that their colleagues should support it. Better late than never—I, for one, want to give the scheme a fair wind. We must bear in mind always, however, that it is a scheme for the lucky—for those who can put aside sums for investment. Alas, at the present time, that is only a fraction of our population.

Mr. David Knox (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on his third Budget speech. His first two Budget speeches were well constructed and to the point, and both were brief, as Budget speeches go. Today, my right hon. Friend has maintained the high standards he established on those two occasions. The House should be grateful to him for that.

I welcome the changes concerning VAT and charities, both on the expenditure side—I think particularly of the concession for talking newspapers for the blind — and especially on the giving side. I welcome the Green Paper "The Reform of Personal Taxation", which was published today. Obviously, I cannot comment at present on that document, but it will be carefully studied in the months ahead.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend has increased income tax thresholds. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), I should have preferred my right hon. Friend not to reduce the standard rate of income tax by 1p in the pound but to concentrate all the relief on thresholds. Frankly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding said, the reduction in the standard rate of income tax is so small that it is unlikely to have any effect, and it is especially unlikely to have any incentive effect. I have no desire to make any great point about this. One always welcomes reductions in taxation even if they are not the selection one would have made oneself.

I welcome the increase in the VAT threshold and the improvement in the business expansion scheme. I particularly welcome the new scheme to encourage share ownership. Like the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) I am a member of the Wider Share Ownership Council and I believe strongly in the spread of share ownership as widely as possible in our society, for the reasons advanced by the hon. Member for Colne Valley and my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding. I was pleased to hear about the expansion of the community programme, along with the other measures to help the unemployed. They are nothing like enough, but I welcome those measures as far as they go.

I turn to the general state of the economy and especially unemployment. When I spoke in this debate 12 months ago, I said that unemployment was the principal problem facing Britain. Then the Chancellor introduced what he claimed was "a Budget for jobs". I do not think that it is unfair to say that his expectations have not been fulfilled. Unemployment has continued to rise during the past 12 months and despite the measures announced today, it will at best stabilise and at worst continue to rise in the next year.

Unemployment remains our principal economic problem—as it has been for far too long now. For all the talk about measures to reduce it, unemployment has continued to worsen over the years. I believe that we have now reached the point where this cannot be allowed to continue. This afternoon the Chancellor told us about the Government's success in taming inflation and improving industrial relations. I readily acknowledge and warmly applaud these successes, but for a long time we have also been told that lower inflation and better industrial relations were essential prerequisites for increased manufacturing output and reduced unemployment, yet, last week, I was told by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, that manufacturing output was 5 per cent. lower than it was six years ago. We all know what has happened over the last six years and what is continuing to happen today with unemployment. Clearly lower inflation and better industrial relations are not enough. They have not had the desired effect on unemployment and, frankly, they show no signs of doing so.

I do not believe that the present level of unemployment is necessary or indeed inevitable. From 1945 to 1974, under Labour and Conservative Governments we had full employment. This was achieved on the basis of the policies outlined in the 1944 White Paper on employment, the foreword to which stated:

"A country will not suffer from mass unemployment so long as the total demand for its goods and services is maintained at a high level."

In my view, it was because the demand for goods and services in the British economy was maintained at a high level between 1945 and 1974 that we had full employment during those years.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I have heard my hon. Friend make the same speech for many years. Surely between 1945 and 1974 there was great and hidden unemployment as a result of the massive overmanning in industry, which is the cause of many of our troubles today.

Mr. Knox: I do not want to be diverted too far from my speech. All I would say to my hon. Friend is that there is quite as much under-employment in industry today as there was in those years. If my hon. Friend's point is correct, there would not have been the overall reduction in manufacturing output that there has been over the past six years. It is very worrying to think that manufacturing output today is not only lower than it was in 1979 but is lower than it was in 1973. These facts do not quite substantiate the point that my hon. Friend is making.

I return to what I was saying. I was making the point that in my view it was because the demand for goods and services was at a high level for the years from 1945 to 1974 that we had full employment. Equally, in my view it was because the demand for goods and services in Britain has not been maintained at a high level since 1974 that we have had such high unemployment in these past 12 years. I believe that we shall continue to have high unemployment until we return to the demand management policies that were so successfully pursued in the 30 years after the war.

This means that, if we are serious about unemployment, we must raise the level of demand to bring it into line with our productive capacity. This cannot be done straight away. It will take a long time. It will not be easy, but it ought to be done and we ought to start now. The usual retort to pleas for a return to demand management policies is that these were the policies that failed in the 1970s. Far be it for me to say that the 1970s was the brightest decade in our economic history. It was certainly not. But since demand management policies had a proven track record over many years prior to the 1970s, I should have thought that the causes of our problems then were more likely to be those factors that were peculiar to the 1970s—the breakdown of Bretton Woods, the commodity price explosion of the early 1970s, the escalation of oil prices in the mid-1970s and again in the late 1970s, and the flow of oil from the North sea. All these caused economic chaos at home and abroad and they provide, for me, far more plausible reasons for the difficulties we faced in the 1970s than demand management policies based on the 1944 White Paper.

I believe that we must return to this approach to the management of our economy as a matter of urgency, and I regret that that was not announced today. Today's Budget will raise output only by the underlying increase in capacity. It will not raise the level of economic activity sufficiently to take up any slack and so reduce unemployment. In my view, the Chancellor should have taken much stronger action to raise the level of demand and so the level of activity. Only the Government can do this. It can be done either by cutting taxes without decreasing public expenditure or by increasing public expenditure without increasing taxes or by a mixture of the two. In my view the Chancellor should have increased thresholds by even more than he has done and he should have introduced a substantial programme of public expenditure on the infrastructure—on roads, railways, education, the Health Service, housing and, above all, housing improvements.

These measures would be additional measures and no extra revenue should be collected to pay for them. Of course, such a policy would involve an increase in the public sector borrowing requirement. In terms of resources, there is no reason why this should be inflationary because there is plenty of spare capacity. In terms of finance, the initial increase in the public sector borrowing requirement would, to some extent, be reduced as benefit payments to the newly employed fell and tax receipts from them rose. Nor would interest rates be likely to be affected, as their main determinant is the level of international interest rates rather than domestic factors.

At present, the British economy is operating at about 20 to 25 per cent. below capacity. Over 3 million people are out of work. A large number of people are engaged in schemes to alleviate unemployment which are, frankly, not very productive or economically beneficial. Millions at work are under-employed and enormous capital assets are under-utilised. If we are serious about creating jobs and reducing unemployment, the level of demand must be increased. If unemployment is to be conquered, we must go for a rate of economic growth which is faster than the underlying growth of capacity. I regret that the Chancellor chose not to take such a course today.

5.59 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): I agree with many of the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox). He has made many speeches of a similar nature in the House and he is to be commended for that.

First, let me deal with the good things in the Budget. There are some good proposals, although Opposition Members recognise that they are few and far between. For instance, the tax relief for charities is to be welcomed. One cannot but admire the work done by voluntary organisations in our society today, particularly for the disabled. There has been a great increase in that work. My only proviso is that it is essential to define what is a bona fide charity. I should hate to think that, for instance, Eton school would benefit from those proposals.

The Chancellor has announced an 11p increase on a packet of 20 cigarettes. Such an increase was to be expected. If it is the last straw that assists people to give up that unhealthy habit it is a good proposal.

Petrol taxation must be seen in the context of the rise in the costs of transport, because a rise in transport costs increases the cost of just about everything else. Therefore, it is essential to ensure that the oil companies are brought into line so that petrol prices do not rise. As the Chancellor has pointed out this afternoon, there is no need for them to do so.

It needs to be appreciated that the vast bulk of freight —8 tonnes out of every 10 tonnes—now goes by road in Britain. Likewise, the car is no longer a luxury. In Britain, 25 million people hold a driving licence and nine out of 10 passenger miles are travelled by road. Road taxes now stand at over £12,000 million, yet the national expenditure on our roads is not a quarter of that figure. Therefore, the Chancellor made a wise decision not to increase petrol taxes directly in line with the recent fall in prices due to the collapse of the oil market.

This is the Chancellor's third consecutive Budget. Like earlier speakers, I give him full marks for presentation this afternoon. The right hon. Gentleman's first Budget was described as a Budget for enterprise and he still insists on talking about recovery. But we are entitled to ask him: what recovery? That is particularly so when manufacturing output is still 6 per cent. below the 1979 figure and when manufacturing investment is still 10 per cent. below the 1979 figures. Our new deficit in manufacturing trade is set to shoot up to £4·5 billion in 1986. Training has been drastically cut, with engineering apprenticeships cut to around 9,000. Meanwhile, bankruptcies in 1985 hit a new record. That is the picture of Britain's recovery that the Chancellor chooses to forget.

Last year, the Chancellor's Budget was said to be one for employment. Then unemployment increased by 115,301, so he did not have much success in that respect. Up until a few weeks ago it was said that this Budget would feature tax handouts. Then the bottom fell out of the oil market, so the Budget format had to be changed. We are now presented with yet another Budget for employment. In the months ahead we shall watch the employment figures with great interest. Meanwhile, to pretend that the puny employment measures in the budget will do anything more than scratch the surface of this horrendous problem is simply an exercise in kidology.

Unemployment has been compared to a tap left running —sheer waste. The figures bear out that contention. For instance, the annual cost of keeping 3·3 million people out of work in lost revenue and benefit is conservatively estimated to be nearly £17 billion. That would be enough to abolish VAT or to halve the standard rate of income tax.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is my hon. Friend aware that one aspect of the reversal of Government policy vis-a-vis the unemployment problem—which was revealed in an answer to a parliamentary question two weeks ago—is the creation of fully 5,400 jobs in local Department of Health and Social Security offices up and down the country?

Mr. Hughes: That is one means of creating jobs, but not exactly the most satisfactory one.

More than 1·3 million have been out of work for more than a year. Half of that number have been unemployed for three years or more. Those figures point to much demoralisation and they engender the social problems which are becoming such a feature of our society.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): My hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head. In addition to social problems, unemployment affects health. The Secretary of State continually points to the increasing demands on our Health Service, yet all the research shows that demands on the hospital and family practitioner services have trebled because of the effects of unemployment on health.

Mr. Hughes: My hon. Friend has been in the House a long time and I know that he speaks with vast experience on that subject. A survey carried out in my constituency in Newport some months ago bears out the increase in health problems as a result of mass unemployment. We in the Newport area suffered heavily from massive steel redundancies.

The Government have no political will to tackle unemployment. Many individuals and bodies have recognised the follies of the Government's economic policies. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this afternoon, there is an alternative. In Wales, on St. David's day this year we had what is known as a declaration on unemployment. Signed by prominent men and women throughout the principality, it said:

"We are a group of people with different views on political and social questions, but we all think the present level of unemployment in Wales is intolerable. It has destructive social and economic effects, and demoralises those who are not given the opportunity of contributing to the community through useful work. There have been developments in policy to deal with the problem, but there is much more that can and should be done. The objective now must be to achieve a substantial fall in unemployment. We therefore urge the Government to take effective measures to expand the economy, and otherwise to create, for those now unemployed, more opportunities of doing useful work."

As I said, that document was signed by a group of non-political prominent citizens in Wales. They know and realise that something can and should be done about the problem of unemployment.

The recent report of the Conservative-dominated Select Committee on Employment put forward detailed proposals for the creation of 750,000 jobs specifically for the long-term unemployed in urban rehabilitation, health care and private industry, with a sweetener of £40 per week to the employer. The cost of the proposals is put at just over £3 billion over three years. That is a third of the amount earmarked for tax cuts in the same period. My right hon. Friend the Shadow Chancellor recently put forward Labour's carefully costed proposals for creating 1 million jobs in two years. Why cannot the Government take some positive action to tackle the horrific problem of unemployment?

Twenty years ago this month I was elected to the House. The following year I recall the Budget of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), on 11 April 1967. He launched his Budget with the slogan "Steady as she goes". Some of us, particularly the new Members, thought that he was being a bit too steady at the time. However, he had some justification for acting in the way he did, bearing in mind that at the time unemployment stood at 610,500—2·61 per cent. of the work force. Now, unemployment figures show 3·3 million people out of work, with countless thousands more ready to take up employment if a suitable vacancy occurs. In that sense, the Budget we have heard this afternoon could well be described as "steady as she sinks".

With this Government, there is no hope for people out of work, but the Labour party has the policies to tackle Britain's fundamental problems. I am increasingly confident that, after the next general election, the Labour party will be given the opportunity to introduce its policies.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I have always been an admirer of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and I believe that his Budget speech today, which was a very clever one, has encouraged his supporters and not given any ground to his critics. In all, I think that he has done a very good job and it will be difficult for the Opposition to try to find much fundamental fault with the Budget.

My right hon. Friend may not be very good at kissing the babies, but he never takes his eyes off his main aim, which is to get the economy right by squeezing out inflation—we have heard so much about inflation from Opposition parties—getting back to honest money and controlling public expenditure, which is always difficult in any democracy. Everyone knows what a difficult task he had this year with the sudden diminution in the oil revenues. I believe that both he and the country will gain in the long run by the great drop in the price of oil. It is bound to be good for world trade, for our manufacturing industry and for my part of the world, the west midlands, where industries have suffered so much during recent years.

The whole trend of the Government's policies is to try to get the state off the backs of our people so that they can harness their energies to help themselves with the least hindrance or interference from Government. I was horrified to hear of one case which will give an example of our extraordinary society. An old lady died of hypothermia in a large town where eight of her children were living nearby. Surely we must try to encourage in every way possible a personal, individual and family sense of responsibility.

We all know that taxation is still far too high. It is now clear that we shall have to wait another year before it can be substantially reduced. However, I welcome what the Chancellor has done this year. I particularly welcome the help to the lower paid. Even so, more needs to be done to give an incentive to all those who wish to work and earn a living if they possibly can.

I also welcome the further measures to help the unemployed — which I do not underplay as some Opposition Members do — and to improve training. Training is vital to our industrial and commercial future and to enable us to fight off foreign competition. I welcome the cut in the stamp duty on shares. Share ownership should extend much more widely until nearly everyone is a shareholder in one way or another. Of course, I welcome the special help given in the Budget to the small investor.

I must now say something from the heart which nobody else has yet said and which I say as a high Tory. I am disappointed that the Chancellor did not tax the banks. As an old-fashioned Tory who much prefers the landed to the moneyed interest, I am always inclined to look with a jaundiced eye on the banks and the working of some of the institutions in the City. The banks could have done more to help the small business man. We all know, from their marvellous offices with their thick pile carpets, their lunches and everything else, that they can easily make money without anything like the sweat and tears of the ordinary industrial business man.

Of course I am proud, and we should all be proud, of the City and of the great part it plays in our national and economic life. However, there are blemishes. My father and grandfather both worked in the City. They were both successful but I think that they were modest men. Certainly, in the Stock Exchange they took enormous pains with the private client. Today that spirit and tone is not as it used to be. A new breed of men, slicker, smarter and more ruthless than ever, have come in and they do not do this country any good.

We know of the dishonesties that unfortunately have affected parts of the City, and I am sure that the Government will tackle those as vigorously as possible. I am surprised that no one has mentioned, the strident vulgarity in the colossal advertising campaign—whole page after whole page in the national press — in the takeover battles. These do no good. To see great companies slanging each other in knocking copy is quite disgraceful. I wish the Chancellor would curb those activities and put swingeing taxes on such advertisements.

I am also concerned about some of the transfer fees, as they are called, and astronomic salaries of very young men in the City which bear no comparison to salaries in industry or anywhere else. That is something which the Chancellor should keep his eyes on.

People expect increases in the taxes on drink, tobacco and petrol, at least as much as the increase in inflation. I think that we have been agreeably surprised this year. The tax on petrol was minimal, there is no tax increase on spirits which, after all, are expensive, and the tax rise on cigarettes was what most people expected. Even so, I much prefer indirect to direct taxation.

We are all looking forward to reductions in the bank rate. However, important as that is, it is even more important for management in industry not to grant wage increases which are greater than the rate of inflation, or greater than the productivity of the organisation concerned.

In spite of all the Government's critics, and all that we have heard this afternoon, there is a great deal now going for the Government. The pound has not collapsed with the fall in oil prices, the stock market is booming and the Americans and other foreigners wish to invest here. Production and productivity are increasing year by year. World commodity prices are falling. International interest rates are falling. Soon house mortgages and credit will be cheaper. In time I believe that, following the drop in the price of oil, the unemployment figures will start to fall —I hope substantially. Industry is much more efficient and one hopes to see British goods taking a greater share of the home market.

Reference was made earlier in the debate to the need to increase demand. But the demand is there. The Sainsburys, the Waitroses, the car showrooms and the shops that sell refrigerators are packed with people. The problem is that they are buying foreign, not British goods. The answer is not to pump more money into the economy but to get British firms to become more efficient. There is no other way. That is what this Government have been trying to do and they have succeeded in doing it. Exports are good and I believe that they will improve still further.

Let the Opposition remember that, despite the black spots—all of us know that there are black spots—people in this country, as we have seen from the official figures in "Social Trends", are more prosperous than ever before. The Government should be able to take some credit for that.

In spite of all the unemployment, I have noticed in my constituency that for the first time many people are buying their homes. Many of them have a motor car and many of them go abroad for their holidays. All of them are becoming Conservatives. They are some of the strongest supporters of this Government. I find that in the main the complaints come from those in the very high income brackets. Fortunately, there are more people in the lower income brackets than in the higher income brackets and I therefore have little fear about the outcome of the next general election.

There is no cause whatsoever for us to try to make the Government change course. To do so would mean that all the sacrifices that have been made in recent years have been in vain. Within a few months the International Monetary Fund would be called in again and there would be a colossal economic and financial crash. Any weakening of resolve, as is suggested by some of our more timorous brethren, would be disastrous. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I believe that the country at large will give a very warm welcome to his Budget.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) will forgive me if I do not follow him too far in his revolutionary and daring attack upon the banks. All I would suggest to him is that when he assaults those marble halls he should put Barclays bank, Otley road, Shipley, first on his list.

This is Sheikh Yamani's first Budget in his new period of dominance of the British economy. I hope that Sheikh Yamani will be better as a maker of Budgets than the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), whose first Budget for enterprise saw our share of world trade drop disastrously and whose second Budget for jobs saw unemployment rise precipitously. Therefore, Sheikh Yamani's Budget might have a slightly better effect.

The Government have been robbed of a confidence trick that they were hoping to play on the British people. It was clearly the Chancellor of the Exchequer's intention to come to this House on Budget day and claim that the benefits to this country of oil tax revenues and their effect upon our economy were the result of the Government's policies and that the fruit of those policies would be tax cuts. That would have been a confidence trick. The Chancellor has been robbed of the ability to play that confidence trick.

Sheikh Yamani's impact in reducing the price of oil is a foretaste of what is to come. It is a foretaste of the problems that lie ahead for the British economy as the oil revenue contribution begins to run out. When that happens, this Chancellor will have left us disastrously exposed. The Chancellor and the Government have weakened and undermined the alternatives to oil by neglecting the manufacturing sector of the economy upon which we used to depend for our balance of payments survival. The Government have destroyed a quarter of this country's manufacturing base. They have destroyed 1·8 million jobs in manufacturing industry. They have turned us from being a net exporter of manufactured goods into a net importer of manufactured goods. That will leave us disastrously exposed when the oil price comes down precipitously, as it already has. We have come to the end of the easy, irresponsible years that the Chancellor and his predecessor have thrown away. We have come to the nub of the problem: what to do after oil.

There were two approaches to the oil wealth which Britain began to enjoy under this Government and which distinguished this Government from every previous Government who did not benefit from oil wealth. The first approach—the sensible approach that the Labour party would have adopted to oil—would have been to invest that wealth in our productive economy. It should have been used to rebuild our creaking productive economy and provide a massive overdraft facility in order massively to expand the economy. Our oil wealth would have allowed us to do that by ending the balance of payments constraints which had checked every previous attempt at expansion. In other words, it could have been used to run the economy in a way which would have produced growth to offset the effects of our oil wealth upon the exchange rate.

It would have been sensible to invest in this country and to build up productive assets and resources, which would have enabled us to grow and expand in a way that had never been possible before. However, the Government chose the opposite approach. They allowed oil to push up the value of the pound. They compounded that process by their consistent policy of high interest rates, which have kept the pound grossly over-valued throughout this period. Consequently, our manufacturing base has been ruined.

The high value of the pound has facilitated the massive export of capital—stashing away overseas the benefits from oil. This has benefited not the whole community, but only some of the community. Our transient oil benefit has been invested not in the productive capacity of this country but in the productive capacity of our competitors. The Government chose that alternative. They have used the balance of payments benefits of oil to pay for imported manufactured goods, which have destroyed jobs in this country. The Government have used the tax revenues from oil to support those who are now unemployed because of the effects of oil on the balance of payments. It has been an absolute and total folly. It has resulted in a waste of oil revenues and it has compounded the industrial and manufacturing problems that we faced before the oil came on stream. Having wasted that asset, the problem is what to do about the situation that the fall in oil prices has generated. There are two responses——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will not the hon. Gentleman pay credit to those companies that operate overseas and that last year brought into this country invisibles that amounted to £7·5 billion net? Will he not pay a tribute to industry which has invested £60 billion in new equipment and buildings in this country?

Mr. Mitchell: The bulk of our exports have been in the form of the export of capital and portfolio investment. Last year it amounted to about £20 billion and it was invested in productive capacity overseas. There have been some success stories, but the main reason for firms investing in jobs overseas is that it has not been profitable to invest in this country because of the way in which the economy has been run by this Government.

There were two responses. The first would have been — the Chancellor could have gone for it today — to increase taxation or borrowing to compensate for the loss of oil revenue. According to the autumn statement prediction, that loss must be about £7 billion. That could have been combined with a lower interest rates policy, which would have provided for some expansion of the economy.

The alternative approach would have been to keep interest rates high in order to strengthen the capital account and bring in money to compensate for the weakening of the current account balance of payments, thanks to the falling price of oil. At the same time, demand could have been damped down and taxes cut. The two approaches are alternatives and to a large extent they are mutually exclusive: increase taxes and lower interest rates, or increase interest rates and hope to expand by lowering taxes, which is what the Chancellor has done. The latter has the advantage of no inflationary consequences and no odium for the Chancellor as a result of increasing taxes, but it is the weaker of the two alternatives because interest rates will remain high. There have been persistent rumours, like a kind of continuous mirage dangled before the people, of interest rate cuts coming but never quite arriving. After the mountains have laboured in this fashion, there might be a squeaking mouse of a minor interest rate cut.

Interest rates are much higher in this country than in the countries of any of our competitors. In real terms, allowing for inflation, they are probably double the level of most of our competitors. Although there will be a minor reduction, interest rates will remain high. That imposes a crippling burden on everybody—on the householder, on the person with an overdraft, on local government and, most of all, on manufacturing industry, which needs finance for investment. We need a dramatic increase in investment, bearing in mind the figures given earlier about the fall in investment. This economy will not get the benefit of the expansion that will occur overseas because of the fall in the oil price. As a result of the strategy of high interest rates, there will be no fall in unemployment— the crucial problem that the Chancellor needed to tackle.

Dr. Godman: Is not one of the most realistic indications of the Government's performance over the last few years the fact that almost 40 per cent. of the population of the great city of Glasgow has to subsist on social security?

Mr. Mitchell: That is exactly right, and the Chancellor has not allowed for the horrendous cost of unemployment. It must be costing the Exchequer about £20 billion. I do not know the latest estimate for each person out of work, but it may be £5,000 or £6,000 a year and that represents a horrendous cost to the Exchequer. The Chancellor is in that situation simply because he has run the economy for deflation and for discipline rather than for growth and expansion. The problem he should have faced is what to do now. The prescription the Chancellor should clearly have gone for is one to reduce interest rates as a central aspect of Government policy. There is no point in saying that markets decide interest rates, because interest rates are under the effective political control of the Government and can be brought down by the Government. The minimum reduction necessary is 4 per cent., which would bring us down to somewhere near the level of our competitors. It would not bring us to their level, but it would be somewhere near. That is the key to getting the pound down, because the pound is still grievously overvalued, especially against the deutschmark, where the over-valuation is about 30 per cent. To become competitive with the deutschmark we would need a devaluation of about 22 per cent.

The sterling index, at 74, is now substantially up on its low point of last year—4 per cent. up in money terms and much more in real terms because our inflation rate is that much higher. Unless we reduce interest rates and bring the pound down with them, we will not be able to participate in the world expansion. We will not be able to stem the rising tide of imports and get back into the markets we have lost overseas. That is because our export prices are now some 30 per cent. higher than they were on average for 1973 and 1976, and they were not especially competitive then. How are we to get back into the markets that we have lost without a competitive currency? That competitiveness is conditional on getting interest rates down.

The second approach of the Chancellor should have been to borrow and spend. There is nothing like public spending for stimulating the economy, creating growth and putting people back to work. I should like to offer the Chancellor Mitchell's law. If he looks at the G5 economies over the six years from 1979 to 1984 he will find a direct correlation between the increase in public spending in those economies and the level of unemployment. The biggest increase in public spending—8·6 per cent.—was in the United States, and the unemployment increase in the United States has been only 1·6 per cent.

In Britain, at the other end of the scale, the total public expenditure increase has been 3 per cent. and the unemployment increase has been 8 per cent. The other economies are ranged at intermediate levels depending on how much they have increased public spending. Public spending is the only way of using the under-used resources in our economy and the only way of giving our economy the kind of stimulus that President Reagan gave the American economy and which resulted in the creation of 8 million jobs. There is no point in saying it cannot be done, because 8 million jobs have been created in America in less than three years. That is the kind of expansion we need, spending not on the same objectives of defence and armaments but on useful public purposes.

The Labour party proposes an increase in the public sector borrowing requirement of around £6 billion. That is an increase on top of the present level plus asset sales —in other words, an increase on top of the £12 billion public sector fiscal deficit. That would put unused resources back to work. It would put building workers back into jobs and tackle the housing crisis that is building up. That is what the Chancellor should have got on with.

The third matter to which the right hon. Gentleman should have devoted some attention is clearly social justice. He should take back from the richest 5 per cent. of our population, those earning over £25,000 a year, the benefits that have been showered on them in a continuous dribble of about a dozen concessions in each Budget under this Government. There have been concessions in capital transfer tax and capital gains tax. More benefits in capital transfer tax on unearned income have been repeated today, to an amount of about £3·6 billion annually, and that has all been given to that richest 5 per cent. If that is taken back —and it can be taken back—we could use that money to increase pensions by £5 for a single pensioner and by £8 for married pensioners. We could increase child benefit by £3 and put the long-term unemployed on the long-term supplementary benefit rate, which is where they should have been all along. That would stimulate the economy, because those people spend their money on British goods and not on buying BMWs and on overseas trips. That is a stimulus and a matter of social justice that it is essential to fulfil.

The fourth purpose is an expansion of employment schemes. It is tragic to see how little has been done in the Budget for the unemployed. Why could the Chancellor not take up some of the schemes put forward in the report from the Select Committee on Employment on special employment measures and the long-term unemployed? That Committee put forward three proposals: a building improvement scheme to provide 300,000 jobs; the employment of 100,000 long-term unemployed in the social services and the National Health Service; and the introduction of a subsidy to private employers to take on long-term unemployed in addition to their existing employees. The total cost of those recommendations was only £3·3 billion.

Why has the Chancellor devoted so little of his Budget to the necessary objective of bringing down the horrendous level of unemployment? I concede that the Government have been absolutely brilliant at bringing down the unemployment figures, thanks to all the fiddles, manipulations, changes, doctoring, Tebbitising and sanitising that has gone on. What they have not brought down is unemployment, because it has continued to rise to a point where the long-term unemployed are now four times more numerous than they were at the height of the depression in the 1930s. That is a national tragedy and a waste of human resources, yet all the Government can do is manipulate the figures.

The Government tell us that they have created 700,000 new jobs since 1983. They do not say that most of those jobs are part-time and filled by women. They do not say that the net loss in jobs since the Government came into power is 1·1 million. Those jobs have been thrown away since 1979. Jobs lost in the whole of the Common Market for the same period have amounted to only 500,000, less than half the number of jobs lost by this Government. We have a national tragedy and a national problem because our unemployment level, disguised though it is, is now higher than that of any major industrial country. It is a horrendous burden on the productive economy and that burden must be eased, not only for social justice but for economic efficiency.

Those are the priorities that the Chancellor should have gone for. As usual, being the artful dodger of economics, he has gone for fast footwork and has held out mirages about tax cuts to come next year — the infinitely postponed and never arriving tax cuts which have been the centrepiece of the Government's dangling carrot to lure Back Benchers through to the next election.

The reduction in the oil price provided an enormous opportunity for the economy, which should have been seized in this Budget. It is equivalent to an increase in the money supply. We could have done it for ourselves six, five, four, three, two or even one year ago. We had the ability to give the same stimulus to the economy by increasing spending and even by reducing taxes when we had high oil revenues. Now the benefit is being forced on us by Sheikh Yamani, whose budget this is. We could have done it for ourselves but we had to have it forced on us by the kindly sheikh.

It is an opportunity to expand. Given the way the Government have ruined the manufacturing sector, our need to expand is more crucial and more desperate than that of any other competing economy. It is a matter of national survival. Unless we rebuild the manufacturing sector, expand industry and get the economy to grow again, how are we to pay our way in the world when the oil contribution fades away entirely? How are we to provide jobs for our young people? How are we to provide the growth to improve the standard of living, which is what the modern electorate wants? How are we to provide the public spending to improve the quality of life, which the public have a right to expect? How are we to do all those things and avoid the fate of a miserable, embittered, declining, divided society, which is where we are heading unless we expand the economy and rebuild the productive sector so that we can provide jobs and survive?

At the end of all the wasted years under this Government it will be tragic if we are to go back to the same balance of payments constraint which has strangled growth in almost every decade since the war. If the Government throw away the benefit of the oil price reduction it will be a national tragedy. To make amends to the people, the Chancellor should have done something in this Budget. Instead, with the same old irresponsibility, he is mortgaging the future by continuous and increasing asset sales; he is desperate to pay the cost of unemployment by selling off national assets. What is more, he is selling them off at a cut price.

The prices that the Government are getting are so inadequate that it is almost as if these were distress sales.

A business man's Government cannot even get a good price for the assets which they are flogging. What a farce that is. They are not even making sensible use of the money they are getting from those sales. They are laying in store horrendous problems for the time when those assets will no longer produce revenue. Because of the asset sales, particularly gas, there will have to be an increase in taxation. The Government should have used the money from asset sales to deal with unemployment.

This, then, is an irresponsible Budget from an irresponsible Chancellor. The Chancellor should have taken the name of Omar Khayyam, with this Budget as his Rubaiyat. The slogan is, live for today: "Take the cash in hand and waive the rest," or, take the cash in hand and wave the Order Papers, as Conservative Members did earlier. I remind them and the Chancellor that there is still the brave music of a distant drum beating out the toll of what is to come as the oil contribution fades away and vanishes entirely. What do we do then to survive? [Interruption.] It is all right for hon. Gentlemen to make sedentary interjections about services. They will not provide jobs for kids and the wherewithal to survive We have now to provide for the hard future which is to come.

The best ephithet on the Budget comes from a compendium of abuse drawn up by the Chancellor's colleague, the Secretary of State for the Environment. It is a quotation from Kipling which sums up the Chancellor's approach and the economic strategy of the Government:

> "I could not dig, I dared not rob;
> Therefore I lied to please the mob.
> Now all my lies are proved untrue
> And I must face the jobs I slew.
> What tale shall serve me, here among > Mine angry and defrauded young?"

6.44 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): The Budget will be welcomed precisely because it rejects the calls for fiscal irresponsibility which we have heard from the Opposition. The Chancellor has today reasserted his commitment to what The Times yesterday called

"stability in the large numbers, designed to vanquish inflation and foster growth combined with supply side changes designed to stimulate industry's response to the changed economic climate."

The crucial question facing the Chancellor is how far the Budget will advance us down the road to popular capitalism — the very phrase which he used in his Budget speech.

In three generations, thanks to generous tax incentives, home ownership has increased from 10 to 60 per cent. of the population. The property-owning democracy is a fact. But the share-owning democracy, the industry-owning democracy, the pension-owning democracy, the education-owning democracy and the health-owning democracy remain dreams. The generation of new wealth to finance those dreams from large cuts in the basic rate of taxation will remain a dream after the Budget, although the Chancellor has made an excellent start.

I intend to show how we can continue the Chancellor's work of making those dreams a reality. We should aim in this Parliament and the next, after the Conservatives have won the next general election, for large tax cuts. I can do no better than point to international comparisons and then to the American experience. If we take the single person's liability to basic rate income tax and social security rates in a group of countries, we find that the United Kingdom is still unfortunately top of the league. The amount taken by the state in the United Kingdom is 39 per cent., in West Germany 36 per cent., in the Netherlands 35 per cent., in France 22 per cent., in Japan 20 per cent., and in the United States 18 per cent. That is not a record for a Conservative Government, albeit doing their best, to be proud of. As the Chancellor said, it is no accident that the United States and Japanese economies are the most successful in the world.

What is even more instructive is the United States experience following President Reagan's tax cuts in 1983 which reduced taxes to the average of the 1970s. In an article in Challenge, Alan Reynolds wrote that it was "never claimed that such a modest cut in tax rates would instantly raise taxable income enough to offset any revenue loss. The claim was instead that dynamic gains in economic growth over time would reduce spending on subsidies, transfer payments and bail-outs".

He added that after tax cuts

"the big boost was . . . from business investment, housing, and consumer durables. Real government purchases actually fell, and true consumption (services and nondurables) was quite weak. Exports staged a good recovery, despite poverty in the developing countries, and imports in 1983 were only 7·5 per cent. of GNP — down from 9·2 per cent in the weak-dollar years of 1979-80. In the first half of 1984, business investment sped up to a 20 per cent. rate of increase, and real GNP growth averaged a marvelous 8 per cent. between the second quarters of 1983 and 1984. Far from being an inflationary boom, as the monetarists had predicted, or a Keynesian consumer boom, the Reagan expansion has been an investment boom of unprecedented proportions. . . . Clearly, reduced marginal tax rates on capital did induce more investment, and reduced tax rates on labor were favorable to both investment and employment."

The efficacy of tax cuts is proved by international experience, and particularly by the American experience in recent years. Cuts in the base rate are preferable to increases in tax thresholds. I did not expect the Chancellor to have the courage to cut the base rate today, but I am delighted that he has done so. I suspect, and I hope, that it augurs a base rate of 25 or 26 per cent. by the end of this Parliament.

I know that the arguments between raising the thresholds and cutting the base rate have gone backwards and forwards over the years. My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) said today that if a change in the level of base rates was to have any significant effect on, for example, work incentives, it would have to be at least 2p in the pound reduction. I can only say to him, "Where do we start?" We have made a successful start today. The problem facing the Chancellor, of course, is that, because allowances have to be indexed each year, there is a built-in ratchet effect for future years, which means that there is a tendency for base rates to be reduced only in exceptional circumstances.

It is often said that an increase in tax allowances is the way to deal with the poverty and unemployment traps. The Institute for Fiscal Studies, in its budget briefing for 1986 estimates—this is an interesting point—that had "the resources used to increase allowances been used to cut the basic rate, it could now be down to 26·5 per cent."

The question to be answered now, therefore, is, should we carry on down the road of increasing tax allowances, or should we go for an all-out drive for cutting the base rate?

It is interesting also that the IFS document says:

"The argument for cutting taxes by raising allowances has frequently been that the poverty and unemployment traps are relieved by taking people out of tax. It has been shown elsewhere (Dilnot 1984; Kay 1984) that raising allowances is in fact a remarkably inefficient way of relieving the poverty trap, and an ineffective way of relieving the unemployment trap."

However—the institute says this, not I—

"a cut in the base rate has a greater effect on the unemployment trap".

Those findings prove to me that there is little appreciable benefit, if we are talking about relieving the poverty and unemployment traps, in going for modestly raising tax thresholds rather than for cutting the base rate. But the great advantage of a cut in the base rate is a psychological one, because whether tax cuts are a good thing or not depends very much on whether they are capable of getting the economy moving. I believe that the American experience proves that they can do so.

What now of the drive towards a real participating democracy in which ordinary people can aspire to personal ownership of the major institutions that affect their daily lives? I am delighted that we are implementing today another successful United States device — a pension shelter. When I was writing this speech this morning, I never expected that the Chancellor would institute such a successful device. In America people are allowed to hold a personal investment account which is not taxable and is set at a $2,000 limit. This tax shelter concept has worked brilliantly in the United States, and the Chancellor will be pleased to hear that it has resulted in some people in their twenties investing $2,000 in a pension fund being offered at retirement no less than $1 million because of the intense competition for their accounts. It seems incredible to us that the scheme in America has actually been making millionaires of millions. The whole point is that it is a tax shelter around an infinitely transferable, personal and regularly itemised account, with personal statements, just like a bank account.

In Britain today we are extending the tax shelter to British industry. Imagine the stimulus that this will give to interest in shareholding and, of course, to British industry. The Chancellor is to be congratulated on overcoming the Treasury's traditional blinkered view of investment accounts. The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Wainwright) mentioned this. The Treasury has thought historically only in negative terms of forgone revenue. If that Treasury view, which the Chancellor has today overcome, were to be accepted, there would never be any progress towards the kind of supply-side economics that have proved so successful in the United States.

Needless to say, starting in a small way, the investment tax shelters could be extended to health and education schemes. The sale of British Telecom has shown the way forward, but if we are to make shareholding more than just a hobby for the small investor we must use the tax structure to encourage him. These reforms could easily be accommodated, and are being accommodated, within the existing PAYE and social security systems. But if the two systems were fully integrated, as I hope they will be following the issue of the Green Paper today, the political barriers in their path would, I believe, be far fewer.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend has made an extremely good point, and he has mentioned British Telecom, which too often, perhaps, is mentioned to hon. Members. Will he also mention, as our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has mentioned today, the great and growing success of British Aerospace, which was offered on the British stock exchange by the Government and is proving to be an outstanding success involving outside money in something which hitherto was contributed to only by the Government?

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend makes a valid point and I concur with his remarks.

I was referring before his intervention to the integration of tax and benefit systems. I am amazed, having done some research into this, at how little research there is, either within the Treasury or outside, into how tax credit systems would facilitate share-owning investment schemes. I should like the Treasury to study how tax credits could be provided for each activity which the Government are clearly desperately anxious to encourage. Would it be possible, for instance, to provide a credit of £X for each individual for housing, which would meet in total the cost of state housing and could be topped up for higher-priced private housing? Would it be possible to give each individual a credit of, say, £Y equivalent to the cost of state education, which could be topped up with taxed income for more expensive private education? Why should these credits not be universally available, not just as tax-deductible expenses, as under the present systems, but as a universal right for the whole population?

All these ideas point in one direction — a new impetus to extending free choice for the individual. That aim demands not consolidation, but, as the Prime Minister has said, and as the chairman of the Conservative party has reiterated again this week, radical policies to ensure that there is real public pressure, not for increases in central and local government spending, but for greater opportunities to relieve the state of the burden of deciding how and what is to be provided for the individual and for letting the individual himself decide his own priorities.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Budget debates are always about figures and in the three minutes that I have I hope to make five points.

This is my 27th Budget. Having listened to Conservative Members, I believe that one of the problems resulting from the last six or seven budgets—since 1979—is that the country has been divided as never before. Sometimes when I hear Conservatives talking I feel that they live in a very different world from me.

I want to take up a few of the points that emerged as the Chancellor of the Exchequer glowered across the Dispatch Box at us and, as usual, gave us naught for our comfort.

First, I cannot reconcile the right hon. Gentleman's comments about housing with what happens at my Saturday morning surgery. There are 650 homeless families in sleazy accommodation in Paddington, 15,000 people on the housing list, and my ratepayers are paying £40,000 a week, but I hear the Chancellor talking about the marvellous housing that has been provided under the Conservative Government.

I welcome very much what the right hon. Gentleman has done about VAT for charities but, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), I hope that he does not mean that Eton will get a bit more. I hope too that as a result the Chancellor will do something about the grants for citizens advice bureaux, which are non-political and are under pressure because their grants are being cut off.

I do not have the time to go fully into the question of the unemployed, but I want to add one point to the excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes). The Minister for Health comes to the House time and time again saying that more is being spent on health but also that more people are ill. I never thought that the Health Service was about more people being ill. However, if there are 3·4 million unemployed, the amount of illness that that generates means that the taxpayer has to find much more money for looking after them.

As the House knows, on 14 February the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave me the figure for taxation on cigarettes. I welcome very much the fact that he has now got £350 million extra. I hope that he will use that to remove prescription charges from very bad cancer cases and will also do something about sports sponsorship.

Debate adjourned.—[Mr. Durant.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts and Measures:

1. Consolidated Fund Act 1986
2. Agricultural Holdings Act 1986
3. Prevention of Oil Pollution Act 1986
4. Marriage (Wales) Act 1986
5. Greater London Council (General Powers) Act 1986
6. Bishops (Retirement) Measure
7. Ecclesiastical Fees Measure

Lothian Region (Edinburgh Western Relief Road) Order Confirmation Bill

Order for Third Reading read.

7.1 pm

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the third time.

When I moved the Second Reading of the Bill on 4 December, I immediately mentioned that it was of the utmost importance to Scotland. It involves in no sense a minor local issue, and I shall say why.

The case for the western relief road has consistently been argued on the ground that it would make environmental improvements to living and shopping conditions on the western side of Edinburgh. That in turn would benefit public transport through the relief of traffic congestion and would reduce the incidence of accidents and personal injuries by the separation of vehicles from busy shopping centres, pedestrians and cyclists.

Over and above that the Bill is essential for Edinburgh. It would bring benefits in its relationship to planning policies now approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland in connection with the west side of the capital. Those planning policies refer to the construction of a conference centre in Lothian road, and the facilitation of the expansion and the development of Edinburgh's financial and banking centre in the Lothian road, Morrison street, Semple street, Fountainbridge area. I understand that at this moment discussions are going on between the district council and the Scottish Development Agency on that subject.

Those policies also relate to communications between these developments, the national motorway network and Edinburgh airport. The capacity to link the proposed developments of a financial and banking centre along with a conference centre connected by the relief road to the outer city bypass would mean that communications would be greatly improved. Connecting those developments with the main areas of population in central Scotland, and with roads and air communications throughout the United Kingdom would undoubtedly increase the employment potential of Edinburgh's role as a financial and banking centre.

The provision of a conference centre and purpose-built parking facility, the last of which has just been approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at the eastern extremity of the western relief road, will combine to support an initiative which has potential for the permanent creation of a very large number of jobs. Indeed, it is estimated that about 5,000 jobs would be created over a 10-year period in the development of financial services in Edinburgh.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Such loose statements are always being thrown round, particularly by some Conservative Members. The hon. Gentleman just said that it had been "estimated" that about 5,000 jobs would be created. By whom? On what basis was the calculation made? We should be told. It is no good hon. Members making bland statements without producing any evidence for them. People will start to believe them just because they have been made. We need some hard facts.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Lothian region structure plan goes into the matter in detail. The hon. Gentleman will find all the details that he wants in that plan. Moreover, the Edinburgh chamber of commerce passionately believes that thousands of jobs could be created. Of course the talks going on between the SDA and the district council are also very important.

I remind the House that financial services are a growth area in Scotland. The western relief road would enhance the attraction of Edinburgh as a financial and commercial centre for customers and investors. The gains in international terms would benefit not only Edinburgh but Scotland as a whole, so the Bill is wholeheartedly in Scotland's interests.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): The hon. Gentleman has made great play about financial services, but surely people are no longer sent all over the world, and no longer travel between London and Edinburgh. Such work is increasingly done by computers. Why should we build a motorway?

Lord James-Douglas Hamilton: Edinburgh is a great insurance centre. Insurance companies in Edinburgh are undertaking more and more insurance contracts relating not just to Scotland and the North sea but to many parts of Europe and beyond. Edinburgh is increasingly seen throughout western Europe as a centre of financial services. That is all to the good. Indeed, it is seen by many people as the second centre after London.

The issue of jobs weighs more heavily in the immediate term. I note that the trade unions on the construction side support the Bill. All Scottish Members of Parliament will have received a letter dated 12 February from Mr. George Wilmhurst, construction trades co-ordinator of the Transport and General Workers Union for Scotland. He wrote:

"My main concern is of course employment . . . The Edinburgh western relief road would provide approximately 1,500 jobs in the construction industry. It would, of course, have an effect on the plant hire industry and naturally there would be a huge quantity of building materials required."

Mr. Wilmhurst draws attention to the fact that the construction industry, which is labour-intensive, has suffered drastically, with a substantial reduction of those in employment over the past few years, stating:

"This project would also provide training for a number of apprentices and Youth Training Scheme trainees."

In wanting the Edinburgh western relief road to go ahead, Mr. Wilmhurst is strongly supported by Mr. Fraser, the acting regional secretary of the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, who wrote on 4 March:

"I hereby confirm that our union agrees that this road should be given priority owing to the lack of work in the construction industry at present."

The unions are right to stress the importance of such employment opportunities, as they are important factors.

Mr. Foulkes: Surely the hon. Gentleman will agree that Opposition Members share the concern of the trade unions about the lack of employment opportunities not only in Edinburgh, but in the whole of Scotland. The hon. Gentleman and the unions will agree that exactly the same number of jobs would be created by the same amount of investment in a similar length of road in other parts of Scotland or, indeed, elsewhere in the Lothian region, or in other areas where it is desperately needed and where there are no objections to it—[Interruption.] Will the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) accept that, and will the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) shut up [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is some time since the hon. Gentleman represented constituents in the east of Scotland. Thousands of Edinburgh residents passionately want this scheme to go ahead. The hon. Gentleman asked his question as if a parliamentary commission had not sat for three and a half months, and as if a Joint Committee of both Houses had not considered the matter fully. The parliamentary commission and the Joint Committee sat for longer on this Scottish Bill than any other parliamentary commission or Joint Committee has done this century.

Mr. Maxton rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall return to that matter later. If the hon. Gentleman feels that I have not dealt with the point adequately, he can intervene later.

The primary purpose of the Bill is to relieve the shocking environmental conditions and improve road safety. At present large volumes of traffic are concentrated on the two principal radial routes from Edinburgh to the west: the A8 to Glasgow and the A71 to Lanarkshire. They are heavily overloaded with traffic. The A8, the main Glasgow road, passes through a series of major shopping centres, including those at Shandwick place, in Roseburn and in St. John's road, Corstorphine.

Similarly, the A71 passes through significant shopping centres on Dalry road and Gorgie road. Much of the road is narrow, congested and flanked by high density tenements and shops. More than 80,000 people live in the Edinburgh community served by those roads, and an even greater number use them for local services as shops are on both sides of the roads. Indeed, in the major shopping centres more than 1,000 pedestrians cross the roads every hour, in conflict with through traffic. There are schools either on the roads or in close proximity to them, and I receive representations from worried parents about the dangers to schoolchildren crossing them. They know that there are severe conflicts between through traffic, public transport, local traffic, shopping needs, pedestrians and school children. The consequences of that extremely unsatisfactory position are delays, frustration, danger and accidents. Each year there are about 3,000 accidents involving death or injury in west Edinburgh.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The hon. Gentleman will know that while I was chairman of the inquiry I travelled daily to Edinburgh for more than three months. If the parked traffic at Corstorphine were cleared, access would be much easier.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Rubbish.

Mr. Martin: We are not considering what lies between the hon. and learned Gentleman's ears.

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that I could travel from my home in the north end of Glasgow to the Mound in Edinburgh in only 60 minutes? That is not an unreasonable length of time. If I could do it, any other driver should be able to.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The environmental capacity of the road in Corstorphine is 6,000 cars per day, but every day 24,000 cars use it. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion about removing parked cars would not begin to have the desired effect. It is one of the most congested streets in Britain, and certainly in east Scotland. There is no cure for it other than to build the western relief road in conjunction with the outer-city bypass.

The outer-city bypass may slightly relieve the position in Corstorphine, but all the evidence shows that the conditions in Gorgie-Dalry will worsen substantially. Gorgie-Dalry is not an advantaged area. Part of Gorgie is in my constituency, and all the estimates are that the traffic using Gorgie road would increase after the opening of the outer-city bypass.

On Second Reading the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said of the western relief road:

> "I do not know how anyone can try to quantify the effect of that road on the number of accidents in that part of Edinburgh." —[Official Report, 4 December 1986; Vol. 88, c. 384.]

Since I did not have the opportunity to answer him then, I should like to do so now. The relief road is essentially a bypass for the communities of Corstorphine, Stenhouse, Gorgie-Dalry, Sighthill and Murrayfield-Roseburn on the western side of Edinburgh. It will take through traffic, the origin or destination of which is the centre of Edinburgh, away from the routes that pass through the heart of communities with shopping centres, throbbing with activity, and with schools and countless homes. Instead, it will place the traffic on a purpose-built road with the same bridges and crossing points for pedestrians as are now in existence over or under the railway line. The problems of delay and safety in existing communities will be mitigated by the diversion of traffic to the proposed road.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend. He will not have neglected the fact that the relief to Corstorphine and other parts of the western end of the city will have a direct impact on the centre of my constituency, which is why I have objected to the Bill. Everything piles up in the centre of the city. First, will my hon. Friend turn his attention to the constitutional issue? I understand his enthusiasm for the road, but I hope that he is not enthusiastic about the facts that no independent public inquiry was held, and that only two teams of politicians considered the justification for the plan.

Secondly, will he turn his mind to the question of expenses, which should be awarded to objectors, in addition to the parliamentary commission, members of which will receive two thirds of their expenses? I hope that my hon. Friend will support the suggestion that an amendment may be passed in the other place to give objectors two thirds of the expenses that they incurred in the Joint Committee.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall deal with the question of expenses later.

The parliamentary commission considered whether the road would increase traffic in the city centre, but even the evidence provided by the objectors' expert witnesses admitted that the traffic in the city centre would not be substantially increased by the presence of the road. The technical advice was firmly to that effect, and that point was carefully examined.

It has been well established that dual carriageways have a much better accident record than single carriageways. That is because the central crash barriers greatly reduce the risk of accidents between overtaking vehicles. If the Bill is passed, huge benefits will accrue to pedestrians, regarding both the ease and safety of crossing roads, and more pleasant conditions on adjacent footways.

The relief road would reduce casualties by about 60 a year, and associated traffic management measures, including the closure of residential streets, widening pavements and diverting traffic to the relief road, would reduce accidents by a further 60. In other words, the relief road and associated measures would reduce serious personal injury accidents, including some deaths, by about 120 a year. That is the overwhelming moral justification for the Bill. It will save lives and greatly reduce the serious injuries sustained in west Edinburgh.

Moreover, the western relief road will greatly enhance the quality of life for thousands of Edinburgh citizens. As I said, even the technical evidence of the objectors showed that the road would produce environmental benefits. They were prepared to argue only about the scale.

Throughout, the stated intention of the Bill's sponsors has been to improve safety and the environment, and not to speed traffic. The Bill will affect not only those who live along the A71 and A8, because at present congestion along those routes causes traffic to spill into adjacent side streets, extending the problem still further. Through traffic management methods, about 30,000 vehicles or more would be diverted from those congested streets, once the relief road was completed. Those measures would not be possible without it.

The noise level of the 1,800 dwellings along these roads is above that for which double glazing is considered necessary. The construction of the road, even without other supplementary measures, would improve the position for more than 1,000 dwellings. With associated traffic management measures, the figure would rise to about 2,500 dwellings. Moreover, they would produce important benefits for businesses and shopping centres.

Mr. Fairbairn: On the matter raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher)—[HON. MEMBERS: "Your hon. Friend."]—I thought that that was taken for granted, although after what the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn, (Mr. Martin) said, perhaps my hon. Friend would not want me to be one of his hon. Friends. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) appreciate that the objectors conceded before the Committee of both Houses that there would be no increase in traffic in central Edinburgh? Secondly, before we consider the possibility of amendments about expenses, perhaps the House or the other place should consider what the law is. We are not competent to grant such expenses under the law. Therefore, hon. Members should not become too emotional about the matter.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I shall deal with the question of expenses later. I do not accept what my hon. Friend said about the evidence of the experts employed by the objectors. Noise barriers will be erected, and should limit the impact of the new route, which is generally removed from existing residences. A small number of residences will be adversely affected, but that is far outweighed by the gain and the effect of the increases could be further mitigated by double glazing. About 20 houses need double glazing.

Atmospheric pollution will be minimised by the transfer of many slow-moving vehicles from confined spaces to a free-flowing road. The director of environmental health for Edinburgh district council is on record as supporting the proposal in the Bill. Benefits will be most significant in areas which give rise to most concern, but the levels of pollution within the relief road corridor would be below those being experienced in St. Johns road, Corstorphine, and below the lowest threshold which would cause any concern.

The outer-city bypass is no cure to the problem. It would reduce traffic in Corstorphine by 20 to 25 per cent., but the traffic in Gorgie-Dalry and Stenhouse would actually increase, as will traffic generally south of the Edinburgh-Glasgow railway. On Gorgie road, the traffic flow will increase by 50 per cent., and on Dalry road by 70 per cent. Gorgie-Dalry is not a wealthy area, and the intolerable environmental effects ensuing from the building of the outer-city bypass underline the need for the relief road.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the proposal for the outer-city bypass increase through city traffic, or will it enable people, for example, from East Lothian or the Borders, who wish to get to Edinburgh airport to avoid more easily the city centre? If it does generate more traffic coming into the city, or at least traffic coming in at one point, does Lothian region propose any parking facilities to accommodate any such increases in full?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The district council proposed building new parking facilities next to the Sheraton hotel, and recently my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State gave approval. There will be 1,500 parking bays, but as cars use them for short periods they can accommodate several thousand cars a day. That deals effectively with one of the concerns which has been expressed about parking in the city centre.

Of course the outer city bypass is welcome in that it will remove from the city centre all traffic that can use the bypass, but it does have the problem that it will increase very substantially the traffic that comes into Gorgie-Dalry, especially if no relief road is built.

The net effect of the construction of the relief road will be to remove almost all the traffic from the residential areas south of the Edinburgh-Glasgow road and bring about a major reduction on the A71 road to Lanarkshire, while affording the potential to reduce traffic on that road principally to buses and local movement. The traffic on the A8 will be reduced to a quarter of its present level, and these improvements will be widely welcomed. There will be a marked improvement in bus services. The director of public transport supports the project and hopes that it will go through, because bus services would gain about three minutes on peak services. Each day there are about 2,500 bus journeys along the——

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): Will not the relief that will arise on the A8 coming in from Glasgow, in turn relieve the general pressure on traffic coming into Edinburgh from the Forth bridge direction? If some of the traffic opted to come in on the A8 route, and if there were less pressure on the road, would that not help traffic coming into Edinburgh from either the west or north?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It would make certain that there would be much less worry about permanent traffic jams. Later, I shall come to the proposals of the Edinburgh district council for its £100 million plan for development which would cause a permanent traffic jam in Corstorphine. My hon. Friend says there is a permanent traffic jam in it at the moment.

If the plans of the Edinburgh district council go through, then 30,000 traffic units will pass every day through Corstorphine, traffic will be totally clogged up, and life will be absolutely intolerable for those who live in the west of the city.

There are 2,500 bus journeys along the A71 and A8 each day. Higher bus running speeds on existing roads after the construction of the relief road will increase the popularity of public transport, and have its importance in attracting new users. For all these reasons, the quality of life will be improved for countless Edinburgh citizens, causing this Bill to have such massive support.

The idea of the relief road is not new. The Abercrombie plan for Edinburgh in 1949 anticipated the development of such a road, and in the 1960s Professor Buchanan had his own proposals. The Edinburgh development plan of 1965 also made provision for a new radial road, a west approach road to the M8.

Professor Buchanan wanted a six-lane motorway, and, as a result of his proposals, there was the suggestion of an intermediate circular route. As an Edinburgh councillor, I voted against those proposals because I felt that they were too extreme and would have destroyed a great many houses. Throughout, I have taken the position that for any road proposal to go through, the houses must be respected and the roads must not take precedence over them. I believe that as strongly as possible. This proposal is infinitely more modest than that of Buchanan, and is of a scale intended to fit the city.

The Lothian region had such a plan which set out the regional authority's policies on these proposals and relief roads, which would fit in with the pattern of communications outlined. This provides for the outer-city bypass and the extension of the M8 from the west to that bypass. The relief road and the M8 extension are planned as part of a comprehensive package.

In December 1982, the Lothian regional council appointed consultants to carry out a study of the proposed construction for a western relief road. From that moment, the objectors to this proposal were treated very fairly. I went to see the consultants to impress on them that houses must not be destroyed in large numbers. My representations were not in vain. They agreed that any scheme involving the wholesale destruction of houses would be unacceptable. That is why they came forward with the ingenious scheme of moving the railway line to the north to safeguard 240 council houses.

In May 1983, the consultants reported back to the regional council and recommended that the relief road was justified in terms of environmental and traffic benefits, and that it should be built as a dual carriageway as soon as practicable, but it was not to be opened before the Sighthill section of the outer-city bypass. They recommended that the planning and design of the road should maximise environmental protection, including the construction of noise barriers and full landscape treatment. The scheme was to be undertaken in such a way as to secure the reorganisation or relocation of businesses without loss of employment. As far as possible, the loss of recreational facilities would be made good by the provision of alternative sites. Permanent environmental improvements with adjoining communities were to be secured by comprehensive planning and traffic management measures to give priority to local needs. In coming to these conclusions, the consultants conclusively rejected the no-road option.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Member was talking about moving the railway line into the strip of the Carrick Knowe golf course. Is the hon. Member aware that, as far as I understand it, this means that what is currently a straight railway line will have curves introduced? Since in other parts of Britain, in France, and all over the world, people are getting curves out of railway lines and making them straight, is this not a retrograde step? What explanation does the hon. Member have for this? Will that not discourage people from using the railway, and make congestion in Edinburgh even worse?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: British Rail has had every opportunity to make that point, but it has not objected and it did not participate in the parliamentary commission, as far as I know. That has not been a worry about which the parliamentary commissioners or the Joint Committee was concerned, and it is not a problem.

Mr. Martin: The hon. Member read the transcript of the hearing, and he will know that British Rail was worried, and that the counsel for the Cockburn association and other organisations, James Clyde, made the valid point that the inquiry should have given more consideration to the railway realignment than anything else, because that was the reason the order was introduced. Does he agree that little consideration was given to the railways, and that this was wrong?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: If British Rail were seriously anxious about this matter, I should have expected it to get in touch with me at some stage to voice that concern. It has not. I appreciate that the parliamentary commission was not unanimous, in that the decision was reached by three to one; but the overwhelming majority came to the view——

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I must proceed.

Mr. Martin rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Members will be getting their chance later and can develop their points then. I have much to say.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. Martin rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have three hon. Members on their feet at the same time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As I said, the consultant——

Mr. Martin rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall not give way.

Mr. Martin: Is the hon. Gentleman afraid to give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The preposterous suggestion has been made by those appearing on behalf of the Edinburgh district council that the two roads worst affected by traffic congestion would be improved, in the sense of making it easier for traffic to drive through the communities concerned. Far from relieving the communities of the traffic with which they are desperately overloaded, this would further expose them to even more intolerable pressures.

Then there was the "wait for the outer-city bypass" school of thought. The consultants declined to test this, and the studies that they completed revealed that, while there would be some relief in Corstorphine, the position would be much worse in Gorgie-Dalry. They foresaw that there would be more pressure to increase the capacity of the two radial routes, as an alternative to the western relief road. This additional capacity could be obtained only at the expense of the local community, whose members live, work, shop and go to school in those areas, by giving priority to traffic over them. They also saw that traffic using the main radial routes will continue to grow because of the increased levels of car ownership and because there are proposed developments on the western side of Edinburgh. Here, their words were strangely prophetic.

I have here the District Council News, which is produced on behalf of the Labour administration on the Edinburgh district council. It says that the Labour group is proposing a £100 million investment in the west of the city. It just so happens that this investment is perched at the western end of the proposed relief road in my constituency. The article says that the project, involving

> "200 acres of land at South Gyle will create a high technology park and a district shopping centre as well as several hundred houses. It is a joint development by Marks and Spencer, Associated Dairies, Wimpey Homes, with the cooperation and participation of the City of Edinburgh District Council."

The proposed shopping centre extends to 400,000 sq ft. This is larger than any shopping centre now in existence in Scotland. As well as that, 40 acres will be developed for housing with 123 acres as a high technology park in the green belt.

This application has been called in by the regional council, and if it is approved, 30,000 extra units of traffic will be using the roads every day. I do not need to tell the House that the effect of those proposals on west Edinburgh would be a permanent traffic jam of hideous proportions. The plans of Edinburgh district council, if implemented without amendment, would condemn thousands of my constituents to live in circumstances of frustration and degradation. Their lives would be adversely affected by the permanent traffic jam on their doorsteps.

The present environmental capacity of St. Johns road is 6,000, the existing traffic is nearly 24,000 and the bypass would reduce the figure marginally to 19,000. If these proposals go ahead without a relief road, there will be 30,000 extra units, and life will become intolerable, not only in Corstorphine but, even more so, in Gorgie-Dalry, where the traffic will, in any case, grow when the outer-city bypass opens. The environmental capacity of Gorgie road is 6,000 a day and more than 10,000 cars now use it. When the outer-city bypass opens, that number will increase to 15,000.

The Socialists on Edinburgh district council simply cannot have it both ways. They cannot say, "Yes, we want that £100 million development, but we do not want the western relief road." The mammoth developments that they propose——

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, because I know that he has a constituency interest. The mammoth developments proposed will be unacceptable, and if the council imposes them, they will bring misery and unbearable environmental conditions for my constituents.

Mr. Cook: I shall be gentle with the hon. Gentleman, because as he is aware, our views on the proposed development concur. The difficulty that he foresees will be avoided if Lothian regional council sticks by its strategic plan and recognises Livingston as the major shopping centre for the area. However, is not the hon. Gentleman also trying to have it both ways? He is supporting the road, but, as I understand it, is not in favour of the development.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Before expressing a hard view on a £100 million development, which has many different facets, I shall take the views of my constituents into account. I have done that with the relief road, because many meetings have taken place, so I am aware of their concern. However, there is much concern about this proposed development because shopping patterns will be wiped out of existence and the changes will be far-reaching.

The hon. Gentleman expressed reservations about that £100 million development, but I know of no such reservations from the Edinburgh district council, which has published the article to which I refer, and which I can let him have if he would like it. If massive developments are proposed, with them there should be the improved environmental conditions that make life tolerable for those who live nearby and round about.

An exhibition was organised about the western relief road from 19 July to 3 September 1983. Some 40,000 households received leaflets explaining what the relief road would do. More than 3,000 persons visited the exhibition and the representations in writing that the consultants received showed that a decisive majority wanted the relief road to go through. During this process, I attended the meeting, and I and others urged the consultants to make changes.

An important one was the move to safeguard as much as possible the employment of those who work at Westfield. The consultants listened to the representations and substituted a viaduct through the Westfield area to minimise the impact on businesses in that area. It was made clear that the design standards are virtually the lowest for a dual carriageway road, the speed limit over much of that road being 40 miles an hour. The line of route takes amenity interests into account.

For the most part, the route will occupy vacant ground or utilise former railway land. Most of the route runs alongside the Edinburgh-Glasgow railway line. At one point, as mentioned, where the route would conflict with housing, the railway is diverted. The diversion of the railway, the construction of the viaduct and the presence of undeveloped or derelict land allows the whole project to proceed with the demolition of only one house. A satisfactory arrangement has been made with the householder concerned.

Although road proposals involve the loss of open space, allotments and part of the golf course, the regional council has agreed to relocate those facilities and there will be extensive landscaping. The facilities affected by the relief road will be replaced or improved.

There are safeguards in the Bill for allotment holders and there is a smaller loss of land, as was mentioned earlier, in relation to Carrick Knowe municipal golf course. The region has employed a golf course architect who has prepared a design for remodelling the course on an 18-hole, par 70, basis of greater interest than the present course. That is covered by clause 35.

On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East spoke about the importance of open space, although the same arguments apply to Portobello bypass in his constituency. That bypass, in the course of construction, which starts at Musselburgh and goes on to Portobello, goes through a disused coal mine, small shops and car parking adjacent to Asda, through allotments, through a garage and car showrooms, through former rail land, rail workshops, and wasteland, and will pass on an embankment behind houses in Portobello. In some ways, that bypass is even more intrusive than the western relief road, yet the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East is only too happy to support a relief road for his constituency.

Some of the land on which the western relief road will run has been used as an informal recreation area and in places it has been used for dumping. The land has always been reserved for a major motorway and the road does not take it all. The road proposed is not a motorway. It is proposed to lay out a football pitch on some of the remaining land as well as to relocate and landscape a children's play area. Amenity and recreational interests have been taken into account.

I should like to examine the procedures involved in this matter. The regional council used the procedure of a parliamentary commission. As it turned out, that has allowed a wider debate than would otherwise have occurred. The parliamentary commission was the longest which has ever sat and was chosen for three reasons. First, the region could be faced with three planning inquiries: on the planning aspects of the road; on land acquisition apart from the rail diversion; and on rail diversion and associated land acquisition. Secondly, the procedure allowed a guaranateed hearing into the whole proposal. Thirdly, it allowed for a rather wider range of compensation than would normally have been available. Some 39 amenity groups banded together for the inquiry. Witnesses from the smaller groups said that they had received a fair hearing.

A number of arguments were put forward at the commission by the district council, the Cockburn association and the Balgreen, Stenhouse and Whitson action group. They argued that the new road would increase city centre traffic. Extensive analysis demonstrated that the redistribution of existing traffic caused by the relief road would not have a significant effect on the city centre. The consultants' view was that there was no evidence that the modest scheme proposed would significantly alter the number of journeys——

Mr. Foulkes: What is the purpose of the relief road, then?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The purpose of the road is to remove cars from a highly congested shopping centre, where there is considerable danger to the lives and welfare of children and those who live there and to remove those cars to a purpose-built road where they will not pose the threat that they now do.

Mr. Foulkes: On that particular point, which is crucial, will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Other hon. Members want to speak, and I want to develop my point.

Lothian region intends to maintain a limit upon parking. That is an important factor which——

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Member give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This will be the last occasion that I will give way.

Mr. Foulkes: This is a crucial point. The hon. Gentleman's whole central point is that the Saughton road and the Gorgie-Dalry road traffic will all go on to the new relief road. The hon. Gentleman ought to know from his experience that as soon as traffic goes on to that relief road more traffic will come in to the Corstorphine road and the Gorgie-Dalry roads, as those roads are at present relatively empty. More traffic will come into the city centre, thus making the constituency of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) more congested.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point, because he is fundamentally wrong. People come into the city centre only if they have the time and the money to do so. Whether the relief road is built or not will have no effect on the time or money of those who wish to travel to the city centre. The effect of the road is merely to redistribute traffic which already exists.

The road will not have the effects that the hon. Gentleman fears. If the hon. Member does not believe me, he should look at the big road into the heart of Sheffield, which has not increased traffic in that city centre. It has not had that feared and dreaded effect. Much of what the hon. Gentleman is saying represents a fear of the unknown. I am certain that the experts who produced the evidence know what they are talking about.

There are five points of relief where traffic will be redistributed into the city centre: the Roseburn spur, Dundee street, Haymarket spur, Canning street and Lothian road. It must be remembered that with the parking facilities at the end of the road, it allows an opportunity for cars to get out of Edinburgh speedily without congesting the roads which we are concerned about.

I shall give a piece of evidence to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, who is reluctant to accept what I am saying. When parts of the western approach road were opened, before and after studies showed that there was a drop in peak traffic on Lothian road. It was contended that more effective use of public transport with the outer-city bypass would make that road unnecessary. More effective public transport would be at the cost of demolishing houses and properties alongside the route and it has been identified that some properties would have to be destroyed in the Chesser. That would be totally unacceptable to those concerned.

The region has proposed rail improvements. With park-and-ride schemes, it has built a new railway station at Livingston and a station has been opened at South Gyle. Further stations will be opened on the Bathgate line, at Currie and at Wester Nailes. While these will help, they are not a substitute for the relief road. The parliamentary commission, as the House knows, decided by a majority to support the road project. The matter should be considered by the Joint Committee on the basis that justice should not only be done but seen to be done. Serious allegations have been made in the petitions which have been lodged before the House.

We are entitled to express gratitude to the two hon. Members who served on the parliamentary commission

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

—the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) and the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst)—and to those hon. Members who served on the Joint Committee. Two of those hon. Members gave up three and a half months of their time and the other two gave up nearly seven weeks. That represents a considerable sacrifice, to make certain that the matter should be properly considered.

At almost the same time that the Joint Committee reported, the Secretary of State gave the go-ahead for the building of the multi-storey car park. That development will help speed up the construction of the international conference centre nearby and the development of a financial and banking centre. The car park is an important move in easing the city's severe parking problems by siphoning off several thousand cars.

I believe that the centre of the city is catered for in five different ways. First, the multi-storey car park will make a substantial difference. Secondly, the council's parking control methods should discourage long-stay parking. Thirdly, the railway halts providing park-and-ride facilities will encourage commuters to leave their cars outside the city. Fourthly, the traffic lights control system and the traffic management measures will operate to redistribute traffic as required when the relief road is built. Fifthly, the outer city bypass will take out of circulation in the city centre traffic which can use a bypass to the city.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) referred to expenses for the objectors. I am sympathetic with the determined line he has pursued on their behalf, not least because I am a life member of the Cockburn association and the National Trust. I shall not go into the detail of the legal complexities, but I believe that, as a matter of general principle, the amenity groups should be entitled to participate in massive planning inquiries without sustaining punitive costs with no hope of reimbursement. The points they raised were fully considered. Although the parliamentary commissioners and the Joint Committee rejected their line of argument, it was right that they should be heard, because they voiced the concern of some of their members.

Although the costs of the regional council and the district council are matters for those authorities respectively, I believe that the costs of the Cockburn association should be viewed sympathetically by the regional council because the issues needed full consideration before a decision could be reached. I believe that generosity by the region would not be a great sacrifice by ratepayers. I believe that such payment is desirable and necessary, whatever the legal technicalities may be.

From where does the opposition to the relief road come? I have heard a rumour that it emanates from the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East. That is remarkable, because the hon. Gentleman is benefiting from the Portobello bypass, which is a relief road through his constituency. The objective of that bypass was to remove traffic from shopping and residential areas where the traffic volume was approximately half the traffic volume in the west of the city. The only difference between the hon. Gentleman's constituency and mine is that the need for relief is far greater in west Edinburgh because the traffic volume is infinitely greater than in east Edinburgh.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East, tries to deny to my constituents benefits for which he has fought on behalf of his constituents. He supports a relief road for east Edinburgh, not for west Edinburgh. However, the hon. Gentleman's colleagues on Edinburgh district council, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman himself, are promoting a £100 million development in west Edinburgh. If development is to take place in the west, there must be roads with it to make life tolerable.

Traffic congestion in the western sector is totally unsatisfactory. Relief is vital for the areas where traffic is desperately overloaded. I hope that priority will be given to the local communities because, if the traffic is speeding, it can only be at their expense. None of the no-road options benefited those concerned. I strongly recommend the legislation.

The Bill is in the interests not only of my constituents but of Scotland. The environmental improvements, the accident reductions, the saving of lives and the benefits to public transport are all obvious, but the contribution of the western relief road to Scotland's economic well-being cannot be too strongly stressed. The people of Edinburgh make a great contribution to Scotland and to the United Kingdom as a whole. Edinburgh is one of the most beautiful cities in the world. Its educational system is second to none. Its banking, finance, insurance and commercial activities have a worldwide reputation. I believe that Edinburgh is well on the road to becoming the second financial centre of Europe after London.

The developments proposed by the Scottish Development Agency and the conference centre will establish a high-grade office development for financial institutions. At one end of the road is this proposed £100 million development; at the other end is the proposed development of a financial centre. Each proposed development will have the maximum impact only if there is a relief road. I have reservations about Edinburgh district council's proposal. However, I believe that it is essential to have this legislation because it stands for progress. It is essential for Edinburgh and Scotland.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I mean no offence to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), but I think that it was unfair of him, knowing that many hon. Members wanted to put their case, to take so long. The Conservative party's interest in Edinburgh was shown by the fact that only one Conservative Member was willing to speak. The hon. Gentleman had to keep the debate going until his colleagues——

Mr. Robin Cook: There are only four of them.

Mr. Martin: —managed to finish their meal at the Harcourt Grill. That was very sad. It does not say much for the Conservative party's attitude to Edinburgh.

I do not believe that we should discuss Edinburgh's planning requirements at this stage. Three and a half months should not have been spent in Edinburgh, away from the business of Parliament, dealing with this matter. I do not believe that the issue should have been dealt with by a Joint Committee. The House has created legislation allowing local authorities to take up these matters through planning inquiries. If local authorities felt that planning inquiries would not give objectors and supporters alike a proper voice, they should have made representations to the House long ago. It is ridiculous to say that a parliamentary inquiry was needed because it would give ordinary people in Edinburgh the opportunity to state their case.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West confounded that argument when he told us that the Joint Committee rejected the proposal to cover the expenses of those who were good enough to make known their objections. The objectors reacted responsibly by creating an umbrella group of all objectors and allowing the Cockburn association to represent them, to appoint Queen's counsel and to make legal representation. It is wrong to say that this type of procedure makes things easy for the objectors. I believe that it makes it more difficult.

Anyone who spent any time at the Edinburgh inquiry would have seen that it was not easy for members of the public to make representations. They had to appear before six Queen's counsel and their juniors. I do not believe that it would have been easy for anyone to petition against the Bill.

The Government have a large majority. If they had had a very small majority, would they have allowed two Members of Parliament to go to Edinburgh?

Mr. Henderson: It would have depended on who they were.

Mr. Martin: The hon. Gentleman will know that the group must consist of an Opposition Member and a Government Member. If there were a Government with a small majority, a local authority opposed to the Government of the day could manipulate the parliamentary order and get people to object to it. The Government would be obliged to set up a parliamentary commission in Scotland. That would not be allowed. I am sure that the Leader of the House would bring about a change in legislation very rapidly.

As the only person who can represent constituents in Glasgow, Springburn, it is a scandal that I was taken away from the business of the House. I had a major redundancy declared in my constituency while the parliamentary inquiry was going on, and I was unable to come here to make representations on behalf of all the work force in the only major industry left in my constituency. That is not right. I do not mind the House taking a decision that I have to be elsewhere, but I take exception to a local authority making that decision when it had the power to go to a planning inquiry.

We were in Edinburgh to consider legislation. That is as it was explained to us by the two competent clerks, who were both qualified Queen's counsel. I think that Mr. Gavin Douglas is the Secretary of State for Scotland's legal adviser. We were advised from the outset, as parliamentary commissioners, that our main object was to look at the legislation to see whether it was properly worded and to make sure that it was not defective. We had to ensure that it would allow British Rail to divert the railway in such a way that no claim could be made against it, and that it was complying with the Railway Acts.

A submission was made at the early stages of the inquiry by James Clyde, now Lord James Clyde, a High Court Judge. His case was that we should throw out the order because there were other means at the disposal of the local authority and it should go back and prepare an order that consisted only of diverting the railway. Listening to the evidence, it was my view, and that of the legal advisers, that had that been done it would have taken only weeks to get the thing through. We would not, as a result, be having this discussion tonight and valuable parliamentary time would not have been taken up. All that we would have discussed was the diversion of the railway. Evidence was led to the effect that to proceed with such a major road development by parliamentary order was unprecedented. No evidence was put forwarded that could stand up to scrutiny to show that such a development had ever been put through by way of parliamentary order.

It does not matter what the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West says about a dual carriageway—there are dual carriageways and dual carriageways. I live on a dual carriageway—Wallacewell road and Balornock. I invite the hon. Gentleman to come and see it. It bears absolutely no resemblance to this proposal. What we have before us is a proposal for a motorway without a hard shoulder. It is the equivalent of the Clydeside expressway, which is a lot different from the Wallacewell road.

Evidence was led by the proposer of the Bill, the regional authority, that what we are talking about is something similar to the Clydeside expressway. This is a motorway in every sense of the word except that it does not have a hard shoulder. No one in his right mind would attempt to cross the expressway on foot, because the traffic is so heavy. Indeed, the local authority has built bridges over it. There was never any parliamentary order to deal with that proposal, and the hon. Gentleman knows it.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West says that we on the Labour Benches have a fear of the unknown. I think that I know as much about motorway proposals as any hon. Member. I lived in a community known as Anderston, where the Clydeside expressway is. That was a tight-knit community. There was a good strong community spirit which must exist in Corstorphine and other parts of Edinburgh. The Clydeside expressway cut across several streets in that community, with the result that the population in the Anderston district of Glasgow is less than a third of what it used to be in the 1950s, when I lived there as a boy. It did not help things when they put a motorway through the centre of Glasgow and pushed all the population to the outlying areas. Even though some people have moved away from their old districts, and have been away for over 30 years, they still come to Members of Parliament and councillors in Glasgow saying, "I want to go back to the old area that I used to belong to."

Mr. Henderson: Can the hon. Gentleman tell me the political complexion of the authority that allowed that development to go ahead? Can he honestly put his hand on his heart and say that the opportunities for the objectors from Anderston were any greater than were the opportunities for the objectors to this scheme? Is it not the case with this proposal that only one house is to be taken away, which was not the case in Anderston?

Mr. Martin: There were not many people in Anderston who could afford a QC and a junior to help them at a parliamentary inquiry. My point is that lessons should be learnt from Glasgow. We have deplorable housing in Glasgow, and many people said that these motorways would be the answer to all our problems, because the roads would bring more industry and relieve traffic. There are still parts of Glasgow where the traffic is very heavy. What is the answer?

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West talked about experts. The experts, who were outside the city, told those of us who live in Glasgow what we should be doing and what was good for us. Some of them stay in Edinburgh. The experts kept telling us that we needed more motorways. They had a plan to put a motorway through my area to bypass the district of Stepps. They plan to put a motorway from the end of Glasgow to link up with the M8. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should take that into consideration. There will be more traffic brought on to the M8 and more traffic going on to the very road that he is proposing.

Even though these ideas about motorways in Glasgow came up in the early 1960s, and all the citizens were shown drawings and working models of what the place would look like, we still have many problems. These have been thrown up because the experts told us that this would be good for us. I say to the hon. Gentleman and the people of Edinburgh that they should not think that the only thing they will get is this relief road. Some other expert will come along and suggest adding another mile or two—"Why not do something else? Why not have a ring road?" The strange thing is that all that traffic on the relief road stops at the city centre. Therefore, someone will come up with the bright idea that it does not work, just as they came up with the bright idea in the 1980s, that despite all the motorway building more motorways were needed.

The upheaval in Glasgow has been scandalous. In Springburn, where I live, there were excellent properties which the experts told us would not be pulled down, yet the planning blight was so bad that they fell down. People pleaded with the authorities to pull buildings down. It is all right for the hon. Gentleman to say that not one building will be touched, but let us not kid ourselves. We have only to look at what happened in Glasgow and the problems of planning blight there. There is more noise than people expected. Communities are divided. People cannot get to the parks or schools. The lead from the petrol, the fumes and so on have eroded the quality of life. All those problems exist in Glasgow, not just in Anderston, but in Cowcaddens and the Gorbals.

The main problems, which were touched on by the hon. Gentleman, were the planning considerations. One of the justifications for motorways in Glasgow was that they would bring more industry to the city. If motorways bring industries to cities, Glasgow should be a boom town instead of having the worst unemployment problems in Europe. Therefore, that argument is confounded.

The parliamentary inquiry threw up another problem. Each and every one of us on that inquiry had no legal training——

Mr. Robin Cook: That may have been an advantage.

Mr. Martin: That may be, but we depended on the advice of Queen's counsel to the Secretary of State, who acted as our clerks. Let me put on record that they were excellent people to work with. I did not envy them their task. Like myself, they had other jobs to do, yet they worked hard to make sure that we were given every facility. On every occasion we received not just legal advice, but strong legal advice, that the legislation before us was defective. That advice was cast aside by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst), who I regret is not in the Chamber, and the two other parliamentary inquiries. The advice of the best legal brains in Edinburgh was thrown aside like a rusty nail.

It was not known at the time, but that was why the first motion to be put before the commissioners after all the proceedings was mine, saying that in view of strong legal advice we should reject the parliamentary order. Needless to say, it was 3:1 against. However, I felt so strongly about the matter that it had to be put on the record. I mention it today because the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West said that there was a strong majority against. I remind the hon. Gentleman that two independent Queen's counsel advised us that we should have rejected the order.

The hon. Gentleman does not take into consideration the fact that after the order was approved in Edinburgh, against my wishes, the representatives of British Rail came to the House to seek amendments to that parliamentary order. Therefore, the parliamentary order that was put before to us in Edinburgh was different from that which was put before hon. Members in the Joint Committee and the Members of the House of Lords.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Sharp practice.

Mr. Martin: I do not know whether it was sharp practice. I merely make the point that the amendments were made and it would be erroneous to suggest that what was agreed in Edinburgh was the same as what was being considered at the Joint Committee.

When the people who represented the opposers—the petitioners against—came before the commissioners, in some cases those who were giving evidence were treated rather high-handedly. It is on record, because there was a transcript of every day's proceedings. Some people who represented voluntary organisations gave evidence and some commissioners gave the impression that they had already made up their minds before they had heard them. There is no need to take my word for it, because the transcript shows that on a number of occasions I had to interject and ask commissioners not to treat witnesses in such a manner. Certainly it was my opinion that some commissioners had made up their minds before they had heard all the evidence.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): Scurrilous.

Mr. Martin: That is true. I am certainly not referring to myself. Anyone who was there and heard the way that some witnesses were being ridiculed by the commissioners would have gained the impression that the commissioners had made up their minds.

Mr. McQuarrie: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for having to leave, but I am expecting an important telephone call. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the people who had made up their minds were Members of the House, or were they independent members of the panel? There were two independent members of the panel and two Members of the House. Is he suggesting that Members of the House had prejudged the commission's inquiries?

Mr. Martin: There was a report in The Scotsman in which it was mentioned that the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden had said to Mr. Oliver Barrett, a member of the Cockburn Association, during a tea break or lunch break in St. Giles restaurant, "You will get your road whether you like it or not."

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that he is making a serious allegation, which is strongly disputed and rejected?

Mr. Martin: That is not an allegation that I am making against the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden. That was the report in The Scotsman, which is a reputable newspaper, and it has not been retracted. I say only that there is a record to that effect. If the hon. Gentleman comes to the Chamber he will be able to put the matter right, but that was the allegation as it appeared in print, and I have seen no record of its being withdrawn.

Mr. Robin Cook: As Mr. Oliver Barrett is present in the Palace, would it not be a satisfactory way of disposing of this to summon him to the Bar to confirm what has been said?

Mr. Martin: I am not an expert on the procedure for getting members of the public to the Bar. However, at least Mr. Barrett would be able to set the record straight, as would the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman has not produced the article from The Scotsman. My recollection of that article is that it did not mention Oliver Barrett quoting the hon. Member whom he has suggested. If the hon. Gentleman can produce the article, it might help us.

Mr. Martin: I can only go on my recollection, but I certainly remember Mr. Oliver Barrett's name being mentioned. If I am wrong, I will withdraw the name of Mr. Oliver Barrett.

It is on record that members of the public who opposed the order were not treated in a way in which members of the public opposing an order should be treated. I had to interject on a number of occasions because of that. In fact, in his summing-up, Lord James Clyde asked the commissioners to remember that because they were dealing with voluntary organisations they should not treat them as cranks. I think he was giving a hint that that was the way in which they had been treated.

The other two commissioners did their job, and they did their best under the circumstances. However, some criticism should be levelled at the other place. I mean this as constructive criticism. It is my firm belief that, had there been other parliamentary commissioners from the other place, the order would not have had the stormy passage that it received. As I said, we were dealing with parliamentary legislation. If we had had two commissioners from the other place, we would have had people who had foremost in their minds the fact that parliamentary legislation is more important than anything else, and that would have been a primary consideration. Instead of that, we heard more evidence about the road than about the order, which is what we were there to look at.

On a motion, which I think was moved by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden, we said that we would leave aside Lord James Clyde's motion on whether Lothian should go back and prepare an order which included only the railway. In other words, we decided to leave it until we had some more evidence. That motion was carried, but we went on to hear all the evidence. Therefore, we did not even carry out the terms of the motion that we passed.

I have had differences of opinion with Lothian regional council about the road, and I made my views known to it in as fair a way as I could at the time. However, I want to put on record the fact that Lothian regional council was responsible for looking after the parliamentary commissioners and that it did so in an excellent way. It looked after our needs for refreshments and coffee, which is important when one is conducting an inquiry over a period of three and a half months.

We had telephone facilities so that we could contact our secretaries, and we had typing facilities. The council looked after us in every way and answered our every request. Therefore, in spite of the fact that I was away from the House for three and a half months I made many friends in Edinburgh and on the Lothian regional council. I did not make friends just with Members of the Labour party, as the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) suggests. The hon. Gentleman knows that we had an excellent relationship with officials and elected Members from the Conservative party.

Although I have been in Edinburgh many times, I was impressed when I travelled up to the Mound, which is where the Lothian regional council buildings are, and where people live in the centre of Edinburgh. Old tenemental buildings which have been refurbished are to be seen cheek by jowl with some of the historic buildings of Edinburgh. Human beings live in Edinburgh after the office workers have left and the business is finished for the day.

That is what I remember about Glasgow as a boy before the motorways took over. Not only Glasgow but many other places are spending millions to get the population back into the city centre. I say to the people of Edinburgh and to hon. Members who represent Edinburgh that they should watch roadway proposals very carefully. Edinburgh has something worth cherishing, and it should be guarded, because if it is not the people of Edinburgh could lose one of their finest assets.

8.26 pm

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on this Bill because I served as one of the Members of this House on the Joint Committee.

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) has very lucidly set out the need for the Bill. As he said, it has been promoted by the Lothian regional council, and the main objectives of the order are set out in a statement issued by the promoters. The order was

> "(1) to authorise the council to construct a new road in the western sector of the city of Edinburgh which will bypass, and thereby relieve, residential and shopping areas suffering from traffic congestion;
> (2) to divert a portion of the Edinburgh/Glasgow railway line in order to make room for the new road without demolishing a large number of local authority dwellings; and
> (3) to acquire land for the above-mentioned purposes."

It was pointed out in the statement that the road would be approximately four miles in length. It would not be a motorway and would not form a part of the motorway network for the city, it would be a dual carriageway with low design criteria and its junctions would be roundabouts or controlled traffic lights. The statement also pointed out that the areas to be bypassed by the road were Corstorphine, Murrayfield, Roseburn, Sighthill, Stenhouse, Gorgie and Dalry and that those areas currently suffer from traffic congestion on the two main roads connecting central Edinburgh with central and western

[Mr. Albert McQuarrie]

Scotland. It also pointed out that over 80,000 people live in those areas and an even greater number rely on them for shopping or local services.

The statement said that the road would divert over 30,000 vehicles each day from existing congested roads and would give further opportunity to reduce the traffic problems by management and traffic restraint measures which would be impossible without a new road.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West said that the road would not generate new traffic because of the existing traffic restraint policy in the city. I think that he made that clear during his discussions. As the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) said, the inquiry in Edinburgh lasted for 52 sitting days. The nature of the inquiry was certainly much broader than had been anticipated, as we heard from the comments made by the hon. Member for Springburn on Second Reading on 4 December. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that the commissioners had heard full and lengthy arguments for and against the road and found, by a majority, that the preamble to the order was proved. Therefore it came to the House.

On 4 December 1985 the Bill received its Second Reading. A number of hon. Members spoke during that debate. Much play was made of the fact that, if Conservative Members who were promoting the Lothian Region (Edinburgh Western Relief Road) Order Confirmation Bill would be prepared to refer it to a Joint Committee of both Houses, it would be looked upon with favour. It is worth drawing attention to what was said by those hon. Members who took part in the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) moved a motion, that Mr. Speaker felt inclined to accept, that the Bill should be committed to a Joint Committee of both Houses. That provided my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central with the opportunity to put his case for referral to a Joint Committee. That is to be found in column 354 of the Official Report of 4 December 1985.

In column 364 of the Official Report, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central said:

"I note what my hon. Friend said about the motion that I have on the Order Paper that the Bill should be committed to a Joint Committee of both Houses. I do not propose to enlarge upon that. If that were the decision of the House, it would allow further discussion on some of these matters."

The hon. Member for Springburn who, as he has just told us, was the chairman of the commission, agreed that a Joint Committee of both Houses should consider the matter. In column 367 of the Official Report he said:

"I am glad the hon. Gentleman accepts that a Joint Committee of both Houses should consider this matter."

Mr. Martin: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the reason that I asked for the matter to be looked at by a Joint Committee was in the context that hon. Members should not be taken away from the House for a long period? Does he agree that the Joint Committee agreed that this procedure should be reviewed in the light of what has happened?

Mr. McQuarrie: According to the Official Report, the hon. Gentleman did not make it clear that hon. Members should not be taken away from the House. To be fair to him, further down column 367 he said:

"I could not come to the House for three and a half months".

That is the point that the hon. Gentleman was trying to make. However, he admitted that he was glad that a Joint Committee of both Houses would consider the matter.

On the Opposition Front Bench on that occasion was the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton). In column 371 of the Official Report he said:

"However, if the Bill is passed, I warmly welcome the disclosure that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West is prepared to accept the procedure of a Joint Committee of both Houses because at least that will allow the matter to be considered in more detail before the proposal is passed. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friends to weigh their decision carefully before they cast their votes."—[Official Report, 4 December 1985, Vol. 88, c. 364-71.]

There were also petitions to the House, including the humble petition of Edinburgh district council. It set out why the Bill should not receive a Second Reading. I shall not weary the House with the petition. A great deal was said about it during the debate on 4 December 1985. However, I wish to refer to page 7 of the petition, which says:

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your Hon. House may see fit to refer the confirming Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament and that the Order may not be allowed to pass into law and that they may be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents and witnesses in support of the allegations of this Petition against the Preamble to the Order".

My point is that Edinburgh district council also supported the setting up of a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament.

There was another set of objectors. There were 38 of them, including the Cockburn association. It prayed along similar lines to the prayer of the Edinburgh district council. Page 5 of the petition says:

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your Hon. House may see fit to refer the confirming Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament"—

[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) was a member of the Lothian regional council. It is a pity that he was not a baillie. If he had been a baillie, he might have hanged himself with a chain—or perhaps it is fortunate that he did not, or we should have missed his windbagging from a sedentary position. However, he will not turn me from the point that I want to make.

In its wisdom, the House decided on 4 December to refer the Bill to a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament. In due course, a Joint Committee was set up. It included three hon. Members from this House and three Members from the other place. It sat for just over six weeks and listened to the presentation of cases from eminent counsel, professors, specialists, consultants and ordinary witnesses who put their views for and against the road. It heard representatives of Edinburgh district council. I resent the imputation of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley that no consideration was given to the matter.

The hon. Member for Springburn referred to The Scotsman. On 20 January 1986, under the heading "Row over choice of relief road 'jury'", it said:

"The all-party parliamentary committee which is to provide the next hurdle for the Edinburgh Western Relief Road Confirmation Bill has been selected on a blatantly political basis, road objectors of all parties said yesterday."

It then referred to those who would possibly sit on Joint Committee.

Lord Ferrier was quoted as saying that he intended to appear before the Joint Committee and speak against the Bill in the House of Lords. He said of the appointments, although they had not been made at that time, that they were nonsense and that he was going to complain to the Clerk of the Private Bill Office and ask what was going on. He said:

"I think we are being taken for a ride."

I challenged Lord Ferrier during the Joint Committee proceedings. He said that he did not remember saying that to The Scotsman. He could not remember what he had said. I am not surprised, because he told us about his road building experiences in India.

That shows, however, that there was some bias in the press against the Joint Committee. The implication was that it would not do its job properly. I resent that implication. Had those who made these assertions been present during the Joint Committee deliberations, they would have found that we listened attentively to the cross-questioning of the witnesses.

We wanted to ascertain whether or not this western link road was essential.

One of the comments made by the noble Lord was to the effect that hon. Members of the Commons who were sitting on the Joint Committee should not have voted for the referral which Mr. Speaker in his wisdom joined to the Second Reading. I put it to the noble Lord and to the Committee that a Member of this House is considered to be an hon. Member and if an hon. Member is appointed to any Committee he must go in with a totally unbiased view.

The hon. Member for Springburn has left the Chamber, probably to go down to the Harcourt Room, a place to which he accused several of my hon. Friends of going. I am sorry he is not here to listen to what I have to say. He made an absolutely scurrilous attack upon my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst). That was an attack by imputation, because my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden was the only Member of this House who was present at that inquiry.

If the hon. Member for Springburn was suggesting that an hon. Member made up his mind before the objectors were heard, the only Member he could have been referring to was my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden. Knowing my hon. Friend as I do, I know he would not stoop to the sort of thing suggested by the hon. Member for Springburn. I resent the fact that the hon. Member for Springburn should act in such a way towards another hon. Member.

In the Joint Committee we studied the situation and listened attentively to the people who appeared before us. The inquiry in Edinburgh took three months and the people who were heard in Edinburgh were also heard—or their representatives, because all 38 people from the Cockburn association did not come here — by the Select Committee. All the professionals and consultants were heard and the paper filled a corner of the House of Commons Committee Room. We received miles of paper in the course of our deliberations. It was virtually a re-run of what took place in Edinburgh. Then there was a semi re-run of it down here.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) is the only one who did not mention referring the Bill to the Joint Committee, because his speech was interrupted by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West moving the closure. We do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East supported the referral or whether he would have gone against it. That may be in his favour or against him. I am worried about the massive expense of the inquiry to the ratepayers of Lothian and Edinburgh and the taxpayers in general.

The Bill then came down to the House for a Second Reading to which all Members agreed and sent it to the Joint Committee. The Joint Committee considered it over a period of six weeks at considerable expense; and now the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East objects to it. I am not suggesting that the hon. Member did anything irregular, but the will of this House was to refer it to the Joint Committee and Opposition Members said they were glad they would be given an opportunity to be seriously heard. They are doubting the integrity of the members of that Joint Committee of both Houses. That is a sad reflection of the Opposition. It is certainly no reflection on the members of the Joint Committee, who worked extremely hard. They were drawn from all parties and were not just Conservatives.

Mr. Maxton: Was it a unanimous report?

Mr. McQuarrie: It is not for me to tell the House whether it was or not. The deliberations of the Committee were in private. When the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn told the House something of the deliberations of the Committee, I did not bother to intervene and let him know the position because he should have known himself that deliberations are in private. Although leaks happen from time to time, they may be informed or ill informed. It is not for me to say whether there was a majority of one, two, three or four, or whether it was a unanimous decision.

Mr. Foulkes: We all know.

Mr. McQuarrie: The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, in his usual magician's way, thinks he knows the answer, but he knows very little about it.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): The hon. Gentleman talked about expense. Could he enlighten the House about who paid for the junket in Locket's restaurant to which hon. Members were invited by Tory councillor Brian Meeke to try to persuade them to vote for this road?

Mr. McQuarrie: I would not have said it was a junket. It was an informal presentation. I am sure hon. Members on both sides of the House go to informal presentations. It was not a junket.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. We are debating the Third Reading of the Bill, and hon. Members ought to get back to it.

Mr. McQuarrie: I trust I was not straying from the debate. I was merely trying to answer the question by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan). However, I shall return to the debate. The Joint Committee ultimately reached a decision and found the preamble proved.

Mr. Maxton: It was not unanimous.

Mr. McQuarrie: It is all very well for the hon. Member for Cathcart to say from his sedentary position that it was not unanimous. That is for the hon. Member to speculate. There was nothing printed in the report to say whether or not it was unanimous. Someone might have said that there was a majority, but it is up to the Committee to decide. I will not be forced to digress from my speech, because that is what the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley was trying to do to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West.

[Mr. McQuarrie]

Having found the preamble proved, the Committee then had representations by opponents to the scheme. These were duly considered by the Committee and a decision made about them. Now the Bill has returned to the House.

Before I leave the matter of the deliberations of the Joint Committee, I should like to refer to what my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West said about expenses. As we know, in their wisdom the commissioners inserted into the Bill a provision that the Cockburn association objectors should be paid two thirds of their expenses. There seemed to be some difficulty about paying those expenses. First of all, Lothian regional council decided that, as the matter had been referred to the Joint Committee, it was still sub judice and the council could not pay the expenses at that time. There was a plea to the effect that, while two thirds of the expenses of the Edinburgh inquiry would be paid, there was to be no money to pay the Cockburn association expenses for the parliamentary inquiry through the Joint Committee. On that point I sympathise with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) said, the Joint Committee deliberated upon that and found there was no legal way that the Committee could reach a decision on the expenses to be awarded to the appellants. It is fair to say that there was merit in the case made by the objectors for some payment of the expenses they had incurred. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West, I hope that Lothian regional council will look at this matter sympathetically and see what can be done.

I disagree with what the hon. Member for Springburn, said about an ordinary person not having an opportunity to present himself at the public inquiry. That point was raised by hon. Members during the deliberations of the Joint Committee and it was clear that any ordinary person could have appeared at the public inquiry and made his case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West referred to the fact that the Transport and General Workers Union had sent a letter asking for support for the passage of the western relief road Bill. My hon. Friend referred to the 1,500 jobs that would be created. The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley said in an intervention that many roads could be built anywhere in Scotland without objection. From his experience in local government and his parliamentary experience, the hon. Gentleman knows that very few major roads are built in Scotland without objection and without a public inquiry.

Mr. Foulkes rose——

Mr. McQuarrie: I am not giving way. The hon. Gentleman was trying to bring in a red herring.

The proposal has been examined by the Transport and General Workers Union, which sees the economic benefits and the benefit of a reduction in the number of accidents. It is invidious and ridiculous that Opposition Members, who talk continually about unemployment and the need to support the trade unions, should not accept what the Transport and General Workers Union puts forward. I may not be correct, but I think the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East is a sponsored Member of that union.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I want to set the record straight and to make it clear that the brother who wrote that letter did it on his individual initiative. Having spoken to the regional secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union in Scotland today, I can confirm that that is not the policy of that union. Hon. Members are free to quote the letter and to quote the points made in it, but it is not the policy of the Transport and General Workers Union.

Mr. McQuarrie: The hon. Member is suggesting that the letter from the Transport and General Workers Union, Transport house, 290 Bath Street, Glasgow, signed by George Wilmshurst, construction trades co-ordinator, is a lie.

Mr. Strang: No, I did not say that.

Mr. McQuarrie: He says that it is not the policy of the union, but the letter seeks support for the passing of the private Bill.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Is my hon. Friend aware that Mr. Wilmshurst does not qualify his letter in any way, and starts off by saying:

"The Transport and General Workers' Union favours the building of the Edinburgh Western Relief Road"?

Does my hon. Friend find it bizarre that the union appears to have a spokesman who does not speak for it, according to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang)?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that comment. That is exactly how I see it. Trade unions do not write to Conservative Members seeking support for the passing of a Bill unless they are anxious to see that Bill passed. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East wants to get his act together.

The Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians also wrote on 4 March:

"I herewith confirm that our Union agree that this road should be given priority owing to the lack of work in the Construction Industry at present. As you know my colleague from the T&GWU listed various figures showing the unemployment situation in our industry."

In a further letter on 12 March, the same gentleman, Mr. A. Fraser, the acting regional secretary, said;

"I, herewith, confirm that our Union agree that this road should be given priority owing to the lack of work in the Construction Industry at present. As you know my colleague from the T&GWU listed various figures showing the unemployment situation in our industry. I trust we can count on your support in Parliament next Tuesday, 18th March, 1986."

The Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors also sought support for the passing of the Bill. It points out the problems faced by the construction industry. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is not a trade union."] It is a contractors trade union of which I was proud to be a member. It points out that 1,500 jobs would be created, but Opposition Members do not want those jobs in Edinburgh.

Mr. Maxton: It is disgraceful that the hon. Member, who has consistently supported the Government who have cut capital expenditure on schools, hospitals, road programmes, housing and everything else in Scotland, and who have created the unemployment in the construction industry, should now quote a trade union in his support.

Mr. McQuarrie: I shall not go down the road of the hon. Member for Cathcart. Obviously, he is ill-informed regarding cuts in hospitals, schools and so on. He wants to get his facts right. He should look back to the 1977 era of the Labour Government.

A document issued by the standing joint committee of the Royal Automobile Club, the Automobile Association and the Royal Scottish Automobile Club says that it "fully supports the concept of the proposed relief road. There is no doubt whatsoever that the road is urgently needed to enhance the amenity and environment of the area, to reduce injuries from road accidents and to improve traffic movement and access.

The Committee is aware of your agreement with these views, from your support for the measure at Second Reading, and hopes that you will make every endeavour to again vote in support of the Bill at the Third Reading."

Enough money has been wasted on the Bill in Edinburgh, in the House, on referral to the joint committee and again in the House tonight. I commend the Bill to the House. I hope hon. Members will do the honourable thing and vote for the Third Reading.

8.57 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): I have a constituency interest in the matter, in that the proposed line of the road starts at the border between my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton). There is also within my constituency the entire length of the proposed M8 extension, which is intimately bound up with the future of the western relief road, and to which I shall return later.

I have a couple of other reasons for intervening in the debate. I think that I am the sole Member of the House who happens to be a resident of Corstorphine in the constituency of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, although I am unable to show him that I happen to be part of his slim majority.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) is as well.

Mr. Cook: Indeed. The hon. Gentleman is correct. My hon. Friend joins me in that distinction. We are two of those whom the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, assures the House will be reduced to a life of frustration and degradation if the Bill does not receive its Third Reading. I assure the House that I shall attempt to face that future with as much philosophy as I can muster, and I shall seek to explain why I strongly believe that this is not a measure which should receive its Third Reading.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Will the hon. Member accept that I was making that comment in the context of the £100 million development getting the go-ahead in the absence of the western relief road?

Mr. Cook: The solution to that problem is perfectly simple. It is that the £100 million development should not go ahead and, as the Member for Livingston, I have a perfectly clear case for saying that Lothian region, which is the promoter of the Bill, should stand by its own strategic plan, shut out that proposal and affirm Livingston as a major shopping centre for the western part of the Lothian. This would be entirely consistent with the policy of the promoters of the Bill.

My main reason for seeking to intervene is that for a decade I was the Member for Edinburgh, Central, where the western relief road terminates, and I have a considerable affection still for the centre of Edinburgh. I believe that the central community of Edinburgh represents one of the successful examples of a living community within a city centre. I can say that with some objectivity, since I was not born in Edinburgh, but in Bells hill, but I must admit that the centre of Edinburgh is considerably more elegant than the centre of Bells hill.

The reason why the centre of Edinburgh is so successful is that it retains a large body of people who are prepared, and want, to live there. I have to confess that I consider the centre slightly less civilised now that it returns a Conservative rather than a Labour Member of Parliament. I am surprised to note that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher), who replaced me as the representative of that constituency, has chosen to attend only the first half hour of this debate and has not been present for the last one and a half hours.

I would put it to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central, that he holds one of the few seats held by the Conservative party bang in the middle of a major city. The reason why this is possible is that Edinburgh is one of the few cities in which the middle class have still not moved out of the town centre, but seek to stay there because it is an attractive environment and a pleasant place in which to live. The overwhelming reason for Edinburgh being a pleasant place to live in is that it has not made the mistake of other cities by ringing its inner city and strangling it with urban motorways.

I must admit that this was an accident. The progressives who ruled Edinburgh in the 1960s had grandiose plans to build an urban motorway wherever they could find the space, and in many cases where they could not find the space. But the progressives, bless them, could never brace themselves to spend the money to build the motorway. Therefore, at a time when motorways were fashionable, none was built in Edinburgh. Since then, they have learnt from the mistakes of other cities—a fate that would have been theirs had those roads been built. We can see that fate in other cities. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) talked eloquently about the problems that arose around the motorways in Glasgow, and similar problems have occurred elsewhere in Scotland and, to an even greater extent, in England.

There is the example of the havoc created by these urban motorways in Carlisle, where the urban motorway that goes into the city centre is called the Georgian way. When, on my first visit to the Georgian way, I asked how it came by this curious title, because I could see no Georgian houses on either side, I was assured by the chairman of the planning committee that it had been named the Georgian way after the Georgian houses that had been pulled down to make way for the dual carriageway.

That is a mistake that Edinburgh has avoided, and the residents of the Edinburgh city centre have now come to realise that if they wish to preserve their community and their environment this can be done only by resisting every fresh attempt to drive a new road into the centre of the city. In my time as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central I had to resist a number of such proposals, including, most obviously, a clear parallel with the proposal before the House tonight, the British relief road. I would say to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, who paraded a number of arguments in favour of the western relief road—that it would relieve traffic on the city streets, that if it was not built those streets would become congested, that it would provide additional environmental measures without which the residents would be reduced to a life of frustration and degradation—that those same arguments were paraded a decade ago in support of the British relief road. But we stopped it because we were not convinced, and life on the south side of Edinburgh continues very much as it did 15 years ago before that proposal was mooted.

[Mr. Cook]

The reason why all those roads have been resisted is that any new road is likely to bring more traffic. More and bigger roads mean more and faster traffic. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West attempted to make the case that the western relief road, uniquely in the history of dual carriageways, would not attract a single additional form of transport into the city centre. I do not believe that. One of my reasons is that, from experience as the Member for Livingston I am aware of the proposals for the M8 extension, which is designed to join the outer-city bypass at precisely the point at which the western relief road leaves it. That, in turn, is a variation on the original proposals which we debated 10 or 15 years ago, when we insisted that the M8 extension should meet the outer city bypass at a different point. Motorists did not then have the incentive to travel on into the centre of Edinburgh.

It is proposed that we should have a motorway system which enables one to drive from Greenock through Glasgow, on to the M8 to Newbridge, on to the M8 extension and the outer city bypass and then along the proposed western relief road until all that motorway traffic suddenly comes to a dead halt at a set of traffic lights stuck at the bottom of Lothian road. It makes no sense to connect the centre of Edinburgh with Glasgow along a dual carriageway system that suddenly terminates there.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West suggested that there might also be a car park for 1,500 cars. Lothian region has also proposed that, but it has never finalised its planning proposals. Lothian region asked the House for permission to spend £37 million on the western relief road, but it has never braced itself to spend the money on building a car park for 1,500 cars at the eastern end of the western relief road. So motorists will find not a car park, but just a set of traffic lights.

If traffic is encouraged to use the motorway system, the M8 extension, and then the western relief road, the volume of traffic focused on that point in the centre of Edinburgh will eventually oblige the planners to devise new ways of getting the traffic through the city centre and out the other side. If half a through road is built, the pressure of traffic will eventually oblige planners to think of building the other half of it.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has approved the plans for that car park building, the region has given me to understand that it has every intention of going ahead with it?

Mr. Cook: I am informed that the region has hitherto been unable and unwilling to finance such a project, and is still looking for a promoter. The region's original position was that the district council should build the car park. That adds insult to injury.

What is proposed is a perverse conjunction. On the one hand, the region wishes to construct an outer-city bypass, but, on the other, that same highway authority proposes a through road to channel the traffic into the city centre. Logically speaking, both cannot be done at the same time. If the future of handling traffic coming from the west of the city lies in an outer-city bypass, that bypass should be given a chance to prove itself without having the experiment weakened by the construction of a road that will funnel traffic into the city centre.

The alternative requested by those in central Edinburgh is clear. It is an alternative that has been endorsed by the residents of Gorgie-Dalry, to whom the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West referred with such touching concern. But as recently as last night the Gorgie-Dalry community council affirmed its opposition to the western relief road, because it does not believe the figures given by the hon. Gentleman for the relief that the western relief road will provide for Gorgie-Dalry. It believes— history proves it right—that if that new road is built there will be more traffic in the city centre, which will mean that the residents will see their environment deteriorate.

The alternative is to find methods of traffic management which, far from inducing more traffic to the city, will discourage and decrease it. That brings me to the curious position taken by the Bill's promoters. They say that if the road is built they can then undertake traffic management schemes to improve the environment in places such as Gorgie-Dalry. However, when the matter was considered in Committee, and whenever an amendment was tabled to insert traffic management schemes into the proposed Bill, it was resisted by the Bill's promoters. They believe that the road should be built first and traffic management schemes can then be tried. That is the wrong way round. We should first try traffic management schemes, which will cost only a fraction of the cost of the road, and if they fail the promoters can come back and make a case for an additional road to cope with additional traffic. Let us have traffic management proposals first, not last.

Mr. Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman has not read any of the documents, far less the evidence. The traffic management schemes proposed by the promoters cannot take place unless the western relief road is built. On the contrary, the objectors, for whom the hon. Gentleman speaks, proposed not traffic management schemes but schemes which would enable even greater flows of traffic to pass through Gorgie-Dalry and Stenhouse and reach the centre of Edinburgh even more quickly, knocking down large amounts of property and destroying large numbers of jobs in the process. The hon. Gentleman should read the evidence.

Mr. Cook: My objection to the road does not oblige me to support every objection made to the Bill. My objection is that the measure will bring more traffic to the centre of Edinburgh. From my long acquaintance with central Edinburgh, I would be astonished if the Cockburn association committed itself to a proposition which would enable more traffic to reach the city centre. An obvious traffic management proposal which would obviate the need to build the road is to reduce the capacity of the city centre to absorb cars by reducing parking opportunities and by introducing great opportunities for public transport.

That brings me to the second option available to us. I am sponsored not by the Transport and General Workers' Union but by the National Union of Railwaymen. The Bill has one clear consequence. There will have to be a realignment of the main Edinburgh-Glasgow railway line. That realignment will involve considerable additional engineering works. British Rail, which is in a position to know, has calculated that for 18 months that additional work on engineering requirments will mean a five-minute delay on the Edinburgh-Glasgow service. I remind the House that the end result will be a two-minute advantage for motorists when the road is completed. If we are serious about discouraging people from travelling by car and about generating the sort of impact on the city centre to which I have referred, it is ludicrous to propose a measure which will make rail less attractive compared with the competing mode of transport by car.

Mr. McQuarrie: The hon. Gentleman should get his facts right. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) said, at no time has it been accepted that there will be an 18-month delay. Evidence to the Joint Committee varied from 12 to 18 months, and it was admitted that it would be the responsibility of the contractor, once the contract was let, to decide how he would carry out the work involved, for example in Balgreen road. There may be no delay.

Mr. Cook: I am perfectly happy to split the differance with the hon. Gentleman and compromise on 15 months. My confidence that it will be the lower rather than the higher figure is not enhanced by his submission that the contractor will decide how the work will be done. It is perfectly clear from the eviidence provided by the district council to every hon. Member that there will be considerable additional engineering requirements for building the railway line and that this cannot be achieved without disruption the rail services for perhaps more than a year.

On Monday, there will be an historic achievement in Midlothian, because on that day the Bathgate line is to be opened up to passenger traffic once again. I give credit where it is due. The former Secretary of State was extremely sympathetic to this proposal when I and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) went to him with it, and throughout the past two years he has been supportive of the case for re-opening the Bathgate line to passenger traffic.

If the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) cares to delve back in history, he will find that it was not a particularly sensible proposal, nor very clever planning, to close the Bathgate line in the same year that a new town was designated—Livingston—slap bang on the line that was being closed to passenger traffic. We are undoing that damage of 20 years ago, and as from Monday passengers will be able to travel that line and the passenger service will be restored.

I do not disagree with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West when he says that restoring the Bathgate line will have a moderately modest impact on the number of cars travelling into west Edinburgh. There is another way in which, now that passenger traffic is being restored and that line has been upgraded, it can make much more than a modest impact on traffic coming along the A8 into the Corstorphine end of Edinburgh. If we were to take the opportunity provided for us to supply a park-and-ride facility at Newbridge, we could make inroads into the number of car-borne people coming into the centre of Edinburgh by providing for them a public transport facility at far less cost than it would require to construct the road to get them into the city centre in their cars.

This is a highly contentious measure. There was a suggestion earlier that within the Joint Committee the divisions were entirely on party political lines, but the hon. Gentleman declined to confirm whether or not that was so.

Mr. McQuarrie: Nonsense.

Mr. Cook: If the hon. Member will let me finish my sentence, he might find that he is committing himself with undue haste. It is certainly the case that in the Lothian regional council and the Edinburgh district council the divisions have been on party lines. In Lothian region, because of the extremely tight party political balance, frequently this major proposal has been given approval on the basis of the casting vote of the chairman of the committee. The proposal is contentious, with a very narrow basis of political support within the regional council itself, and it is now proposed that this measure be approved on Third Reading tonight.

We understand that Lothian region is standing by ready to let the first contracts immediately. Why the haste? On 4 May that political balance will alter. There can be no doubt about that.

The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) may laugh, but if he seriously expects that the Conservative party will emerge with the same number of regional councillors in Lothian on 8 May, his optimism exceeds the views of any known Conservative Member of Lothian region. That balance will change. There will no longer be a majority on that council for this proposal.

I would regard it as highly improper if Lothian region, while it still has that casting vote majority, committed the ratepayers and residents of Lothian region to this major project in its dying days. If there is the slightest suspicion that Lothian region is prepared to take that improper step, I believe that the House would be wise to make sure that it does not grant it permission to do so.

The House and Lothian region would be well advised to delay any start on this project until we have the opportunity to consider the impact of the outer city bypass on traffic coming into the city centre, and until we have the opportunity to determine whether the figures quoted by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West are correct—an opportunity which will arise only next year. Given the imminence of the opportunity to put to the test the figures that the hon. Gentleman quoted, I believe that there can be no case for the House giving the Bill a Third Reading at this time.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). As one of those who serve on the Joint Committee, of both Houses, I shall address myself to the priority of the mechanism used to consider this matter. Although a Joint Committee has only once been used for a Scottish Bill, it has frequently been proposed as the correct mechanism. The advice of the Chairman of Ways and Means and the Lord Advocate on all those occasions has been that the procedure was inappropriate and should not be adopted unless certain fundamental characteristics were fulfilled.

In 1920, the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Whitley, said:

> "I should have taken objection to the Motion to refer the matter to a Joint Committee of the two Houses. I say that because I think it my duty to straighten the hands of the Commissioners who conduct the inquiries into this matter. I hold very strongly that it is the duty of petitioners to bring their case before the tribunal in Scotland, and that this House ought not to consider any revision of the decision of those Commissioners if the petitioners have failed to put their case before the Commissioners sitting in Scotland, and in no case to allow a review of those decisions unless some wholly new facts have arisen." — [Official Report, 3 December 1920; Vol. 135, c. 1610.]

That was confirmed by the Member of Parliament for Edinburgh, East (Mr. John Wheatley), who said:

[Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn]

"the House would be slow to give effect to any such Motion unless they were satisfied, prima facie, on the case presented that some large and important constitutional issue was raised, or that some material miscarriage of justice had been effected; and that they would not sanction the repetition of the previous procedure and a rehearing of the case unless conditions such as I have indicated were satisfied."—[Official Report, 20 July 1950; Vol. 477, c. 2568.]

In this case, the matter was agreed, as I understand it. Therefore, quite inappropriately, the matter was referred to a commission of both Houses with an apparent open brief to reconduct the inquiry of the parliamentary commissioner. That was wrong and an abuse of the process that should never happen again. I say these things because it is as if the requirements on the Joint Committee, which are essentially the requirements and functions of an appeal court, were in some way dissolved by the agreement between the two sides that it should be referred to them.

It is as if, in an appeal court, the fact that leave to appeal had been granted removed from the appeal court the restriction of its function. We know what the functions of the appeal courts are. The fact that any Committee of both Houses has those limited functions was stated by the Chairman of Ways and Means in 1920, was restated by the Lord Advocate in 1948 and since that time has frequently been stated when attempts have been made to refer Scottish Bills to such a Committee.

I cannot complain that the Committee had to undergo a complete retrial of the position. It is important for the future that rulings should be made by the Chair and by the Clerks that, where it is agreed or not agreed that a matter on a Scottish Bill should be remitted to a Joint Committee of both Houses, the writ of the Committee runs only to investigate new circumstances, constitutional impropriety or other such matters as I have read in the judgments given to the House.

I asked those acting on behalf of the petitioners against the Bill if they had any such grounds, if there was any new position, if there had been constitutional impropriety or if there was any reason whereby they could sustain the fundamental requirements set out in the opinion of the Chairman of Ways and Means in 1920 and the Lord Advocate in 1948, and I was told that there was none.

At the conclusion of the evidence, I again asked whether a single fact had been brought before us which had not been brought before the commissioners in the original 52-day inquiry and I was told that there was none. It seemed that it would be quite improper for those sitting in judgment in the Committee of both Houses to interfere with the judgment of parliamentary commissioners properly constituted, without a reason or fact being shown as to why we should do that. Fundamentally, the whole process is wrong and I trust that it will never be repeated unless such objections are properly raised and argued.

I should now like to examine the merits of the matter assuming that we have the right to consider them afresh—in the same way that Wimbledon should be replayed as McEnroe was irritated because he lost the first time round. The evidence for the promoters presented before the House was clear, substantivly argued and undented by cross-examination or by any evidence by the petitioners against it. It was backed by facts which were not contradicted but were conceded by the petitioners against the issue. There was a fundamental difficulty in that the promoters had set an objective which was to relieve the communities of Gorgie, Dalry, Stenhouse, Roseburn, Corstosphine and Murrayfield and that part of Edinburgh, by preventing the traffic from affecting the residents there. It is all very well for the hon. Member for Livingston, in his grand, compassionate, Socialist way, to say that that is fine for the residents and that if they did not like 24,000 cars rolling past their houses they would not live there and that if they did not like their children being knocked over on pedestrian crossings they would move. That is a fundamentally objectionable argument.

The promoters and their advisers addressed themselves to the problem of removing traffic from the communities in the areas of heavy traffic flow. They discovered that they could do that. I find it fundamentally impressive that the promoters commenced by telling their clients that they were not arguing whether the western relief road was a good idea; rather, they wanted to examine all the options. They wanted to look not just at the no-road option but at all the alternatives before deciding. They came up with the answer that it was an astonishing idea on environmental, cost, humane and noise grounds.

Mr. Maxton: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman really want a mile-and-a-half traffic jam every morning?

Mr. Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman does not know the position. I know it better than he does. I have done more to preserve Edinburgh and to prevent inner road traffic jams than the hon. Gentleman has dreamt of.

I was equally impressed, in the reverse direction, by the letter by the so-called experts who accepted their remit. Even before the experts considered the proposal, they said, "We agree that we shall mount arguments against the western relief road." In other words, they said, "We are willing to accept our fee to argue the case against the road." That was similar to a surgeon saying, "I agree to recommend the amputation of the legs. Perhaps you will send me the patient later. Please include the fee." That sort of partiality was distinguished from the impartiality of the promoters' adivisers.

I am a life member of the Cockburn association and the National Trust and one of the founders of many of the preservation societies in Edinburgh. I am president of the Duddingston Preservation Society, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang). No one should think that I do not accept that Edinburgh should be preserved.

The hon. Member for Livingston confused the insanity of the Abercrombie plan, the Buchanan plan and anything to do with Sir Robert Matthew, Percy Johnson-Marshall, Mr. Riach and Basil Spence, who built Coventry cathedral. Those people proposed a wonderful future for Edinburgh which would be achieved by knocking down buildings and building roads in their honour and by knocking down the beautiful buildings on Princes street and putting pedestrians on one level and cars on the other —all those theoretical architectural madnesses.

I have a confession to make, and I am sorry that the hon. Member for Livingston is not here to hear it. When I was standing for the seat of Edinburgh, Central, I suggested in my election manifesto that Edinburgh's great salvation would be achieved if the inner and outer railways were turned into roads. They have no shops, no pedestrians, no schools and no frontages. They disturb no one. They are like arteries which travel through the body without making the slightest impact.

In the end, there was only one argument against the road—that it would introduce more traffic to central Edinburgh. The hon. Member for Livingston presented, rather feebly, the argument that this was half a through route and that, eventually, one would be bound to build the other half. It is not half a through route—the route takes traffic that would travel anyway to its destination in the centre of Edinburgh. The bypass will take traffic away from communities.

We hear people talking about inner cities. I wish that they would come to Scotland to see them. The glory of Edinburgh and of other Scottish cities is that people live in the centre. In Edinburgh they live in Tollcross, Gorgie-Dalry, Morrison street, the Lothian road, and the new town. The whole centre is inhabited and that is the glory of our inner cities.

This road will take into an artery—as Lenin was put in a sealed coach——

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): John Lennon?

Mr. Fairbairn: I know that the hon. Member has prejudices, but I did not know that he could not spell. The artery road is a corridor. It knocks down one house and does not affect any community on the way. It relieves the great communities of Gorgie-Dalry and Stenhouse of the traffic which presently reduces the quality of their lives.

It is all very well for the hon. Member for Livingston to say, "They wouldn't live there if they didn't have it." They would much rather live there if they did not have the traffic. I am one of the most committed preservationists and one of those most dedicated to the fabric and glories of Edinburgh.

Mr. Strang: I acknowledge that to some extent. The hon. and learned Member has been on the side of the people of Edinburgh who have opposed these grandiose plans for roads which would destroy the city. How can he explain the fact that the Cockburn association, which he supports, is one of the organisations which, with the National Trust for Scotland, has opposed this road. Yet both of these organisations are on the other side of the argument.

Mr. Fairbairn: The associations did not consult their life members, of whom I am one, and I am not very impressed by the fact that, allegedly, the Cockburn association is against it. We have evidence from the Cockburn association and from Mr. Pinkerton, QC, whose evidence is not only unreliable but is simply untruthful, self-interested and swingeing. We have evidence from a doctor who said that he did not want his way of life to be altered. He said that he had a private parking space in Murray place and that he went to the Royal Infirmary and to the Western General and that he did not want a lot of traffic getting in his way. Therefore, I found the "impartial" evidence of the Cockburn association very different from the concepts for which I joined it as one of its first life members.

I found the evidence of the Labour councillor for Gorgie-Dalry, and the lady who lived in Tollcross, Mrs. Pamela Scott, very impressive. Their evidence was sincere and genuine. What I found odd about the evidence they gave was that they were willing to commit their residents to the horror of the new spur which they wanted to see at Morrison street. It would create infinitely worse environmental conditions.

Apart from anything else, about a third of a million trees would be added to Edinburgh—a great new line. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) said that houses would need double glazing. Obviously he has not seen them. They already have double boarding. Not one is occupied.

Therefore, I regard all these complaints as false. If we must have an arterial road, I have never seen a scheme more civilised, more sensible and more safe, which will cause greater good and less inconvenience to anyone, than this arterial road. It will do nothing but improve the excellence of Edinburgh. For those who believe in public transport, it will improve and cheapen bus travel in Edinburgh. But it will not have a great effect on rail travel, about which the hon. Member for Livingston spoke, because about 5,000 acres of parking space would be needed if there was to be any effect on what I understand is called drive and ride when one leaves one's car at the station, and kiss and ride when one leaves one's wife and she takes the car. That was the evidence before the Committee.

Mr. Wallace: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's clear presentation of his case, but it has been represented in one of the documents that we have had that one of the technical witnesses on behalf of one of the amenity groups conceded that the new road would not generate any traffic. Can he confirm that that concession was made?

Mr. Fairbairn: It was conceded not only by the witnesses but by counsel for the Cockburn association, for 38 amenity societies, for the National Trust and for the petitioners against the Edinburgh district council that there was no evidence that it would generate a single new car. That is an obvious fact. If one takes one's car to Edinburgh and cannot park it, one cannot use it.

One of the pieces of evidence that I found most hypocritical was that the Edinburgh district council will have to ask for planning permission for a hypermarket at the western end of the road with 5,000 car parking spaces. In other words, 5,000 cars will travel through Corstorphine, Gorgie-Dalry and Stenhouse in order to shop. That seems to me to be the ultimate hypocrisy.

This is one of the most civilised arterial roads that has ever been planned in a major city, the fabric of which must never be threatened.

9.48 pm

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): In the House and elsewhere we hear trendy words such as infrastructure. I am sure that planners, architects and even some Tory Members might use that term, but for the average man and woman in the street it is like hiatus hernia or even perhaps a terminal illness. The so-called western relief road it means many things to many people. All sorts of experts can go before committees, as we have heard tonight, but in my part of the world, in Leith and Muirhouse, we see monuments to such people in the form of concrete tunnels and high-rise flats which are disasters. Yet those individuals who are called experts are applauded when they are mentioned in the Chamber. That is a sad fact, but it happens.

From time to time councils do get it right. Sometimes they get it left, as they did back in the early 1970s when the Buchanan report was rejected. That was a plan which would have brought more and more traffic into the centre of Edinburgh. The councillors, most of whom were

[Mr. Ron Brown]

Tories, realised that more traffic meant less amenity, less city and more urban problems, especially parking problems. We must appreciate that today the situation is even worse.

The Transport and General Workers Union and the Union of Communication, Allied Trades and Technicians have suggested that jobs are involved. I do not doubt that. It is interesting that the two letters that have been circulated come from two bureaucrats in Glasgow who by no means understand the Edinburgh position. I say "two bureaucrats" because yesterday I attended a meeting of rank and file members of UCATT and they disowned a letter issued by Mr. Fraser of that union. I trust the rank and file more than I trust the officials, and I speak from experience. To take the argument to its logical and obvious conclusion, we can get jobs and create work by building Trident or gas chambers. That is not my argument. The rank and file must be heard in this place. They are arguing that the outer-city bypass be completed. Once that is done, we can judge whether the so-called relief road is necessary.

It is a question of first things first — a matter of priorities and using money wisely. This Government talk about doing this properly. We heard the Chancellor earlier today pontificating about this, that and the other. If the Government want to argue like that in Edinburgh, they must do so with people who have to endure many hardships.

Not everyone in the Tory party agrees with this proposal. Certain hon. Members, one in particular, have been vociferous in speaking against the proposal. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) should know, because he represents the city centre. The Government do offer a choice. They say to the working class, "Take it or leave it." That is what they are saying to the working class in Edinburgh.

We know that some people will go into the city to use this road, assuming that it goes ahead. They will shoot in there in their grand Jaguar cars, coming in from Edinburgh airport. They like that, being picked up by the chauffeur and being driven away. But that situation will change soon because of the regional elections. They will be a disaster area for the Tories in Scotland. The majority of Scots will vote against the Tories and their allies, the alliance.

The Government hope to slip this measure through so that they can stick a parliamentary order on the Labour group, but the people of Scotland recognise these tricks. There are no arguments from the Government about whether the road is necessary. It is not necessary unless it is suggested——

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put; but MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER withheld his assent and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. Brown: We know that the civil engineers have been vociferous, because it is good for business and good for them. However, what is good for the Tories is not necessarily good for Scotland, and what is good for Edinburgh may not necessarily be good for Leith. If traffic comes into the centre of Edinburgh it has to go somewhere. It is rather like a leaking pipe. The water has to trickle out somewhere. All this traffic will trickle through into Leith, creating problems for the people there. That will create more and more problems for the population of Leith. Ferry road in Leith is bedevilled by all kinds of traffic problems. Those problems will be increased. In no way will Leith accept the problems created by Edinburgh.

Leith is very important. The people of Leith have suffered because, willy-nilly, when we speak about Edinburgh we forget about the port. That is the most important place in Scotland. I do not suggest, however, that if funds are available they should not be used for investment in public transport or in traffic control measures that will improve the flow of vehicles around and through the city. Obvious problems should be tackled without throwing money at them. The Tories say that money should not be thrown at a problem, but that is precisely what they have done on this occasion for party political reasons.

The Tories will say that the case against this road has been worked up by the extremists — for example, the Cockburn association and the National Trust for Scotland. They have been denounced this evening by Conservative Members. They are bourgeois organisations and not very trendy, but they are aware of the consequences that will flow from the construction of this road.

To whom does one turn for advice? Does one go to the city council? Does one go to the Lord Provost? John McKay is a moderate, reasonable individual who would explain the views of the citizens of Edinburgh. I am sure that he has written to most hon. Members and explained exactly what should be done. I shall take this opportunity to refer to some of the points that he made. They need to be repeated for the record. He said:

"1. The proposal to construct a Western Relief Road is premature. It should be shelved until the effects of the Outer City Bypass, which is scheduled for completion in 1990, are known. The new Bypass could well alleviate problems of congestion in the Western sector of the City and remove the need for a Western Relief Road.

2. A Western Relief Road would be contrary to the objectives of the Lothian Region's Structure Plan in relation to the reduction of traffic in central Edinburgh. The new road would probably increase the amount of traffic coming into the City.

3. The scale of environmental relief forecast by Lothian Region has been over-estimated. The little, if any, environmental benefit which will arise will not justify the early construction of the Road and residential locations to adjacent to the Road will suffer badly.

4. Any increased traffic volumes produced by the new Road will have an adverse effect on communities in central Edinburgh, including Lothian Road, Scotland" cross and the historic New Town.

5. Lothian Region have not given full consideration to what are called 'No Road' options. Little, if any, thought has been given to alternatives such as traffic management measures, junction improvements, marginal road alignments and the introduction of long-stay parking restraint measures.

6. The new road would involve the loss of valuable recreation and amenity ground and undoubtedly create environmental problems through noise and pollution. Whilst Lothian Region have carried out certain economic and environmental proposals it has been demonstrated that the benefits have been overstated and certainly do not justify expenditure of some £37 million at current prices.

It is felt that expenditure of this magnitude could be directed to more pressing and deserving causes, such as education, social work and health services.

7. Environmental and local pressure groups are firmly opposed to the proposals and such bodies include the Cockburn Association (The Edinburgh Civic Trust) and the National Trust for Scotland."

In his own simple way the Lord Provost of Edinburgh has told the Government, "Get on your bike." Anyone riding a bike in Edinburgh would understand the traffic problems there. Certainly there are ways and means of forcing through an unpopular measure, but that will go down badly at the next regional election and the Government must be prepared to accept that they will have little representation on the regional council in Edinburgh.

Some hon. Members seem to think that this issue does not matter, but it does matter, and it will certainly matter in the future. I know that not all Conservative Members agree with this proposal. They should think about the consequences of this road and the proposals, and about the seriousness of it for their own party interests, because the people back home will think about it and will vote accordingly.

Housing (Scotland)

10.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I beg to move,

That the draft Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Variation (No. 2) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 6th March, be approved.

I shall explain briefly the reasons for the Government bringing forward the order. It will be welcomed by all sides of the House. Hon. Members will recall that the first variation order for 1985-86 was debated on 12 February at the same time as the main housing support grant order for 1986-87. Members with longer memories may recall that a similar variation order for 1984-85 was debated in late January 1985, at the same time as the 1985-86 main order. Early 1985 saw exceptional rises in interest rates and authorities' actual outturn interest rate figures, which have only recently become available, now show that average levels for 1984-85 exceeded even those taken into account in the 1984-85 variation order.

For this reason, and because a substantial sum would otherwise be lost in payment to local authorities, the Government have decided to take the exceptional step of bringing forward tonight a second variation order, which has the effect of paying an additional £4·6 million in total to 30 of Scotland's housing authorities. If the House approves the order, the extra payments will be included with next week's final support grant payments for the current financial year.

In addition to the payments approved on 12 February, this will assist authorities in keeping 1986-87 rent increases within reasonable bounds, and in maintaining levels of expenditure on the management and maintenance of their housing stock.

I will not burden the House with further details. Full explanation and details of the calculations that are most concerned are listed in the report which accompanies the draft variation order.

The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has welcomed our introduction of the order. The action that we are taking to expedite payment of £4·6 million in housing support grants demonstrates our continuing concern to ensure that authorities do have the resources to meet essential local needs. I commend the order to the House.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): The House would be more than a little gullible if it accepted the last statement that the Secretary of State made, that the payment of this sum of money represents any noticeable change in Government housing policy.

Like the right hon. Gentleman, I also do not wish to detain the House for any length of time, but I would like to put one point to the Secretary of State. He said that this variation emanated from the fact that, because of changes in interest rates and so on a certain amount of money that he originally thought was not available has become available. That has certain consequences for local authorities. In many cases, it has meant that the local authorities have over-increased rents in anticipation of their support grants.

Mr. Rifkind indicated dissent.

Sir Russell Johnston: I see that the Secretary of State is shaking his head, but I can think of at least two local authorities in my constituency that have charged a higher rent than they would have charged had they known that this payment might become available.

Mr. Rifkind: The councils should not have had to do that, because local authorities have always received extra payments for extra expenditure caused by interest rates. That has been the policy for many years and is well known to all local authorities.

Sir Russell Johnston: Badenoch and Strathspey, in my constituency, an example that I am sure is mirrored throughout Scotland, is receiving a substantial sum. If it had known that that money would be available, it would not have increased its rents to the level it did.

Many local authorities set their budget at the beginning of the year, and the support grant variation comes perhaps two thirds of the way through the year, after the new rent levels have been set. The complaint is not that the Government give them this back payment, in view of fluctuations that perhaps the Government cannot immediately control, but that there should be some way in which the Government can stabilise the payments for local authorities.

I do not know exactly how this can be done, and neither do the councils, but it is unsatisfactory that local authorities do not receive such payments until all their budgets have been set. We are well into the year and in many cases—for example the Inverness district council—authorities would not have increased rents to the level that they have had there been the possibility of such payments.

Mr. Rifkind indicated dissent

Sir Russell Johnston: It is all very well the Secretary of State shaking his head, but that is the view of finance officers of local authorities, and he should take some account of it.

Like any other hon. Member, I welcome increased payments for local authority housing accounts. However, local authorities should be able to forecast their budgets more realistically.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): While I welcome any extra money for housing, let us be clear that the money being given by the Government is designed, not to benefit or improve any houses, but to ensure that local authorities do not get into financial problems because the Government got interest rates wrong in the first place. The extra money, to put it in crude terms, goes to the money lenders and not to any council house tenants. It will not reduce one rent, modernise one of the 216,000 houses that require complete modernisation, modernise one of the 134,000 houses that need partial modernisation, rewire one of the 107,000 houses that require rewiring, cure the dampness in one of the 108,699 houses that are damp, nor carry out major repairs on one of the 62,000 houses that require major rapairs. Not one extra penny will be spent on the disastrous crisis in Scottish housing.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall withdraw the order.

Mr. Maxton: The Secretary of State thinks that he is beginning to develop a sense of humour about Scotland. Most of us do not find the housing crisis and the conditions in which many of our constituents live a laughing matter. It is not a laughing matter at all. If the Secretary of State finds it funny, he should ask his constituents in Westerhailes whether they find their housing conditions at all funny. I feel sure that they would not like to see him sitting there and laughing at the housing problems of Scotland.

We welcome any money that will ensure that Scottish local authorities do not get into problems with housing finance, but the Secretary of State should not run away with the idea that the order will benefit, or do anything to stop, the major housing crisis that Scotland faces now.

It is worth pointing out to the Secretary of State that only seven of the 30 local authorities receiving the money have Labour-controlled councils. The rest of them are a variety of different authorities.

Mr. Rifkind: Ah!

Mr. Maxton: The Secretary of State says "Ah", but the interest rates that he was so keen to talk about are paid by those other local authorities as well. Where help has not been given through housing support grant, the tenants have to pay the 60 per cent. loan charges through their rates. The Secretary of State is very keen to give extra help to those other local authorities. For many Labour-controlled authorities there is no help at all. The tenants will face increased rents to pay for those loans.

We welcome whatever sums are available, for whatever purposes, but the Secretary of State should not run away with the idea that by this order he is giving great benefit to housing in Scotland.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved.

That the draft Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Variation (No. 2) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 6th March, be approved.

Privileges

10.31 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I beg to move,

That this House agrees with the Committee of Privileges in its Second Report of the last Session of Parliament (House of Commons Paper No. 555 (1984-85)); and declares that the Recommendation contained in paragraph 14(iv) of the Summary of Conclusions and Recommendations of the Report do have effect from the beginning of this Session.

Last week the House was unfortunately unable to make a decision on the motion to approve the Privileges Committee report. I hope we shall encounter no such difficulty tonight. There is no need to repeat what I said supporting the motion last week, since the House is now well aware of my views. I therefore commend the motion to the House and trust that it will be agreed tonight.

10.32 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I have had the opportunity of reading the report of the debate that took place last week. Perhaps the House will be relieved to know that I find no reason to add to our subtract from what I said then.

I conclude simply by commending, as I did then, the resolution before the House tonight.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I will not keep the House long. I have no reason to subtract from anything that I said in the previous debate, because I got out only one sentence before the question was put. I will make now the three points that I started to make.

I said that the Privileges Committee is right to believe that pre-publication of reports from Select Committees does considerable harm to their work. I could not agree with the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who believed that all the information that could be gained at any time ought to be published.

Pre-publication of reports affects the proper working of Select Committees in two ways. First, while it is correct for a Committee to want to hear all evidence and opinions in order to influence its judgments, that should not be done through the press in early publication, but in evidence properly given to a Committee. Pre-publication of parts, or incorrect parts, of draft reports often brings an influence to that Committee that is quite wrong.

Secondly, such action influences the way in which a Chairman writes a report, if he believes that his report is likely to be leaked. Whenever I have taken part in writing reports, as a Chairman, I have usually wanted to go to one extreme or the other because there was disagreement within the Committee or decisions were not finalised. If one goes to an extreme, a report is either watered down or strengthened. It is one of the ways in which one can get agreement from everybody. Thus, the idea that the pre-publication of the draft report shows what the Committee will decide is usually incorrect.

My third and major point is that the Committee of Privileges' recommendations do not go far enough. We should try to stamp out the pre-publication of Committee reports, remembering that it is generally agreed that the leaking of information is wrong. It should be understood from this debate that pre-publication is a breach of privilege of the House.

The Committee has suggested that there is no way by which we can stamp out publication by the press. I disagree. If we held not the reporter or editor of a newspaper responsible for a breach of privilege of the House but the proprietor or publisher, we would need do that only once for the order to go out to every editor and reporter, "Make certain that no breach of privilege occurs in anything you publish in my newspaper." That might be called draconian, but it would ensure that newspapers generally understood that they should not publish until a Committee had decided absolutely on its final report.

I regret that the Committee of Privileges has not gone that far. Despite that, I see no reason not to accept its recommendations. I hope that they will work. If they do not, perhaps the press will realise that we must take stronger steps than are now proposed.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I do not agree with the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), because, in my view, we should leave the media alone. The issues with which we are concerned relate to hon. Members, and we should address our remarks to them.

I spoke at length in last week's debate, and I again give notice of my intention to divide the House on this issue. I shall do so on the principle that the report does not refer to the introduction of the Liaison Committee, which is the matter to which I referred in the last debate.

The question of that Committee and its intervention in these matters was raised as an issue only following discussions that took place through the usual channels. The effect has been to diffuse the power of Mr. Speaker. Historically, these matters have uniquely always been referred to Mr. Speaker, and it has been for him to decide whether a motion of precedence should be permitted.

On this occasion we are introducing a filter between the Select Committee, which decides that substantial interference is taking place, and the Committee of Privileges, which must also consider whether it can find in the same way and impose whatever sanctions it feels to be necessary. Rather than have that filter, the route should be clean, direct from the complaining Select Committee to the Committee of Privileges.

That would eventually result in frivolous complaints being avoided. I gather that the Liaison Committee was introduced with the idea of avoiding frivolous complaints being made. It was felt that it would be able to deal with applications and ensure that the Committee of Privileges dealt only with substantial matters. As I say, we do not need that filter. The route should be direct and the Committee of Privileges should, if it receives frivolous applications, inform the Select Committees concerned that they are frivolous. That should influence the judgment of those Select Committees about the complaints that they make in future.

I am trying to put the pressure back on to the Select Committees to be wise in their judgments about what matters should be referred in so far as these cause substantial damage or interference with the workings of a Select Committee. This is of great importance, because we are debating the freedom of information and I believe that Select Committees are sitting on documents which should be in the public domain.

There is no reason why those documents should be held by Select Committees until they decide to report to the House, or alternatively until they decide not to report to the House on certain items which they feel, for whatever reason, may have to be sidelined.

I serve on the Public Accounts Committee, and I spent some time yesterday in that Committee arguing the point about confidentiality and about documents which I believe should be within the public domain. The only way that Select Committees can take reasonable decisions is if they are required to do that knowing that the Privileges Committee would not look too kindly on frivolous applications and complaints being put before it.

The Liaison Committee provides a danger, in that, at the end of the day it will not operate in the way recommended or wanted by the members of the Privileges Committee. Furthermore, if the Liaison Committee is crucial to the exercise in trying to establish what would constitute a breach of privilege, why is it not embodied in the report's recommendations? Why is the House having to accept the imposition of a Liaison Committee because of the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) and that of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House?

I believe that what we are doing tonight is wrong, and on that basis I intend to vote against the recommendation.

10.42 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said that he would vote against the measure; some of us, including my hon. Friend, voted against it last week when the Government could not find enough hon. Members to carry it through.

Mr. Biffen: That was not our responsibility.

Mr. Skinner: The Leader of the House says that was not the Government's responsibility. It struck me that the Government were trying to get the motion through. The Whips were running about like—I was going to say like something else—like flies, trying to get the payroll vote back into the House in the same way that they tried tonight to get through the Private Bill on Edinburgh. It was clear what happened. They even got the Prime Minister in tonight.

However, last week, for some reason, which may have had something to do with Cheltenham and the races, Conservative Members were not present to vote. The Cheltenham Gold cup was on last week, but the Government, who have finished up with the biggest majority since the end of war, could not manage to get more than 34 Conservative Members through the Lobby. That was a strange affair. Most of the Tory Members did not seem to care tuppence about the Committee's report and did not turn up for work. The result was that the Government did not get the requisite quorum. They have had to bring the measure back to the House tonight. I do not know what all the Tories were doing at Cheltenham, but I guess that they were leaking, telling their favourite Lobby correspondents what was going on in these Select Committees.

I do not know what all the fuss is about. What do these Committees do? They write reports, and, Ministers rubbish them. There was one on Sellafield last week and, within three days, the Secretary of State for Energy was on the wireless and television issuing a press report saying that he did not care tuppence for the report. I cannot recall one of the reports of these important Select Committees resulting in any dramatic change either in the House or, more importantly for the people we represent, outside the House.

I therefore do not get involved or enmeshed in these weird Select Committees, which are all about trying to get a soppy consensus. I am not into that. I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Workington that if I were a member of a Select Committee—I am not—I would believe that the Committees should be held not in private but in public. The fact that they are held in private is probably one of the reasons why they do not work properly. The press and the public should be present, if they so wish, so that they know what is going on.

If that happened, there would not be any leaks.

There are no leaks in the House. Hansard reports what hon. Members say. Why should it be different in a Select Committee? It is because of the gravitation towards the middle and the desire for consensus. I did not become a Member to represent that view. I became a Member to represent the Labour party and the class interests associated with it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington and I shall vote against the motion, for slightly different reasons. I think that other hon. Members would agree with me, but they probably believe that the Committee's recommendation is inconsequential and does not really matter. Like the Tory Members last week, those hon. Members will not bother to vote.

Mr. Biffen: By leave of the House, I shall reply briefly, out of courtesy, to this short debate which has been valuable in showing an understanding of the Privileges Committee's proposals.

I understand the zest of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) for exacting punishment on editors or proprietors, but I have to tell him, not that that view has been rejected by the Privileges Committee, but that that it is for the House to consider infringements when they arise. When infringements arise because of the leaking of information by a Member of Parliament or the staff of a Member of Parliament who cannot be detected, that provides a happy circumstance in which to wreak the only punishment available—on the newspaper that publishes that information. We live with that difficulty and, doubtless, experience will guide us in the passage of time on how to proceed.

I have a lively sympathy with the argument of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). I think that there is not a great difference between us. I hope that that will not mean that he goes home sad this evening. In all matters of privilege—we saw this very effectively yesterday—it is a question not only of living by the book but of living by an application of common sense and a measured judgment through experience.

It was thought, not for a sinister reason, that the Liaison Committee would be particularly helpful in giving guidance to the Privileges Committee in the application of that essential parliamentary requisite—common sense—in trying to handle privileges matters. If we do not arm ourselves with common sense, we make ourselves into laughing stocks. That has happened many times when the House has tried to deal with matters of privilege. I hope that the hon. Member for Workington will be charitable about our modest innovation and will see in it not any sinister motive but the desire of the House to take measured footsteps, pace by pace.

That brings me to the charming intervention of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). The idea that I am put in this acutely personally embarrassing position of bringing back to the House for the second time a matter on which I desperately seek the consent of hon. Members because of the ineptitude of the Conservative Whips on Cheltenham Gold Cup day is an interpretation that deserves to be savoured not only in the House but outside it. However, I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that I think that, in many political matters, especially this one, the cock-up theory should be more favoured than the conspiracy one.

This evening, we are performing a modest role for the House of Commons because—and for no other reason—we failed by the magic figure of one to get the matter confirmed by the House last week. I am reminded of the time when my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) was in charge of retail price maintenance and carried the vote by one. He triumphantly said, "The one is enough." On this occasion, I had to conclude in the words of Browning,

"Oh, the little more, and how much it is!"

That was certainly effectively true this evening. I quite understand why the hon. Member for Bolsover has a good-natured contempt for the working of Select Committees.

Parliament is a multi-disciplinary school. Many of us thoroughly enjoy fighting politics in the conventional sense across the Floor of the House and no one does it more effectively than the hon. Member for Bolsover. That does not entitle us to disparage those who seek the route of Select Committees and their particular method of influencing parliamentary and public opinion in great matters of national debate. I hope that we can live in a House of Commons where all these disciplines are happily and generously contained. On that basis I hope I can persuade the hon. Member for Bolsover to be with me in the Lobby this evening.

Resolved,

That this House agrees with the Committee of Privileges in its Second Report of the last Session of Parliament (House of Commons Paper No. 555 (1984-85)); and declares that the Recommendation contained in paragraph 14(iv) of the Summary of Conclusions and Recommendations of the Report do have effect from the beginning of this Session.

PETITIONS

Social Security Reform

11 pm

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of the members of the Inverness district of the Transport and General Workers Union Retired Members Association. One thousand of those members have appended their names to a humble petition to the House which expresses a view that legislation based on the "Social Security Reform: Programme for Action" White Paper would be extremely detrimental to the residents of the United Kingdom who are in receipt of social security benefits.

The petition says:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House do not pass legislation arising out of the Reform of Social Security White Paper.

The members feel that the reform involves a redistribution of benefit support within a cash-limited social security system away from women towards men within the family, away from childless poor and the elderly, and fails to achieve an integrated tax and social security system which would be fairer to all

The petition concludes:

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Shops Bill

11.2 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I beg to ask leave to present a petition which was compiled by the efforts of Mr. Lawrence C. Kelly of 56 Ballendaloch drive, Glasgow, which deals with the Shops Bill. The petitioners ask that the Government do not pass legislation which will permit Sunday opening.

Contrary to popular opinion, the proposed legislation is not popular north of the border. I know that the Rev. Frank Myers, the minister of the central Springburn Church of Scotland, and his congregation would fully support this petition because a large number of the congregation and Frank Myers have written to me. They fear that, when and if the legislation is passed, it will mean we will have Sunday opening on the main streets of the cities in Scotland. That would be undesirable to our way of life and undesirable for the shop workers and members of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers who are not enjoying a decent standard of living at present.

The petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House do maintain legal limitations on Sunday trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday is protected. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Drug Abuse (Glasgow)

11.5 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I beg to ask leave to present a very important petition which contains 1,865 signatures, mainly from the Germiston district of Glasgow, Springburn and also from the Royston district which is mainly in the constituency of my hon.

[Mr. Michael J. Martin]

Friend the Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. McTaggart), who wishes to be associated with this petition.

The people in the community are greatly concerned about the scale of drug abuse in the area. They call for this House to pass legislation to combat this very serious problem. Since Christmas, a number of young boys have died because of this dreaded problem.

The petition was compiled by members of the G21 drug rehabilitation group, which consists of mothers, parents and young drug addicts, the local clergy and community workers. They are all trying to do something. They ask that this House should do its very best to pass legislation to combat the problem.

The petition concludes:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will pass legislation to combat this problem and to provide more amenities and resources.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

RAOC, Hilton

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

11.6 pm

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): At Hilton in my constituency there is a vehicle depot that is run by the Royal Army Ordnance Corps. It covers some 270 acres just outside Derby. I understand that it is responsible for the storage of about 7,000 vehicles of every kind—scooters, cars, taxis, fire engines, ambulances, lorries, Land Rovers: in fact, everything that moves and belongs to the armed forces, right up to huge tank transporters which sometimes block up our local villages. They are not regarded, in technical language, as specialised vehicles. They are "B" vehicles.

On the same site, there is also a REME workshop, whose job it is to repair those vehicles. The whole operation at Hilton is the maintenance and storage of vehicles. It is one great big garage—one of the largest in the country. It covers a very large area. It employs about 250 of my constituents and also constituents of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who wishes to be associated with my remarks.

After the war there were dozens of these depots all over the country. Recently most of them have been closed. Only three are left in England. The others are at Ashchurch and Ludgershall. All of them are now associated in management terms. The other depots specialise in vehicles such as tanks that are known as "A" vehicles, but Hilton is the only depot that is entirely a civilian operation. It reports to military personnel who are based at one of the other depots.

In August 1982, as part of the review of military spending, it was decided by the Director General of Ordnance Services to take a look at Hilton. The question was this: "We reduced the number of depots from about 30 down to 12 and then down to three. Do we need three? Would not two do?" In the aftermath of the Falklands, an investigation team was set up to see whether Hilton should be shut.

My involvement started a year or so later, in 1983, when I was elected to this House. My constituents came to see me and I exchanged letters with Ministers. I have examples of the signatures of every person who has been a Minister in this Department. I asked lots of parliamentary questions. An official visit was arranged. I was delighted to meet Colonel Bowden, and Brigadier Berrigan showed me around. I was most impressed by the quality of the work done there, by the efficiency of the place and by the good humour, flexibility and commitment of the work force at all levels. Therefore, I made representations about this potential closure. Eight months after my visit and nearly two years after the study started, back came the message: Hilton was indeed needed and would not be closed. This came, for example, in a letter from my noble Friend Lord Trefgarne dated 5 July 1984 in which he said:

"The study has now been completed and its conclusions recommend a continuing requirement for a Central Vehicle Depot organisation for the forseeable future based on the three vehicle depots at Ashchurch, Hilton and Ludgershall."

That was confirmed a few days later in the answer to a written question that I tabled. It reads:

"its main conclusion was to confirm the need for the existing three depots, of which CVD Hilton in South Derbyshire is one."

—[Official Report, 10 July 1984; Vol. 63, c. 457.]

So Hilton was needed. However the Ministry of Defence was not satisfied and another study was to be undertaken to see whether it was possible to privatise Hilton. Indeed, the term that has been used in most of the letters since has been to contractorise. From 1984 to now, another two years, they have been investigated all over again. I believe that the report that was the result of that investigation was available in September 1985. I have seen a one-and-a-half page summary of it. Since then we have had silence.

I asked to see the Minister, my noble Friend, but I was told it was not quite appropriate because a decision had been taken. Nothing has been published; no decision has been taken as far as we know, hence this Adjournment debate. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will realise that a patient Job would have got fed up with all that, and would be having a screaming fit by now. After four years of investigating this depot my constituents and I are thoroughly fed up.

What we are all after is a better, cheaper service. In recent years at Hilton the service has been streamlined quite considerably, even though the military commitment has been maintained. In 1979, I am told, there were over 200 industrials working for the RAOC. Now there are 123, and that includes security staff. In 1979 there were more than 100 people working for REME in the workshops. Now there are, I believe, 68, so the industrial staffing numbers have come down by over 50 per cent., from over 300 to 191. In addition, there are approximately 50 non-industrial staff working there.

There has been a ban on recruitment for more than a year for all grades, and the resulting squeeze on manpower has not done Hilton's reputation all that much good, because its job is to get the vehicles out and it has to leave undone other things that are low priority, such as valeting the vehicles. What the majors and the lieutenant-colonels must think of the rather grubby vehicles they are getting I do not know. It does not help the service at all. I should add that all of my figures come from diligent searching in public sources and nobody has contravened the Official Secrets Act. Hilton has been forced as a result to use contract labour, such as contract drivers, willy-nilly, and I am not sure that doing it in this way, almost by the back door, is at all satisfactory. The view taken is that the work has to be done.

The policies of the MOD in recent months have made the continued existence of Hilton even more important. My hon. Friend said on another occasion that much of our MOD work is done in the south of England. Seventy per cent. of military personnel and 60 per cent. of civilians working for the MOD are based in the southern region. Those are areas that do not need the extra jobs, but Derbyshire and Staffordshire do. The south can do without the extra competition for land and for housing, but the north and the midlands are keen to see growth and development and are desperately anxious not to lose what they already have. Unemployment in Derby is 13 per cent. and I have a feeling that is more than in Pirbright and in one or two other places down south that could probably manage with less work.

If the MOD wants to save money while not compromising the service, there are a number of things it could do, probably without contractorising and certainly without investigating the place all over again. But it would involve listening to the people who work at Hilton and who have some good ideas. For example, within the fence of the depot they all work as one — the depot and the workshops. There is complete flexibility among the work force. Electricians will do fitting, storekeepers will drive, the drivers will put a battery in, and so on, and yet they report separately to RAOC and REME.

They have allocated to their budget two lots of headquarter expenses, all of it military. Therefore, one of their suggestions is to make it a single company. That would be more efficient and would save money. Another proposal is to ask whether civilianisation is not a better way to run this service. Of the three depots only Hilton is entirely civilian: the others are part military. I am told that there are reasons for this, that the military personnel need to know how to run them. Fine, but they can be seconded to Hilton, they do not need to be permanent staff. I am also told that a 24-hour commitment is required and that only the military can provide that.

The experience at Hilton, particularly during the Falklands crisis, surely shows — I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm this—that civilians can and do offer exactly the same commitment, and do so without question. In any case, the argument about commitment applies just as much if the depot was privatised. The military have no monopoly on patriotism. I think that we dealt with the argument in the debate on the privatisation of the royal ordnance factories.

But the military are expensive. If we compare the salaries of civilians with the appropriate military equivalent, we get some interesting figures. For example, the top rank civilian who works at Hilton costs £17,823. The equivalent military rank is a lieutenant colonel, who costs £32,385 — that is only his pay — almost twice as much. The executive officer at Hilton costs the state £11,117. The equivalent rank is a captain, who costs £19,661 — again almost twice as much. The lowly clerical officers, the people who actually keep the place going, cost £7,641 each. The equivalent is a staff sergeant costing £14,827, again a ratio of almost two to one. May I emphasise that the military costs are only pay, national insurance, pension and gratuity costs? If we add accommodation costs and the other little extras that the military have, such as school fees, the cost of employing a soldier, especially a senior soldier, instead of a civilian, become astronomical. I believe that the case is firmly made that it is cheaper to have civilians, such as my constituents, with no loss of efficiency in service.

The case made by the people who work there was summed up best, not in my words, but in the words of Mr. O'Hara, who is one of the union representatives, in a letter dated 24 July 1985, in which he said:

"FACT We at Hilton can issue vehicles more efficiently, more cheaply than the other Depot with a military presence.

FACT We have greater flexibility of labour than the other depot with military management.

FACT We have a loyal work force who, when called upon, can, and do, work the same hours and often more than our military counterparts, sometimes if needed on 24 hour call out, many with some 17-20 years service to the crown behind them . . .

FACT We are a shining example of how to run a Vehicle Depot cheaply and efficiently . . .

FACT We have been studied countless times for a number of reasons and every study has been sponsored by the military. It's time the picture was looked at by an independent body."

He went on to say—I have a lot sympathy with this—

"The truth is that we are an embarrassment because of our efficiency."

My constituents are worried and suspicious about some of the advice that my hon. Friend the Minister has been given. If Hilton were to shut, we would lose the strategic benefits of having our vehicles on more than one site, and we would lose a site giving major employment in an area not overly well endowed with employment. If Hilton were to be privatised we would disrupt an excellent and smoothly running service. We would probably save very little. Indeed, redundancy costs would make it quite an expensive operation.

In either case, we would lose the dedicated and loyal service of a first-class work force and we would end up with something less efficient in both performance and cost. But if Hilton were allowed to stay open, with some of the ideas of the work force put into practice, the service would benefit, the Ministry of Defence would benefit and my constituents could continue to be as fanatically proud of the work that they do for our nation as they are now, and quite rightly so. I hope that my hon. Friend will consider these points and set our minds at rest tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) on her good fortune in securing this Adjournment debate. I welcome the opportunity to give as full a statement as I can about the Royal Army Ordnance Corps vehicle sub-depot at Hilton. Before dealing with the more specific issues raised by my hon. Friend I think it would help if I were first to explain the background against which decisions concerning support to the Army are made.

It is a major objective of this Administration to instil into all areas of the public sector a much greater awareness of costs and cost-effectiveness. We have done much, for example, to encourage the participation of the private sector in support of those administrative activities which it is not strictly necessary to have done by MOD employees. The taxpayer is already benefiting from greater competition, either as resources are released for more effective use elsewhere or where cost-cutting reduces the burden the public sector imposes on the economy. This is evident, for example, in the way in we have been able to reduce the size of the Civil Service, so that expenditure on salaries, and so on, is correspondingly lower than it would otherwise have been.

The financial management initiative is a catalyst for much work in the Ministry of Defence, in part aimed at improving the knowledge that managers at all levels have of their costs. Indeed, some of the studies to which I shall refer later result from the more creative thinking which the FMI has encouraged.

As I have said before, it is a paramount point of principle that we have a duty to the taxpayer to see that defence funds are spent only on essential activity, and spent in the most cost-effective manner. In the defence support area it is the policy of the Government to retain activities in the public sector only where this is operationally essential or where there is a clear advantage to the taxpayer. In this way, we aim to extend the scope of activity which benefits from the effects of competition.

Support for the army, and logistic support in the case of the vehicle sub-depot at Hilton, must be considered against the background I have just outlined. More important, resources released from the support area can be redeployed to front-line and other operational areas—from the "tail" to the "teeth", as we put it.

I turn now to the Hilton situation in particular. The vehicle sub-depot at Hilton—as my hon. Friend well knows—is about 15 miles from Derby and occupies a site of about 250 acres. It employs some 236 civilian staff and holds about 6,500 vehicles.

It is one of three vehicle depots which between them receive, inspect, maintain, store and issue all Army vehicles—from tanks to trailers, from cars to cranes. They also handle vehicles for the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force.

The other two depots are Ludgershall in Wiltshire, which deals with armoured vehicles—"A" vehicles—and Ashchurch in Gloucestershire, which, together with Hilton, processes the remainder. Hilton's main work load involves "soft-skinned" vehicles—"B" vehicles—which are identical with, or very similar, to commercially available vehicles. Hilton is wholly civilian manned; the other depots are staffed by both military and civilian personnel.

I and my fellow Ministers pay a tribute, too, to our civil servants who serve us so well in so many different capacities and especially at Hilton. I know how much, too, the Army appreciates their loyal service in carrying out their important role. I thank my hon. Friend for the opportunity to make these remarks. I know how committed she is to the welfare of the Hilton work force.

Clearly, I accept the point that there can be valuable economies from replacing service personnel with civilian staff. Indeed, it is quite proper to do so where this can sensibly release soldiers for service in front line units. In the case of the two other depots, however, the military presence is justified by the mobilisation and reinforcement roles which they are assigned in a period of tension or war.

My hon. Friend made reference to possible improvements to costs and efficiency in our current vehicle depot operations by rationalising the management structures of the depots and their associated workshops. The professional oversight of all workshop operations in the Army is the proper responsibility of the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers. They are responsible for technical standards and practices, as well as for training and various aspects of interposting, for military and civilian mobile staff alike. It therefore makes no real sense, except in the case of contractorisation, for 91 Vehicle Workshop at Hilton to be disconnected from REME's wider control, and I have to say that significant economies are unlikely to accrue from an amalgamation of the storehouse and workshop elements. The same applies in even greater measure to the REME workshops at Ashchurch and Ludgershall, which reflect the discrete specialisms of the supply and the engineering staffs.

Our experience of involving the private sector and introducing competition into Government activity has shown significant savings. Hilton's work load embraces vehicles that are in everyday use up and down the country. It was quite appropriate, therefore, to consider whether there would be advantage in putting the work out to contract. We mounted a feasibility study late in 1984 and received a report which recommended that the idea be pursued. In the normal course of events, we would have then consulted the work force and its representatives about our resulting proposals. This would have taken place last autumn.

However, the armed forces, and the Army in particular, are dependent on vehicles for all types of operational and support activities, and our vehicle holdings are considerable. It is not surprising, therefore, that recently we have been looking even more closely at ways and means of ensuring that we get maximum value from expenditure in this area and that our vehicle holdings are no more than the minimun needed for our purposes. There are a number of studies in train which could impact upon vehicle requirements, and thus on the numbers we need to keep in store. We are examining, for example, greater use of the private sector for the provision of the Army's day-to-day administrative transport. Vehicle leasing is a possibility, and there are other examinations of both our holdings and our purchasing arrangements under way.

What this means is that we are currently unable to forecast with sufficient accuracy Hilton's workload over the next four to five years, and so we are in no position — on that count alone — to frame a viable tendering exercise to which industry could reasonably be expected to respond. The result is that the Hilton work force, knowing full well that a study into contracting-out has taken place, and, indeed, having been given a summary of its findings, has so far heard nothing further about progress. I naturally regret that, but we have not been in a position to say anything useful while the other studies continue.

The climate of sustained uncertainty endured by the work force is most unfortunate, and I should have preferred to eliminate it entirely. However, as I have mentioned, we are still engaged in studies which might materially affect the numbers of vehicles that we need to process through or store in the depots. Certainly, in this situation, we cannot sensibly embark on contracting out, and I am tonight taking the opportunity to announce that it is to be suspended.

But, as I said, I cannot remove the air of doubt entirely. These very studies will make it necessary for us to consider whether the overall load will drop sufficiently for our vehicle support needs to be met by just two depots. This is a very complex area, involving, not only our internal vehicle management arrangements, but our system of the procurement and delivery of new equipment. If it emerges that it may be possible for two depots to meet our needs, we shall have to be clear what impact, if any, there will be on the existing arrangements with our vehicle suppliers.

My hon. Friend raised our intention to ease the concentration in the south of defence units and establishments by encouraging relocation northwards. As I said in reply to the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham):

"This is a matter for continuing review as opportunities arise, such as when major investment is required . . . all proposals will need to stand on their operational and economic merits." — [Official Report, 11 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 802.]

It will be no different in our consideration of the Army vehicle depots.

It is unlikely that we shall be able to reach conclusions quickly, and though I know that my hon. Friend would no doubt prefer that her constituents were given a clear indication of the future, I fear that the necessary work will not be completed before the end of this year. Nevertheless, an announcement will be made at the earliest possible moment.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Listed Buildings (Northamptonshire)

1. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in reviewing the listed status of buildings in Northamptonshire.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): The resurvey of Northamptonshire is progressing well and is on target for completion by May 1987.

Mr. Freeman: I thank my hon. Friend for that encouraging news. When he next meets the chairman of the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission for England, will he urge him to give priority in using scarce resources of repair grant-aid to buildings which are listed and empty so that they may at least be kept in good structural repair?

Mr. Tracey: I appreciate the sincerity of my hon. Friend's remarks. He should know that the chairman of the commission has discretion in this matter. However, I am sure that the chairman will have noted my hon. Friend's remarks.

Rates

2. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the average proportion by which domestic rates will increase in England and Wales in 1986-87.

15. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest estimate of the average increase in domestic rates for 1986-87.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Kenneth Baker): A number of authorities have yet to set their rates, but it seems likely that English general rates will rise by about 12 per cent. and domestic rates will rise by between 13 and 14 per cent.

Mr. Hardy: Is this not the seventh successive year in which the Government have compelled local authorities to levy rates well in excess of the rate of inflation and created an utterly inequitable and confused situation? Is the Minister aware that a responsible local authority, such as Rotherham, now has to levy a much higher rate as a consequence of the abolition of the metropolitan counties, which was supposed to be an economy?

Mr. Baker: I have been advised that the increase for Rotherham is 25 per cent. The underlying reason is that expenditure in Rotherham next year is budgeted to go up by 13 per cent. I have to say to the hon. Gentleman and to all local authorities that the figures show that authorities' budgets now show an average expenditure increase of 9 per cent., which is double the rate of inflation. That is the main reason for higher rates increases this year.

Mr. Harris: Is my right hon. Friend aware that some district councils in Cornwall have cut their rates? Is not the lesson to be drawn that it is up to every county council to look at its expenditure in good time and, with the utmost care, to see where sensible savings can be made?

Mr. Baker: I agree with my hon. Friend. At least one of the district councils in Cornwall, Penwith, has cut its local rate. The Cornwall county council rate has gone up for the simple reason that the Liberals are calling the shots; and where they call the shots, the rates go up.

Mr. Allan Roberts: The Conservatives are calling the shots in Sefton and they have not increased expenditure. In fact, they have admitted that they cannot cut services any more, having already cut them to the bone, and that there will be a 20 per cent. rate increase. Will the Minister explain all that? Will he also explain why all the balances have been thrown into the budget equation by the Conservatives in Sefton and why they are leaving to the new Labour administration, after May, a bankrupt borough?

Mr. Baker: The reason is that the outgoing metropolitan county councils have, on the whole, during the past year increased their spending quite dramatically. They have used their balances, and there is little left on which the successor councils can count.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is an unhappy state of affairs when rates are increasing more than the rate of inflation? Although he may not be able to avoid that this year, will he reassure us that the Government will do everything possible to ensure that we do not have a similar increase the following year?

Mr. Baker: I have considerable sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. Those rates increases are regrettable, but they reflect the sharp increase in local authority expenditure next year. The figures that I have given represent an increase in expenditure of between 9 and 10 per cent. My hon. Friend will recall that before Christmas I said that the Government were prepared to fund expenditure roughly at the rate of inflation—3·5 to 4 per cent. If authorities spend higher than that, the ratepayers will have to bear the result. I accept that several authorities are economical and thrifty, and there are several in Lincolnshire. I shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend said and try to ensure that they have a better deal next year.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Secretary of State said that when rates go up in some places it is because the Liberals are calling the shots. Does he accept that we are consistent, in that rates have gone up when we have said that we needed to increase services in councils inherited from the Tories, and that inconsistency is on the right hon. Gentleman's side? His commitment was to cut costs and hold services, yet he has failed fundamentally, and throughout the nation, to achieve that objective.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman will not be pleased when he sees the figures. Rates rises in hung counties amount to 20 per cent., on average. Time and again—in Cumbria, Cornwall, Devon, Oxfordshire and Somerset, where there are hung councils—that leads to higher spending and higher rates—[Interruption.] It is not due to a cut in grants, because this year the amount of central Government grant to local government will be £11·4 billion, and next year there will be an increase of £400 million, giving a total of £11·8 billion.

Mr. Spencer: In view of the fact that only 34 per cent. of householders pay full domestic rates, does my right hon. Friend agree that the present situation shows that it is high time that payments were placed on the shoulders of individuals who enjoy the services, not on the property in which they live?

Mr. Baker: My hon. and learned Friend is right. That is the main thrust of the Green Paper that I have published. My hon. and learned Friend has every right to feel aggrieved, because the proportion of the electorate who pay rates and vote in Leicester is about the figure that he gave. That allows Leicester council to contemplate a rate increase next year of 80 per cent.

Dr. Cunningham: Why does the Secretary of State not accept that the Budget Red Book is planning an increase in rates of over £2 billion? The Budget Red Book plans an increase in rates of 15 per cent., on average. That is what the Government announced yesterday. Why does the right hon. Gentleman also pretend that the Government are not shifting burdens from the taxpayer to the ratepayer? Again, that is what the Red Book shows. Taxes are being reduced miserably, but the burdens are being shifted consistently on to ratepayers. Is that not why, in the shire counties in particular, for which we have all the information, rates are averaging almost 20 per cent.? In Tory-controlled shire counties the rates averages are higher than in Labour-controlled counties. The average for Tory counties, of which there are 10, is 17·6 per cent. There are nine Labour-controlled counties, and the average is 15·8 per cent. Those are the figures. Is it not appalling that a Government who twice promised to abolish the rates have increased the rates in real terms by 82 per cent.?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman knows that I have produced a Green Paper, which is for consultation, which will lead to a radical change and to the abolition of the rates. Referring to the level of grants, the figures that I have given confirm what is in the Red Book. I said that local government expenditure, most regrettably, is going up next year by between 9 and 10 per cent. The hon. Gentleman referred to the shift between the ratepayer and the taxpayer. I must tell the House and the hon. Gentleman that the amount of grant that we shall pay out this year is £11·4 billion. Next year it will be £11·8 billion. We are increasing the amount of grant next year, but, in spite of that, we have higher expenditure and higher rate increases.

Broadleaved Woodlands

3. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals have been received by his Department from the Countryside Commission, or elsewhere, for the protection of small ancient or semi-natural broadleaved woodlands necessary to the preservation of the natural beauty of the landscape.

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): The Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council were closely involved in the broadleaved woodlands policy review undertaken by the Forestry Commission last year, but I have received no further proposals for the protection of woodlands since the Government statement on that was issued on 24 July 1985.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Nature Conservancy Council's recommendations for relief from what until yesterday we called capital transfer tax exclude woodlands of less than two hectares? Will Ministers examine that seemingly perverse discrimination against the poorer and smaller?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am aware of that question and the problem that is involved. The difficulty is that there are an enormous number of small woodlands, and we must consider whether the extra work involved for the NCC would be worthwhile, considering the small amount of CTT that would be forgone. I shall reconsider the matter as a result of my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Dalyell: What have Ministers learnt from the episode when the Seafield estate—not Sellafield—cut down an ancient part of the Caledonian forest in the Rothiemurchis area, which evaded the Government's legislation?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not responsible for Scotland. The truth is that we are aware in general that more powers are needed for forestry conservation. A number of useful suggestions are coming forward. I shall be in touch with the hon. Gentleman further on that matter.

Mr. Chapman: As it has been estimated that during the past 35 years more than one third of our ancient woodlands have been felled, and as it is apparent that during the past few years thousands of hedgerows—the seedbeds of much of our rural tree stock—have been uprooted, may I commend to my hon. Friend that the Countryside Commission and other bodies are given every support and that fresh initiatives are forthcoming to encourage tree planting of amenity value in our rural areas?

Mr. Waldegrave: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. There are some interesting projects afoot, one of which may interest my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison)—the Silvanus project, which the Dartington Commission and the Countryside Commission have developed in the south-west of England for the management of small woodlands.

Dr. David Clark: Is the Minister aware that with inevitable changes in the common agricultural policy 10 million acres of basically lowland Britain will probably be made redundant for cereal production? Does he appreciate that that gives us a great opportunity to start increasing our woodlands in lowland Britain? Will he set up a joint working party with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to see how we can bring about the reafforestation of lowland Britian with deciduous trees?

Mr. Waldegrave: If I were Lord Hylton, perhaps I would send the hon. Gentleman several of my speeches on the subject. The hon. Gentleman is correct, in that there are opportunities. However, all the land released will not be from cereal production, nor will it all be suitable for tree planting. The opportunities for forestry in lowland areas must now be increased. It is an interesting matter.

Infrastructure projects

4. Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how well English infrastructure projects have fared in 1985 as far as European regional development fund grant is concerned compared to the preceding four years.

Mr. Tracey: I have good news of growth for my hon. Friend. In 1981 the European Commission awarded £66·4 million for English infrastructure projects within the assisted areas; in 1982, £86 million; and in 1983, £97·5 million. 1984 was a record year, with total grant awarded of £182 million, and the level has been maintained with the award of some £185 million for 1985.

Mr. Franks: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information, which is most intelligent. Will he ensure that the United Kingdom takes full advantage of the provisions for programme funding contained in the European regional development fund?

Mr. Tracey: Yes. The United Kingdom has taken a lead in establishing national programmes of community interest. In England, the Mersey basin programme, with an award of £66·5 million, is now operational. The Shildon programme has received an award of £18 million. We expect to submit further programmes in due course.

Mr. Straw: Will the Under-Secretary of State confirm that the information that he has given is not good news for those parts of the country that are affected? The Government ignore the marginal effects of the European regional development fund by knocking off from the overall total of public expenditure that which they get from the European regional development fund, which means that there is no net benefit to the British economy or to the regions of this country.

Mr. Tracey: It is correct that those grants are additional at national level. Receipts from the European regional development fund are taken into account when public expenditure levels are set each year. Therefore, programmes are higher than they would otherwise be.

Residential Tenancies

5. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to free all new residential tenancies from the provisions of the Rent Acts; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): The Government have no proposals for any major reform of the Rent Acts in the lifetime of this Parliament. However, it remains our wish to encourage the supply of more homes to let in the private rented sector, in order to provide greater scope for responsible landlords approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to invest in rented accommodation. Yesterday I tabled amendments to the Housing and Planning Bill to extend the assured tenancy scheme to improved property.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my hon. Friend aware that a great deal of residential property in and around my constituency could be brought into use? I accept what my hon. Friend has just said, but does he agree that an extension of the shorthold tenancy arrangements would encourage labour mobility and create new accommodation in areas of shortage?

Mr. Patten: We think that the kind of extension of the assured tenancy scheme that has been proposed will help those who need accommodation. Above all, we need to promote respectable and responsible landlordism in both the private and public sectors. That is what we intend to do.

Mr. Cartwright: I very much welcome the Minister's commitment to extend the assured tenancy scheme, but does he accept that if we are to get additional private investment in the new forms of rented housing that we desperately need the Government will have to provide attractive financial incentives for potential investors and help to ensure that rent levels bring the accommodation within the grasp of potential tenants? When will we see progress being made in those two directions?

Mr. Patten: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman welcomes our plans to extend the assured tenancy scheme. As for financial incentives to responsible landlords—building societies, insurance companies and pension funds—as well as to private individuals, unfortunatley that is a bit late for yesterday's Budget. However, I shall certainly draw that point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for next year's Budget.

Mr. Ian Lloyd: What possible real political significance can now be attached to the phrase "a property owning democracy" when the distinction between ownership and occupation has virtually been destroyed by this ill-conceived, ill-judged and damaging legislation? When will the Government grasp this nettle?

Mr. Patten: As I said earlier, we intend to move forward on this issue after the next general election. In the meantime, we intend to extend the assured tenancy scheme. As for owner-occupation and a property-owning democracy, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will welcome the reduction in interest and mortgage rates, which will greatly help home owners.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not clear that what Tory Members of Parliament want is another Rent Act 1957, which produced Rachmanism and the rest? The Opposition have a duty to warn private tenants that, in the unlikely event of this Government being re-elected, the same kind of Rent Act will be passed as was passed in 1957. Why do the Government not give private tenants the right to buy instead of wishing to take away their existing security?

Mr. Patten: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is talking absolute rubbish. He is going over arguments long dead. He should be looking to the future and trying to find ways in which we can bring back into use, in order to help the homeless, the young and those who are seeking jobs, property which is now empty. That is what we are bent on doing.

Mr. Lyell: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an enormous advantage in encouraging the private sector to provide new accommodation for rental without rent restriction? Will he consider carefully going down that route as soon as possible?

Mr. Patten: As I have announced, we are to extend the assured tenancy scheme. I can give an unequivocal assurance to my hon. and learned Friend and to all other hon. Members that we have no intention, now or in future, of doing anything that will affect the security of tenants in the private rented sector. Any leaflets that are going around Fulham, for example, stating the opposite are completely and utterly without foundation.

Mr. Rooker: In respect of acceptable landlordism and Fulham, both of which have been mentioned by the Minister, will the hon. Gentleman condemn the proposed private meeting at 7 o'clock tonight of Conservative and Liberal councillors who are members of the housing committee to dispose of much-needed rented accommodation at Fulham Court? Is that consistent with Government policy?

Mr. Patten: That is the first that I have heard of that or of any other meeting that will be held in Fulham tonight. I condemn the tactics of the London Labour party in putting around in Fulham and elsewhere scaremongering leaflets that have no foundation.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: I welcome my hon. Friend's answer to this question and his anticipated answer to my question, which is No. 51, about the extension of assured tenancies. Will he tell Labour Members that there are 600,000 empty houses and that the building of houses for owner-occupation does not meet the needs of the single mobile who want accommodation to rent? Will he please introduce proposals as soon as possible that will meet these needs?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right, and I shall continue to tell Opposition Members what he suggests. Happily, some Opposition Members, such as the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), recognise what my hon. Friend and the Government are saying. I believe that a good number of Labour Members recognise that and are doing so in increasing numbers.

House Building

6. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new housing starts have been made in (a) the public sector and (b) the private sector for each year from 1979 to the latest date available; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): The provisional estimates for last year are 140,000 private and 28,000 public sector starts in England. The figures for 1979 are 121,000 and 69,000 respectively. Figures for the intervening years appear in table 2 of my Departments' press notice No. 135, issued on 7 March, which is available in the Library.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister accept that yesterday, Budget day, was a great opportunity for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on behalf of the Government and especially of the Department of the Environment, to make an announcement that would have resulted in many more bungalows and houses being built in the public sector for at least 250,000 pensioners—some of them in three-bedroom houses—who would like the opportunity to live in decent accommodation for the last few years of their lives?

Is it not a scandal that when millions of bricks are being stocked, when at least 250,000 construction workers want to do some work and when there is much homelessness in our large cities, the Government refuse to do anything because they would sooner have a massive dole queue than allow Labour authorities to build houses?

It is like the pensioner—[Interruption.] I have not spoken for as long as a Minister did earlier. It is rather like what a retired miner said to me in Bolsover the other day. He said that the Government care only about looking after the dames of Dulwich so that they can have houses built for them at £500,000 a time while miners——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have my eye on some of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues who wish to be called.

Mr. Skinner: rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman not care about them?

Mr. Skinner: There are all these retired people——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is enough.

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman approaches this issue with his customary neutrality. As a result of the Budget yesterday, mortgage rates have already been reduced by two major building societies. That will be of great help to those in housing need who hope to be private house owners and do not look exclusively to local authorities. The greatest reduction in public sector house building took place between 1976 and 1979. In cash terms, the Government are spending on public sector housing roughly what we spent when we came into office. That is a record which the previous Labour Government could not achieve.

Mr. Heddle: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a scandal that the public sector is still sitting on a lot of vacant land that could be sold to the private sector and could have built upon it half-and-half houses for sale? Tenants on housing waiting lists would be only too prepared to buy such houses.

Sir George Young: I am happy to tell the House that the day before yesterday my hon. Friend served notice on a number of public sector bodies to dispose of land by auction within three months. It is a scandal that so much land in the public sector should not be used for housing and for creating jobs. We hope to issue further directions in the near future.

Mr. John Fraser: Does the Minister accept that on the matter of rented housing the Labour party will never be neutral? Will he confirm that there has been a loss of 250,000 homes to rent in the public sector since his party came to power? The reduced construction figures show a loss of 250,000 public sector homes since 1979. Will the Minister tell the House the sum total of broken families, illness and disease, homelessness and unemployment and redundancy in the building industry as a result of the Government's abdication of public responsibility for housing?

Sir George Young: The hon. Member continues to look solely at the public sector. The private sector accounts for three quarters of starts, and 1983 saw the highest number of starts in the private sector for 10 years. If one is to take a responsible approach to housing, one must look at both the public and private sectors. Houses that have been sold are not now available for rent, but they are still homes meeting the needs of the people who live in them.

Repair Grants

10. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will bring forward proposals to allow repair grants to be paid on houses built after 1 January 1919.

Mr. John Patten: We have no immediate plans to do so, though we are considering it.

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister bear in mind that many houses, such as the ex-NCB houses at Lynemouth in my constituency, are in need of structural repair? The tenants who used to rent — many of whom have now bought those houses and installed basic amenities, such as inside toilets, at their own expense — now find they are not eligible for any sort of grant-aid. Will he bear in mind problems like that?

Mr. Patten: I am aware of the problems facing people living in these ex-NCB houses in Lynemouth and the sort of problems that face Castle Morpeth district council. In our Green Paper on home improvements we have undertaken to look seriously at the possibility of extending the time within which repair grants can be paid from 1919 to some substantial period thereafter. We will look at that when we come to our conclusions on future legislation.

Mr. Favell: Can my hon. Friend tell the House what has happened to the Green Paper, because there has been a resounding silence for several months? Is there any reason why we should not introduce a loan system? Why should one taxpayer pay for the improvement to another taxpayer's home, regardless of whether or not the recipient has the wherewithal to pay?

Mr. Patten: In the immortal phrase, Ministers are still considering the responses to the Green Paper. I appreciate what my hon. Friend says about a loan system, but we must be chary about the introduction of any sort of loan system which could lead to back-door municipalisation by local authorities giving loans and taking a share in the equity. We are determined to make sure that our targeting of money for home improvement grants in any future system will be much sharper and will meet the needs of people who really need help.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister recognise that many councils are having problems, not only with houses built after 1919, but with repair grants for houses built before 1919? Will the Government take action to provide sufficient resources to stop the serious deterioration in our housing stock, which will reach crisis level if the Government do not act?

Mr. Patten: Repair grants at the beginning of the life of this Government amounted to about £500,000. I am happy to say that in the current year repair grants amount to some £150 million.

Rates

11. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the decision to enforce rate limits for 1986-87 upon rate levels in the affected authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: For all 12 authorities rate capped, rate bills will be lower than if those authorities had been free to spend as they wished. Of the 10 authorities in London and the metropolitan areas, five will have general rates lower than in 1985-86, and two a virtual standstill.

Mr. Holt: My right hon. Friend's news will be most welcome to all ratepayers in those authorities. What hope can I hold out to the people of Cleveland either that they will be rate capped or that the county will be abolished by this time next year?

Mr. Baker: I have no plans to abolish Cleveland. The answer to the question about rate capping is that it depends on what the budget is in relation to GREA. Neither Cleveland nor my hon. Friend's council, Langbaurgh, qualified for rate capping this year. However, I quite understand that many hon. Members would like their authorities to be rate capped in order to protect their ratepayers from such extravagence.

Mr. Chris Smith: What assessment has the Secretary of State made of the impact of ratecapping on rate and service levels in the rate-capped areas? In particular, how does he view the grossly inadequate provision that has been made to make up for the loss of GLC services in rate-capped London boroughs?

Mr. Baker: I believe that the hon. Gentleman asked a similar question about 12 months ago, when the leader of Islington council was saying that as a result of rate-capping last year there would be massive unemployment and a collapse of services. Islington was rate-capped last year and it has not proved to be the end of civilised life, as we know it, in Islington. Indeed, as a result of ratecapping this year the hon. Gentleman's ratepayers and electors will benefit from a reduction in rates of 18 per cent.

Mr. Nicholls: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one such extravagant council is Devon county council, which has just increased its rate by about 19·8 per cent.? The previous Conservative administration wanted an increase of only about 11 per cent. Will my right hon. Friend remind Devon's ratepayers that that increase was made because the alliance party is now, with Labour support, in control of the council? Should not people bear that moral in mind before they vote for the alliance?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is quite correct. I was in Devon about a fortnight ago when the rate was fixed. The council is now a hung authority. The alliance party is therefore calling the shots. As I have already said, when that happens, spending, staffing and rates all increase.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Secretary of State aware that for the majority of Cumbrians the most recent rate increases, which arise directly from cuts in Government grant, are greater than the tax reductions announced in yesterday's Budget? What is the point of robbing Peter to pay Paul?

Mr. Baker: The same hat fits in the case of Cumbria——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Answer the question about the Budget.

Mr. Baker: I shall answer the question about the Budget. Cumbria's budget next year shows an increase in expenditure of 16 per cent. As a result, rates are increasing by 36 per cent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Because the Government cut the grant.

Mr. Baker: No. With great respect, the hon. Gentleman should realise that if expenditure increases by 16 per cent. the ratepayers will have to pay.

Mr. Fallon: Is my right hon. Friend aware that county and district councils in the north-east are this year approving rate increases of between 10 and 20 per cent., and that as a result businesses are being driven out? When the north-eastern county councils launch their "state of the region" report on Friday, will they not once again attempt to blame the Government, although it is their own hypocrisy and humbug that is putting up the shutters on business in the north-east through excessive expenditure and a failure to bring spending into line with Government targets?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is correct. The figure for Darlington is up 20 per cent., and that is the generality for many of Durham's district councils. I urge all local authorities to restrain their expenditure. The amount of cash to be given in grant next year will be greater than the amount given this year. The rise in rate increases this year is due to very excessive expenditure. It is about time that district councils everywhere, particularly those in areas of high unemployment, realised the damage that they are doing to business.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Instead of making insupportable assertions about the effect of rate capping, is the Secretary of State prepared to talk to local authority associations before next year and perhaps obtain the support of the Audit Commission in an independent costing of local authority services? In that way, there would be no risk of setting a rate capping limit that was less than the real cost of delivering the services that we ask of authorities.

Mr. Baker: Once again, the hon. Gentleman made a similar comment last year, and tried to persuade us that Southwark, which is rate-capped, would suffer considerably. It has not done so. As a result of rate capping, the hon. Gentleman's electors will benefit from a 7 per cent. reduction in rates. Such savings are quite possible if local authorities are prepared to put their minds to it.

Dr. Cunningham: As the Government's own figures show that the effect of rate capping has been to bring £116·5 million worth of grant to the rate-capped authorities from all of the authorities, particularly the shire counties, is not the Government's claim to be protecting ratepayers under this Act simply false? If rates are being held down in a few authorities, as the Ministers claim, that is possible only at a cost to ratepayers in all other authorities around the country, and that is why rates in Tory-controlled Buckinghamshire are being increased by 30 per cent. this year. The Government are not protecting ratepayers, and to claim that they are is simply not honest.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman's second-in-command understands the rate system better than he does. Rate capping has been of considerable benefit to many authorities. For example, Lewisham, if it had gone ahead with its expenditure plans, would have suffered a rate increase of 67 per cent., while it will now have an increase of only 7 per cent. Hackney would have had an increase of 25 per cent., and there will now be a cut of 11 per cent. It is little wonder that many hon. Members representing other authorities would welcome the sort of benefit that rate capping gives to their hard-pressed ratepayers.

Housing (Share Ownership)

13. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the environment what information he has concerning the number of local authorities and housing associations which have offered shared ownership as a means of home ownership to their tenants.

Sir George Young: All local authorities, new towns, and registered housing associations are under a statutory obligation to offer shared ownership terms to their secure tenants who wish to buy their homes. In addition, they may sell housing on shared ownership terms to other buyers.

In England, between 1979 and September 1985, there have been 16,505 shared ownership sales by housing associations, 5,870 by local authorities, and 3,070 by new towns.

The number of sales by each local authority and new town corporation is published quarterly by my Department in "Local Housing Statistics."

Mrs. Bottomley: Has my hon. Friend any other plans to encourage shared-ownership as an effective way of helping those with limited means on to the ladder of home ownership?

Sir George Young: We have allocated £57 million to the Housing Corporation to make further progress with shared ownership schemes, and the building societies and other financial institutions are contemplating investing in this sector. It is worth reminding public sector tenants, who want to buy but whose income does not stretch to outright purchase, that they have a right to buy half their home and rent the other half, on the move up to full ownership as their incomes rise.

Mr. Pavitt: In developing the shared ownership of housing, is the Minister concerned about further developing the co-operative sector? In his relationship with the Housing Corporation, will the £57 million be allocated only to housing associations, or is some of it to be designated for co-operatives? When he next talks to the Housing Corporation, will he again seek to institute the co-operative sector, which was so successful but which was wound up just a few years ago?

Sir George Young: The figure that I mentioned was the allocation for shared ownership. There is a separate allocation for co-operatives. The Government are very keen to promote the notion of co-operatives. There are provisions in the Housing and Planning Bill which make further progress, and we shall be pursuing this with the Housing Corporation.

Mr. Rooker: Is the Minister aware that when shared ownership was invented as the half-and-half scheme by the Labour-controlled authority in Birmingham in the 1970s, it worked? This is a classic case of a scheme being taken on nationally, and, unfortunately, the Treasury has a hand in it. Can he do more to encourage the necessary Treasury guarantees to the rented element so that the building societies and others can get involved in shared ownership in the way that was intended originally?

Sir George Young: The Treasury takes a lot of blame for all sorts of things, but it is a little unrealistic to blame it for the failure to make faster progress with shared ownership. With the public sector, no guarantees are involved. There is a right to shared ownership by public sector tenants. As for the private sector, following the implementation of the Building Societies Bill, the societies are contemplating investing in this area, and discussions are going on to see how we can make faster progress and how we can ensure that there is commercial viability in shared ownership financed by the private sector.

Woodlands (Preservation)

14. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the conservation of rare species of flora and fauna in woodlands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Rare species of flora and fauna, and their habitats, are protected under the terms of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. In woodlands owned by the Forestry Commission, all rare species are recorded in forest district conservation plans. Where appropriate, the Forestry Commission has set up its own protection schemes.

Mr. Flannery: Is the Minister confident that under privatisation flora and fauna will be properly protected under the Act? I refer to a case that has just occurred in my constituency. A man who owned two small woods, called Coombes wood—he lives in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) — sold them to the Forestry Commission in 1958 for £200. He is poverty-stricken. He has just been offered them back by the Forestry Commission for £25,000. Does the Minister infer from that that whoever has £25,000 will acquire those two woods out of a love of flora and fauna and that such a person will defend them?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not sure how this relates to flora and fauna, but I have inquired into Coombes wood as I thought that the hon. Gentleman might be interested in it. I am told that they have no rare species and little conservation interest. Therefore, it is not relevant to this question.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that many ancient woods need to be coppiced if they are to preserve their flora and fauna? Is he also aware that this beneficial practice is often not undertaken because coppicing is not economic and that consequently it is difficult to develop markets for coppicing products?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right about the problems. They are not easy to solve. But project Silvanus, to which I referred earlier, is looking into that matter among others. It is not easy to solve the problem of the drop in demand for these small woods that are scattered throughout the country.

Dr. David Clark: Given that the main protection of flora and fauna comes under the SSSI scheme, will the Minister explain—as exemplified by his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), in an answer on 10 March about West Mercia — what happens if the Government decide that an area is an SSSI but later decide that it is not of national importance? Is it Government policy that here should be two types of SSSI—national and non-national?

Mr. Waldegrave: As the hon. Gentleman knows the Act inside-out, he is well aware that the 1981 Act requires Ministers, before making a nature conservation order, to be satisfied that the site concerned is of special interest and of national importance. When the public inquiry looked into the evidence relating to the site to which the hon. Gentleman referred, it came to the conclusion that it was not of national importance. I have no legal grounds on which to overrule the inspector's report.

River Thames

16. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government will promote and uphold the environment of the River Thames.

Mr. John Patten: The quality of the River Thames has improved significantly in recent years, and I expect this improvement to be sustained.

Mr. Jessel: As the River Thames, with its wild life, is a beautiful and highly-prised asset in the Twickenham area, is it not quite monstrous for the Thames water authority now to demand the power, without permission from the Government, to stop the flow of water over Teddington weir so that at low tide just below the weir the river could run dry? Will the Government insist on retaining the power in the hands of Ministers, who are democratically answerable to Parliament and the public?

Mr. Patten: The River Thames runs though my constituency as it does through my hon. Friend's, so I fully appreciate the need to guard the environment, water quality and flow of that river. But I hope my hon. Friend will appreciate that in the light of the forthcoming public inquiry — whenever it happens, although it is on the horizon—I cannot at this stage comment on the detail of what he said. However, knowing him, I suspect that the campaign will be as long, as loud and possibly as successful over this issue as it has been thus far over the Royal Military School of Music.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Minister aware that many people living in the Thames water authority area are seriously concerned about the effects of the privatisation of that authority because of the grave damage that that would cause to the environment and to the quality of the water and its implications for costs and the threat of water metering? Will he have none of this?

Mr. Patten: No, the Minister will have as much of it as he possibly can. Consumers in the Thames water authority area are looking forward very much to a privatised authority, I am sure, because, after all, it is the Thames water authority which this year is managing to get ahead with rises in water charges of approximately 3 per cent.

Dr. Glyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that when he brings in this legislation it will be a hybrid Bill, because the riparian owners, who are private individuals, will be involved?

Mr. Patten: Hybridity, I suspect, Mr. Speaker, is not a matter for me.

Rates

17. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to amend the Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) (Rates) Order 1986, to include the city of Leicester district council; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): While I understand my hon. Friend's views about the appalling rate increase being proposed by Leicester city council, that council did not meet the criteria for selection for rate limitation in 1986-87 and could not therefore be included in the order recently approved by the House.

Mr. Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend accept that I feel great and personal disappointment at that most unsatisfactory answer? Will she also accept that the citizens of Leicester consider it outrageous for the city council to bring in an 80 per cent. rate rise, which is 45·5p in the pound? Will she further accept that the money that the city council is spending is excessive—more than £150,000 on public relations, £13,500 on renaming Nelson Mandela park and £7,000 on twinning with Nicaragua? Does she realise that the people in Leicester want to get on with living a decent life, but that the Labour party is doing everything in its power to cripple industry, levy very high rates on all businesses and put on individual ratepayers an addition of more than £30 each year?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am sure that the House appreciates the outrage and indignation of my hon. Friend. Unfortunately for the ratepayers of Leicester, they are not within the selection criteria for this year, but I remind him that Leicester was rate-capped last year and the ratepayers then benefited considerably from this system.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister not aware that it was the rate-capping of Leicester last year that directly resulted in the likely increase in rates, and that the Leicester city council is doing a first-class job, in spite of the Government's attacks and in the teeth of the voluble, obsessive and despicable attacks by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels)?

Mrs. Rumbold: I have been interested to hear the other side of the case for Leicester, but I do not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman, because if Leicester increased its spending by no more than the rate of inflation it would get 33 per cent. more grant this year, and that would be extremely generous. But, like most other councils, the more Leicester increases its spending, the less grant it will receive.

Planning Applications

18. Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning applications were dealt with by officers of regional branches of his Department in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Tracey: Sixty-six planning proposals were called in for decision by the Secretary of State, and 625 planning appeals were recovered for decision by him in 1985. My hon. Friend will know that lesser planning appeals are dealt with by a corps of inspectors.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is deep unease in some quarters that his Department is all too readily rubber-stamping the decisions of his regional officials, often in environmentally sensitive cases? Could there not be a better system of double checking where sensitive environmental issues arise?

Mr. Tracey: I assure my hon. Friend that we are very sensitive in the Department to environmental issues. As he will know, we have recently called in one very sensitive issue in his constituency.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that the only place in Britain where a house can be built without planning permission is in the enterprise zone in Workington? Is that not an abuse of enterprise zones, and why are regional officials not active in preventing further development from taking place? Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that a housing estate is being built in the Workington enterprise zone, and does he intend to intervene to stop it?

Mr. Tracey: Enterprise zones were set up with the objective of creating enterprise. The boundaries were agreed by the local authorities. Do I take it that the hon. Gentleman is anti-enterprise, like the rest of the Labour party?

Derelict Land

19. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will report progress on initiatives to tackle derelict land.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Under this Government the expenditure on derelict land grants has more than doubled in real terms. An area roughly the size of Wembley stadium is now being reclaimed every working day.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the Government's initiatives and their record, especially on urban development grant. Does my right hon. Friend see these grants as yet another mechanism for protecting green belt land? Will he look sympathetically, in the light of the proven success in the London docklands and on Merseyside, of extending the urban development corporation concept as a way of dealing with dereliction?

Mr. Baker: I entirely agree that the pressure on the green belt, not only in London but in all the other main conurbations, is considerable. Since coming to office we have extended the green belt to 4·5 million acres—roughly the size of Wales. There are pressures on the green belt all the time. The presumption is against development in the green belt. To accommodate the pressure for land, we must reclaim more derelict and under-used land in our cities. I am glad to say that we have increased expenditure from £24 million a year to, I believe, about £80 million this year. I consider that that is money very well spent.

Mr. Park: Will the right hon. Gentleman take on board the fact that, by considering a complete city when one is looking into derelict land, one stops the development of derelict areas in the inner cities? I refer particularly to the possible development of the Foleshill gasworks site in my constituency, which development is continually turned down by the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Baker: I shall certainly look into that particular case. I have diverted more of the flow of derelict land grant, together with the urban development grant, to the towns and inner cities, because obviously most of the derelict land is within their boundaries. I think that councils and developers all over the United Kingdom find that this money is very useful in bringing useless land back into productive use for housing, industry or commerce.

Local Government Finance

20. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in response to the consultative document "Paying for Local Government."

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend and I have both received a number of written representations and many more informal ones. I am generally very encouraged by what I have heard.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend agree that by providing a much fairer basis for distributing the costs of local services among those who use them, the proposal for a community charge will bring tremendous benefits to single-person households, and especially pensioners?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right. It will bring about a much closer connection between the use of services and paying for services. That is the objective of the whole operation.

Mr. Straw: Is the hon. Gentleman not ashamed of his proposal for a poll tax, which will cut the tax burden on the wealthiest in society, but, as the Green Paper makes clear, force up house prices and increase the burden of taxation on the poorest in the community, especially the young unemployed? Can the hon. Gentleman name any other major Western country that uses any tax as crude and regressive as a poll tax? If this is not a tax on the right to vote, why does the hon. Gentleman propose to use the electoral register to enforce it?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman should read the Green Paper. We do not propose to use the electoral register. The tax will relate the use of services to paying for services. The misuse of the local government finance systems for all the types of social engineering purposes in which the Labour Party delights has ruined the whole local government finance system and made it very complex.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend believe that the real benefits of this excellent measure have yet to permeate either to the Opposition or to the people at large? Does he agree that the essential fairness of spreading the burden of local government finance to all who benefit from services will be readily appreciated when it is properly and fully explained?

Mr. Waldegrave: The Labour party is strong on criticism and weak on proposals, although it has made one proposal, which is to have a domestic revaluation on capital values. Perhaps when that permeates outside, the Labour party will find that it is not so satisfactory as it thinks.

Mount Pleasant Airport

21. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the airport at Mount Pleasant has now been completed; at what final cost; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The main runway and essential support facilities at Mount Pleasant were completed on time by April 1985 and brought into use. Work on the remaining facilities is proceeding well and they are being progressively completed and handed over to a programme agreed with the RAF. Given the size and complexity of this project, the final account will not be settled until some time after contract completion. The latest estimated cost is £303 million, plus £10 million for navigational aids, supplied by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Dalyell: What happens if one Skyhawk with spare parts supplied by the Americans gets through with French made Durandelle Matra anti-runway bombs and blows a little hole 5m deep and 2m in circumference in the concrete, which eventuality his Department has not properly assessed? What will happen then to the £310 million?

Sir George Young: The Property Services Agency, loyally and to the best of its ability, constructs runways to the specifications of the Ministry of Defence. I shall bring to the attention of my right hon. Friend the pertinent comment which the hon. Member has just made.

GCHQ

3.30 pm

Mr. Denis Healey (Leeds, East) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent discussions with the trade unions over GCHQ.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Representatives of the Council of Civil Service Unions called on me yesterday at their request to discuss the Government's future intentions for staffing at GCHQ. I explained that the Government's decisions affecting GCHQ had been taken in the interests of national security to ensure that GCHQ's operations would, in future, be free from disruption. That objective had been achieved and there was no change in the Government's basic policy. The Government intended that this policy be applied as sympathetically as possible in individual cases.

Over 99 per cent. of GCHQ staff members accepted the revised terms of service. There is, however, a small number of union members at GCHQ who, from the outset, have not accepted the revised terms and conditions of service; they are the so-called B and C optants. They have been offered alternative jobs or premature retirement on redundancy terms.

A few of the staff who originally accepted the revised conditions of service and resigned from union membership, the so-called A optants, have subsequently rejoined. It follows from this that they are in breach of their conditions of service. In all fairness to the overwhelming majority who accepted and continued to honour these terms, they have been asked to honour their original commitment by resigning from the unions they have rejoined. If they fail to so do, they will be subject to disciplinary procedures.

The union representatives asked me yesterday whether these staff would be liable to dismissal as a result of disciplinary proceedings. I informed them that disciplinary matters at GCHQ were, of course, the responsibility of the director of GCHQ and that he had informed the head of the Civil Service that he did not regard dismissal as an appropriate penalty in the proposed proceedings for those who had rejoined the union in the circumstances of the past months, unless there were factors of which he was unaware. I stressed the importance of this explanation which was welcomed by the union representatives.

For all but the small number of people to whom I have so far been referring, the restructuring at GCHQ, designed to meet the special requirements of that organisation, is of course going ahead in consultation with the Government Communications Staff Federation. This will bring real benefit not only to the management of the operation but also to the overwhelming majority of GCHQ staff who have, I repeat, accepted the revised terms of service.

Mr. Healey: Can the Foreign Secretary explain to the House his dogged determination to continue shooting himself in the foot on this issue? After all, the wounds which he caused himself two years ago must still be causing him some discomfort. Can he explain why, two years after failing to carry out the fearful threat which he made to loyal members of GCHQ who had exercised their natural right to belong to trade unions, he suddenly revived the threat a few days ago and now has withdrawn it five days later? Can he explain that extraordinary conduct, which really has made him a laughing stock in the country and has also made him extremely offensive in the trade union movement?

Finally, now that The Lancet has published devastating evidence showing that the use of the polygraph, which I believe the right hon. and learned Gentleman has introduced into GCHQ, is much more likely to incriminate innocent people than to detect the guilty, will he now withdraw that American technological gimmick and treat the members of GCHQ as the honest and dedicated public servants they are?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I join the right hon. Gentleman in at least one thing—in paying tribute to the devotion with which the overwhelming majority of staff at GCHQ have continued to serve throughout the changes that have taken place. I repudiate his suggestion that today's question, or anything else that we have been concerned with, has anything whatever to do with the polygraph, which has not been introduced at GCHQ. He will remember that it was the subject of a recommendation by the Security Commission some years ago.

I also acknowledge that the only other observation that the right hon. Gentleman made was to select from his ample repertoire two or three terms of vulgar abuse. He has made no points of substance, because the Government have achieved their basic objective at GCHQ, which was to free that organisation from the threat of future disruption while dealing sympathetically with the individuals concerned.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): I have supported all those in GCHQ who have suffered greatly over the past two years since that unfortunate debate, when the matter first came to the attention of the House, which I described as shameful—something which I can never withdraw. But it is reasonable to welcome the flexibility which has been introduced into the situation at GCHQ, some might consider at a slightly later hour. I welcome the statement made by my right hon. and learned Friend. It is right that the matter in its fullest content should remain on the table until after the European Court has come to some decision. I hope then that the revision of the situation can take place in a more reasonable and sensible context. I share the thoughts that have been expressed on the misery and the damage that has been done to family upon family in my constituency. It gives me no pleasure to say it. But it is a disgrace and it should not have happened at the beginning at all. But it is not unreasonable to pay some tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend for making a full and reasonable statement which is far more flexible than we have ever seen before.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because I fully understand, and have always understood, the extent to which this matter, which is of great importance to national security, has also involved difficult considerations for individuals which my hon. Friend, as one of the Members of Parliament closely concerned, has always had in mind. I acknowledge with gratitude the tribute that he has paid to the good sense of my statement today, which affords a reasonable basis for stability at GCHQ consistent with the continued safeguarding of national security.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Why does the Foreign Secretary keep denying that morale has been grievously injured at GCHQ? Will he give the House the figures of the turnover of staff in the past two years compared with any previous two years that he cares to choose, which will demonstrate that what has been said on both sides of the House is true? Does he agree that the most constructive thing that he could do now is give a categorical assurance of no dismissals at GCHQ in order to produce total stability there?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have nothing to add in respect of that last matter to what was said at the meeting yesterday which was concerned with that small group of people who had rejoined in the circumstances prevailing in recent months. On the more general question I must tell the right hon. Gentleman that I do not have statistics immediately available, but I understand that recruitment at GCHQ has been on a reasonable basis. There have been no problems, save in respect, as always, of certain highly specialised grades. That is one of the reasons why restructuring of the grades and pay structures at GCHQ is now being undertaken at the request of the staff federation.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this has been an unfortunate saga? However, looking to the future, which is what we all ought to do, can he assure the House that the new structure will properly provide for safeguarding the position and legitimate interests of the employees at this headquarters?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that observation. I can assure him that the restructuring which is taking place at GCHQ is designed to improve the operation of the headquarters as is necessary and improve the pay and conditions of the staff, as can be achieved by restructuring from about 100 grades to about 15 grades in rather different circumstances. That restructuring is available for all those who are serving at GCHQ on the new terms and conditions of service.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): The Foreign Secretary has paid tribute to the loyalty of the people at GCHQ. Does he not realise that this disgraceful episode in the Government's record will not be wiped out until every member of GCHQ who desires to join a Civil Service trade union shall be free to do so without fear of intimidation, disciplinary action or dismissal?

Sir Geofrey Howe: I recognise that the view asserted by the right hon. Gentleman, with his characteristic clarity, is a view strongly held. However, alongside that we must set the Government's clear conviction that it was necessary to make changes in the terms and conditions of service at GCHQ in order to assure continuity of operation in that organisation. It is easy now to remember that in the two years between 1979 and 1981 continuity of operation at GCHQ was interrupted seven times, over 10,000 working days were lost and, on one occasion, 25 per cent. of the staff were involved. That is the background against which we took our decision, putting ourselves in line incidentally, with that of a number of other members of the Western Alliance.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Although GCHQ comes under a civil Department, is it not in reality an essential arm of the national defence? That being so, and although I am a trade unionist myself—[Laughter.]—which the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) probably is not—may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend whether it would not be more appropriate to have some form of staff federation than a politically oriented trade union organisation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I acknowledge the force of the point made by my hon. Friend. It is for precisely that reason that the Government Communications Staff Federation has now been formed at GCHQ. It is in response to that federation that the current changes are being undertaken. My hon. Friend is quite correct.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Did we understand the Foreign Secretary to say that, despite the announcement by the Prime Minister two years ago, the polygraph is not to be introduced at Cheltenham?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman will recall that, following the recommendations of the Security Commission after the Prime case, recommendations were then made for experimental tests to be carried out. There have been no final recommendations as a result of those tests. There is no introduction of the polygraph at GCHQ now.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that most people in this country would consider that the first duty of any Government is to protect national security. In the light of what my right hon. and learned Friend has outlined today, can he guarantee that that will take place?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of the importance of national security. It was, indeed, for that reason that the original decision was taken and is being upheld.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Why does not the Foreign Secretary come clean and admit that the reason why he withdrew the Prime Minister's threat to sack trade unionists at GCHQ was that he knew that there would be massive solidarity action by the rest of the trade union movement the moment one trade unionist was sacked? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that the real issue is the restoration of trade union rights at GCHQ, and that if he does not restore them, the next Labour Government certainly will?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I recognise that this is an issue on which different opinions are held in different parts of the House. I recognise that that is the policy to which the Labour party is committed. It is our policy, which has been implemented, to secure the withdrawal of trade unionism from GCHQ, and that policy has been carried through and accepted by 99 per cent. of the membership. No doubt that is one of the issues that will be relevant at the next election.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): To what extent have the Government achieved their objective of ending union membership at GCHQ? Is it a fact that 99 per cent. of the people at GCHQ have accepted that approach?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is precisely the point that I have just made. The Government have achieved their basic objective, which was to free the GCHQ organisation from the threat of future disruption, and over 99 per cent. of the staff have accepted the new conditions.

Mr. Bob Edwards (Wolverhampton, South-East): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that, at a meeting of the

[Mr. Bob Edwards]

Assembly of the Council of Europe, a respected Swiss Member of Parliament suggested that the whole British delegation should be removed because of this massive violation of human rights? Should we not be ashamed that such a situation should ever arise?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am not aware of the point raised by the hon. Gentleman, but I have no doubt that several people have expressed a diversity of views on the matter. The Government feel no sense of shame about it, having taken steps to protect national security at an important security agency in line with steps adopted by several of our allies in the Western Alliance.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the tact and diplomacy with which he has proceeded so far. Does he have any evidence in the past two years that those who have retained union membership have constituted any threat to national security? Secondly, will my right hon. and learned Friend leave the situation as it is at the moment until the European Court of Human Rights has pronounced on the matter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The first question raised by my hon. Friend relates to details about some individuals. I cannot advance evidence that the individuals concerned have been guilty of any misconduct of the sort about which my hon. Friend complains. That is no part of my case. With regard to my hon. Friend's second point, the announcement that I have made is intended to provide for the stability and security of arrangements at GCHQ for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): But does not the Foreign Secretary accept that the saga of GCHQ has already done enormous damage to national security, in the attention that it has drawn to the operations that are carried out there and the harm that it has caused to the morale of the staff working there? Before the matter comes before the European Court of Human Rights, and before we have a further damaging episode in this terrible story, will not the right hon. and learned Gentleman think again?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's general view of the matter. He must remember that it may never come before the European Court of Human Rights, because the case has not yet been accepted.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): When the right hon. and learned Gentleman comes to contemplate his sins of omission and commission as he presents his moral passport to St. Peter, among his many achievements will he not come to consider this episode in his career as disgraceful and dishonourable and forced upon him by his limited and ignorant leader?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not think that when the time comes to present myself before the judgment of St. Peter I shall be much fortified by the advice of St. Andrew.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): What would my right hon. and learned Friend do if the employees who have rejoined a trade union at GCHQ were to grow in number and form a significant minority of the people working there? At that point, would my right hon. and learned Friend feel his original aim of preventing industrial disruption at GCHQ was threatened? What would he do about it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The point raised by my hon. Friend would postulate an entirely different situation from the present one. It was clear to everyone present at the meeting yesterday that the meeting was concerned with the small group who had rejoined in the circumstances of past months.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is it correct that a small number of people at GCHQ accepted the Government's money in return for certain obligations, and then appeared to renege on their obligations?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The money was made available specifically in the context of the removal of certain statutory rights at GCHQ. It is certainly the case that a small group, known as the A optant rejoiners, who had originally accepted the Government's offer, subsequently changed their minds and sought to rejoin the unions. In those circumstances we have made these announcements.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): If the Foreign Secretary's answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) about the continuity of operation from 1979 to 1981 is anything approaching the whole truth, why did he not make his announcement about trade unions until January 1984? Does he recollect that I tabled questions about GCHQ on 19 December 1983—long before most hon. Members had heard that there was a dispute? Why was a member of the intelligence services sent to a Labour party meeting on 12 January 1984 at Ardrossan Saltcoats to ask me clearly from where I had information about the sinking of that ship?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman please not go into the detail? We are dealing with the unions, nothing else.

Mr. Dalyell: Briefly, regarding the unions, was it not a dereliction of duty—if what the Foreign Secretary told my right hon. Friend about 1979-81 is anything like true—to do nothing about the matter until the spring of 1984? Why did he suddenly make the announcement without consulting his Cabinet colleagues?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has had his question answered many times on previous occasions. I cannot begin to recall now the questions that he asked three years ago on matters unrelated to this topic.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Mr. Healey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. [Interruption.] No, this is a point of order. You will recall, Sir, that during the last few minutes the Foreign Secretary has made two incompatible statements to the House. First, he said that the polygraph has not been introduced into GCHQ, and secondly that it has been introduced for experimental purposes and that the decision has not yet been taken whether it will be introduced permanently. Could you give him an opportunity to clear up the confusion, and to tell us which of those statements is true?

Mr. Speaker: I would be responsible only if the polygraph were introduced in the House. However, I shall allow the right hon. and learned Gentleman to respond.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is no possible mystery about what I said. I said that, on the recommendations of the Security Commission, a pilot scheme had been undertaken involving the polygraph, the results of which are still being carefully considered.

Immigration (Members' Representations)

3.53 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On a point of order on a matter relating to the rights of hon. Gentlemen and straight dealing with the House, Mr. Speaker. You may see on page 2394 of the Order Paper question No. 193 in the name of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) which was tabled yesterday to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 11 February to the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence)

"what representations he has received on the draft guidelines concerning representations made by right hon. and hon. Members in immigration cases; and whether he will make a statement."

Following that response, at the invitation of the Home Secretary, I together with my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) have had two meetings with the Home Secretary on behalf of my hon. Friends in the parliamentary Labour party.

On the second occasion the Home Secretary was accompanied by the Minister of State, the hon. and learned Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Waddington). Following the invitation of the Home Secretary and his statement about his wish for discussions, we had detailed discussions on this matter. When at the end of the second prolonged meeting, I asked the Home Secretary whether he would communicate with me on behalf of my hon. Friends before any further action was taken by him, the Home Secretary gave me a firm assurance that he would communicate with me on the outcome of my discussions with him before any action whatever was taken. The private office of the Home Secretary——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Could the right hon. Gentleman put a point of order to me, because I do not understand what all this is about?

Mr. Kaufman: I am coming directly to the question, Mr. Speaker. I have just been in communication with the private office of the Home Secretary. It has informed me that now—that is, after 3.30—a reply to the question of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North has been given, together with new draft guidelines which are presumably the outcome of discussions with hon. Members, including myself, yet no communication of any kind has been made to me by the Home Secretary about the outcome of those discussions. For the second time, therefore, we are faced with the situation, the previous occasion having been referred to in the planted question, of the Home Secretary ignoring the rights of the House, ignoring undertakings that he has given to hon. Members and acting unilaterally to provide new guidelines for the House.

This is a breach of faith with hon. Members. It is the latest episode in a shabby and discreditable story. I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether you will direct that, instead of behaving in this underhand way, the Home Secretary must come later today to the House of Commons and make a statement on his lack of plain dealing and his breach of faith.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman knows that I cannot give a direction to the Government on that matter. I notice that the question asks

"what representations he has received."

[Mr. Speaker]

I cannot read into that question anything that the right hon. Gentleman has said. We shall have to wait and see. In any event, it is not a matter for me.

BILL PRESENTED

FORESTRY BILL

Sir John Stradling Thomas, supported by Mr. Robin Corbett, Mr. John Corrie, Lord James Douglas-Hamilton, Mr. Marcus Fox, Dr. Mark Hughes, Sir Anthony Kershaw, Sir Peter Mills, Mr. Donald Stewart and Mr. Tom Torney, presented a Bill to empower the Forestry Commissionners to require the restocking of land with trees after unauthorised felling; and to increase the maximum number of members of regional advisory committees for conservancies designated by those Commissioners: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 18 April and to be printed. [Bill 112].

Opportunities for Young People

3.57 pm

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide employment and other opportunities for young people and for related purposes.

Last year, 1985, was International Youth Year. It was hardly taken up with driving enthusiasm by this Government, who all too often seem to set their face against the principal aims of International Youth Year, which were peace, participation and development. During 1985 it can be argued that the problems which International Youth Year should have addressed grew worse.

The Bill which I am seeking leave to introduce today aims in some small measure to remedy this and to provide some solutions which the Government refuse even to recognise. The principle of the Bill is to extend the opportunities which young people have to allow them to become active members of society rather than passive recipients of pre-packaged solutions. My Bill will therefore seek to give young people wider choice: choice over how they live their lives, choice over how they are governed and choice over how they earn a living.

First, my Bill provides for a youth charter, giving young people the right to be co-opted on to certain statutory bodies, governmental bodies and local authority sub-committees which take vital decisions that affect their lives. The charter will also provide for the establishment of a nationwide network of youth councils, run by young people for young people, giving them another way of making their opinions and priorities known.

Many of the young people whom I meet feel that they are shut out of the process and thinking of Government and that their views and needs are ignored. This youth charter, which is similar to that which my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) introduced last year, would make sure that young people are fully represented. [Interruption.]

Conservative Members may have noticed—I gather that they have from some of their mutterings—that several hundred young people have been visiting both Houses of Parliament. I am proud to be the leader of a party which encourages young people to take an active interest in parliamentary democracy. By giving young people a legitimate way of expressing their views and concerns, we shall be reducing the power of those on both the extreme Right and extreme Left to preach violence and confrontation in our society. The best way to defend democracy is to extend democracy, and that is what the Bill seeks to do.

The second element of the Bill is a package of measures to tackle youth unemployment. It is an evil in itself, but it is made doubly evil by the way in which it fuels the feelings of hopelessness and despair that drive so many young people in our large cities to vandalism, crime and drugs.

The need for legislation arises because we need far better training for young men and women. We need training that teaches real skills and leads to real qualifications. I accept that the YTS is improving, but the process is painfully slow and it needs speeding up.

We need further legislation to eliminate some of the abuses which are occurring and to ensure that the YTS and other Manpower Services Commission schemes, such as the community programme, provide real training and do not degenerate into the creation of work for work's sake. Only yesterday, I received confidential information that the MSC in the Leicester area has been giving instructions to reduce the training element in the community programme by 75 per cent. My Bill aims to stop that sort of thing from happening. It will also ensure that young women receive as good a choice of training opportunities as young men. At present, young women tend to be channelled into administrative and clerical posts while men hog the placements in manufacturing and maintenance work. There must be genuine equality of opportunity.

My Bill seeks to establish all these changes. It will establish a clear framework of vocational qualifications, make better provisions for monitoring the quality of the training that is being provided and ensure that the Equal Opportunities Commission is represented on regional and national MSC boards.

I recognise that there is no point in having a training strategy without an employment strategy. What value there could be in today's YTS is often sapped by the knowledge that all too often there is no job on offer at the end of the scheme, and that the training is merely a rite of passage to the dole queue. That is why in our Budget proposals, and in the alliance's "Worksearch" project, we have shown the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he could, if he were determined to do so and had the necessary political will, be creating employment. I deeply regret that once again yesterday he rejected our advice.

A further problem which young people face is poverty, and the Government have chosen to celebrate the end of International Youth Year by taking steps to make the problem worse. The Social Security Bill, which is currently in Committee, aims deliberately to pay young people, be they unemployed or disabled, a lower rate of benefit than those over 25 years of age. The proposal lacks all merit and logic, so my Bill contains a provision that the same rates of benefit should continue to be paid to everyone over 18 years.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield) rose——

Mr. Steel: The final element in my Bill is a simple but important proposal to amend the Education Act 1981 by placing a statutory duty on authorities to provide adequate training facilities for handicapped young people. For far too many such people, education and training ends at 16 years. My Bill will stretch this to 19 years, giving hope and encouragement to a small section of the community which does not fit in with the Government's Devil-take-the-hindmost approach.

Over the last year the problems facing young people have grown worse. Youth unemployment has remained persistently and disgracefully high. Britain's young people deserve better than the Government's hard-hearted indifference and my Bill contains specific proposals that would reverse this drift. This legislative start would set us back on the road to reason and many young people back on the road to hope.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Steel, Mr. A. J. Beith, Mr. David Alton, Mr. John Cartwright, Mr. David Penhaligon, Mr. James Wallace, Mr. Clement Freud, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Paddy Ashdown, Mr. Archy Kirkwood and Mr. Charles Kennedy.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. David Steel accordingly presented a Bill to provide employment and other opportunities for young people and for related purposes. And the same was read the First time and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 April and to be printed. [Bill 114.]

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I took great exception to the Leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Launderdale (Mr. Steel), saying time and time again that this was his Bill. The right hon. Gentleman did not even fetch the Bill. Instead, he sent one of his colleagues to bring it to him.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Gentleman had wanted to oppose the right hon. Gentleman's Bill, he could have done so.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [18 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national Debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;
(b) for refunding any amount of tax;
(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or
(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lawson.]

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 9792/85, Annual Economic Report 1985-86 and the unnumbered document, Annual Economic Report 1985-86 (final version as adopted by the Council).

4.5 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): When, by the weekend, the media froth has been blown away from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the 1986 Budget will be remembered for two characteristics. First, it will be remembered for its essential triviality. It did not even acknowledge, far less attempt to tackle, the three great crises now facing Britain, which are the crisis of unemployment, the crisis of poverty and the crisis of collapsing or collapsed manufacturing industry. That is the inheritance of the first five years of this Conservative Government.

The second characteristic of the Budget is its partiality. It is a divisive Budget. It is a Budget for part of the nation. It is a Budget for men and women with £200 a month to spend on share acquisition. It is a Budget for families who wish to manipulate large estates to avoid death duties. It is a Budget for the stockbrokers, who were seen on television yesterday afternoon going wild with delight when their stamp duty was cut by 50 per cent. Even the change in the basic rate of income tax, which was described yesterday by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as concentrating benefit on the great majority of ordinary taxpayers and not on the rich, has quite the opposite effect from that claimed by the right hon. Gentleman.

The family earning £5,000 a year will be 26p per week better off as a result of the change in the basic rate of income tax. The family on average earnings will be £1·22 better off per week and the family earning £50,000 a year will be £3·30 a week better off. The family living on unemployment benefit will be caught by the indirect tax changes and will be 55p a week worse off as a result of yesterday's Budget.

The basic pattern of Tory taxation policy remains the same: the rich pay less and the rest pay more. Conservative Members will remember that last year, at the Tory party conference, the Prime Minister spoke movingly about the tax problems of a nurse, a teacher and an engineering worker. Ever since then we have followed carefully the fortunes of the three examples that the right hon. Lady quoted. I can tell her—she must know this—that the three categories of people for whom she expressed so much concern last October are still paying more income tax now than they were before she was elected to power. They are paying more as a proportion of their earnings and more in terms of the gross sum than they are required to contribute.

The pattern of Tory taxes is easily described. For taxpayers on ten times the national average income, the tax bill is down by 22 per cent. For taxpayers on average earnings, the tax bill is up by between 1 and 3 per cent. This Conservative Government are the first Government this century to carry out a policy of redistribution by taking from the poor to give to the rich.

Once more the Chancellor has not paid the House the courtesy of attending this debate. If he had wanted to reverse that trend of taking from the poor and giving to the rich, he would not have altered the basic rate at all. His best course would have been to use his £1 billion either to cut unemployment or to increase child benefit. His second best course would have been either to raise the personal allowance or to introduce a reduced rate band. The Chancellor had five options on how he might use the £1 billion which he said yesterday he had found at his disposal. Of the five options, he chose the one which least helps the low wage earner.

The battle over taxation within the Tory party was won by the 1922 Committee and lost by social justice, and so was the battle over unemployment. I know that within the Cabinet and within the Conservative party itself there is a continuing argument about how the Chancellor's resources ought best to be used. It is worth describing to Members of the Conservative party who thought that those resources would be best used to reduce unemployment how the balance has turned out. The net cost of the entire jobs package in yesterday's Budget was less than £100 million. That is not as much as the Chancellor devoted to halving stamp duty and reducing capital transfer tax.

If that is the Chancellor's order of priorities, no wonder unemployment rises month by month and looks as if it will remain stubbornly, on honest figures, at 3·5 million or more at the time of the next general election. It is no wonder that the job start pilot schemes about which the noble Lord in another place will be saying a great deal on television this evening have produced only 70 jobs in total in nine areas. I understand that in one area the pilot scheme has created only one job, and that is the job of interviewing non-existent applicants for the pilot scheme.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that only part of the job start scheme is a £20 a week top-up? The other part is calling in and identifying the longer-term unemployed and giving them personal counselling and help. Is he not aware that 80 per cent. of those who go into that scheme think that the interview and the help are worth while?

Mr. Hattersley: I am aware that the scheme for identifying the long-term unemployed and giving them counselling and help is not only deeply patronising to the long-term unemployed, but demonstrates a deep ignorance of the problem. The problem is not that the long-term unemployed do not know how to find jobs; the problem is that there are no jobs to find. That is particularly true in the hon. Gentleman's area. The same thing applies to the job clubs, where, as I understand it, young people come together and discuss why it is that they are out of work. They know why they are out of work: it is because of Government policies.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The right hon. Gentleman says that only 70 jobs have so far been found by way of these pilot schemes. I am happy to be able to tell him that when I made a telephone call to my local jobcentre at Crawley, an area of the country in which there is relatively high employment, I found that out of 555 people interviewed, more than half had been found jobs.

Mr. Hattersley: I wish the same could be said for the area represented by the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). These schemes will help people who might well have got jobs anyway in areas where job opportunities already exist. The idea that the schemes will make a significant inroad into the unemployment levels typifies the paucity of Government thinking on this matter. It is all the more unacceptable to us because if the Government had chosen to do so we could have had a real jobs programme.

An additional reason why we might have had an effective jobs programme is the reduction in oil costs, which, whatever temporary inconvenience it causes to Britain and the Chancellor, offers the hope of increased world demand, increased world output and increased world trade. The Chancellor ought to have taken advantage of all those things to mend his ways and attempt an economic breakout.

The Chancellor was wholly wrong yesterday, and must know that he was wholly wrong, to say that as we have survived a reduction of 50 per cent. in oil revenues in 25 weeks we will easily be able to accommodate the reduction of the other 50 per cent. of our benefits in 25 years. The comparison is clearly absurd. The general cut in oil prices over the last three months helps all industrial countries by promoting trade. Therefore, it compensates economies like ours which both use and produce oil. On the other hand, the gradual exhaustion of British oil simply harms Britain, and the certainty that one day our oil will run out makes an industrial policy vital.

The Chancellor fails to recognise that a fall in oil prices means that this is the moment when an industrial policy should be used to maximum benefit. British manufacturing industry should be able to take maximum advantage of the new opportunities that a reduction in costs and an increase in trade provide. Unfortunately, because of the ravages of the last six years, that will not be so. The decline in manufacture has left us perilously dependent on oil revenue—vulnerable to the loss of income, instead of poised to take advantage of the fall in oil prices.

The improvement in manufacturing productivity about which the Chancellor tells us day after day, and in speech after speech, has been achieved at the expense of a disastrous loss of capacity and disastrous losses of output and jobs. Unless the Government change course we will remain incapable of taking advantage of what ought to be a stimulus to growth. I fear that the chances of that change in course taking place are gloomily remote, not least because the Government in general, and the Chancellor in particular, seem wholly incapable of recognising the failures of the last six years.

Many of the improved prospects which we should now begin to exploit, and which the Chancellor was happy to brag about in his speech yesterday, are the direct result of economic changes which the Government first opposed and then failed to prevent. I repeat that I see the reduction in oil prices as offering us a new long-term prospect. That price reduction was welcomed by the Prime Minister in her party speech on Saturday, but three months ago the Government's plans for tax cuts were based wholly on the hope that oil prices would stay firm and stay high.

A depreciation of sterling, which would make our exports more competitive, has been held back by the Government. When my right hon. Friends and I have urged a depreciation and an end to the fall in competitiveness to which over-high exchange rates lead, we have been attacked and excoriated by the Government. Yet now that has become an incentive to exporters and one of the Chancellor's achievements. For far too long the exchange rate was held above its proper level by ruinously high interest rates.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): What is the proper level?

Mr. Hattersley: I should have known better than to give way to the hon. Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] The proper level is the level at which British exporters can maximise their sales potential. The CBI and everybody involved in manufacturing industry will say that the rates have been held artificially high for far too long by the Government's intentional policy of keeping interest rates high as well.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Even now, interest rates in this country are far too high. Even now, interest rates stand at a level that penalises industrial investment and pauperises many owner-occupiers. Today, interest rates stand at a level that was inconceivable before the Conservative party was elected, and at a level that is much higher than the level of real interest in our competitor economies. That is wholly true——

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I shall not give way in the middle of a sentence.

The height of our interest rates and the extent of the burden that they place on industry and owner-occupiers remain intolerable despite the 1 per cent. reduction in base rate that was announced this morning. During the debate Conservative Members will no doubt cheer and welcome a real interest rate of 8 per cent., but they will merely be showing their relief that a tragedy has turned simply into a disaster.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Our interest rate was higher than the rates in our competitor economies a month ago. Those countries reduced their interest rates, while we reduced ours belatedly to a point at which we are still running 1 or 2 per cent. higher than theirs in real terms. This morning the interest rate was managed down by the Bank of England to help the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Ryder rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Indeed, I told the Chancellor of the Exchequer that that would happen during last Thursday's

[Mr. Hattersley]

Question Time. The interest rate was managed down this morning, in order to help the Chancellor, by the Bank of England cutting the dealing rate by 1 per cent., but it should have been managed down a month ago to help the British economy.

Yesterday the Chancellor of the Exchequer once again dangled before us the prospect of massive tax cuts. It is difficult to focus on his long-running fantasy, but it is clear that if there are massive tax cuts next year they will be wholly dependent upon, and financed by, the sale of British Gas, British Telecom and other national assets. Yesterday the Chancellor spoke about how he had held down the total of Government spending and Government indebtedness. By a slip of the memory, or some error in his notes, he did not mention the £4·75 billion that he intends to obtain from asset sales. The truth is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has financed his Budget deficit by selling national assets.

Selling assets and gilts is simply an alternative way of financing a Budget deficit. However, when, as is the Government's practice, assets are priced below their true value and priced, if the Government are true to form, at about £3 billion below their true value to ensure a quick sale, that is not a prudent way of raising revenue, but is a wilful waste of taxpayers' money.

The Chancellor apparently wants to know whether I wish to increase the Budget deficit. I have no complaint about his increasing the Budget deficit. But why, having increased the Budget deficit, did the right hon. Gentleman choose to use it to finance tax cuts rather than jobs? Why does the right hon. Gentleman have such an obsession with people's capitalism and so little interest in people's jobs?

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Without asset sales—which a Labour Government would not have—next year's PSBR would be projected at £12 billion. That would be the starting point for the right hon. Gentleman. How much higher could he safely go?

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give the figure in a moment. For the time being, the answer is "Considerably," and I shall justify that shortly. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman at least, if not the Chancellor of the Exchequer, understands that asset sales and other means of supporting the national debt involve exactly the same economic operation.

Before dealing precisely and directly with the question of the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples), I must deal with the Government's plans for tackling the unemployment crisis. The planned increase in all the special employment schemes announced yesterday amounts to 90,000 jobs. That is 90,000 on an unemployment total which, by honest calculation, is nearer 4 million than 3 million. We are talking about 90,000 jobs, when unemployment rose by 130,000 in January alone. Similar schemes to those announced by the Chancellor were announced last year. Indeed, yesterday the Chancellor persisted in including the schemes announced last year in the figures that he gave, as if they were all for this year. Since the announcement of those schemes, unemployment has risen by 228,000. Indeed, every time the Government announce a new remedy for unemployment, unemployment increases.

There was a time when transferring assets from public to private use would automatically reduce unemployment, but unemployment has increased. There was a time when reducing inflation would reduce unemployment, but unemployment has increased. There was a moment when appointing Lord Young as a Minister would reduce unemployment, but unemployment has increased. The truth, as typified by Lord Young's appointment, is that the Government are engaged not in an assault on the level of unemployment but in an assault on the unemployment statistics.

Even the Government's plans for changing the married man's tax allowance are calculated to keep married women off the labour market. The Government now believe that what no doubt in their private moments they call a pool of unemployment of 3 million or more is inevitable. That is not our view. We believe that we can begin to put Britain back to work, but we can do so only if we escape from two debilitating prejudices. The first is the obsession with the PSBR—an affliction which so grievously affects the Government. It is now generally accepted that the PSBR is a wholly inadequate measurement of Government borrowing. Setting policy by the ratio of Government borrowing to national income is a far more responsible way of determining the fiscal stance and is the method employed in many economies more successful than ours. Were we to employ that technique, I believe that it would make us more clearly understand that there are times in the life of an economy, as there are in the life of a family or of a company, when borrowing for investment is the prudent option, and that failing to borrow is the profligate alternative.

We must abandon the second prejudice—which in one sense is not so much a prejudice as a pretence—that unemployment costs nothing. It costs the Exchequer £21 billion a year in lost taxes and benefits paid. It costs the economy a further £30 billion a year in lost output. Perhaps more important is the simple fact that to reject borrowing as a means of financing a massive job-creating programme is to accept unemployment remaining at 3 million or 3·5 million for the rest of this decade and beyond. That is the choice, and the Government do themselves no credit by pretending that they have some other way of gradually putting Britain back to work. They have not. On present policies, there will be no significant fall in unemployment before the next election or beyond.

The drive to create jobs could begin now. There should be public sector capital programmes doing vital and necessary work, at a net cost of £1 billion a year, which would reduce unemployment by 67,000 in two years. There should be public sector service employment, making additions to the nursing, midwifery and home-help service, reducing unemployment by 100,000 in two years, and costing a further £1 billion. There should be reductions in national insurance, something which was flaunted by the Government two months ago and then abandoned, at a net cost of £1·5 billion a year. We could reduce unemployment by 200,000 in two years. There ought to be a job guarantee scheme based on that recommended by the all-party Select Committee on Employment, which would build up, as it calculates, to a cost of £3·3 billion, and which would result in a reduction in registered unemployed of 750,000 in three years.

The cost of the proposals is less than 1·6 per cent. of gross domestic product, and it is wholly consistent with a broadly stable debt to income ratio. That ought to have been the central theme of the Chancellor's budget.

The second theme ought to have been help for those members of the community who need most help—the pensioners, the families, and the long-term unemployed. If, as I and as my party believe, the national resources that are available were concentrated, to the exclusion of other objectives, on the reduction of long-term unemployment, the anti-poverty programme — the schemes to help pensioners, families and the long-term unemployed— would be self-financing, and would have to be financed from within the tax and benefit system itself — by redistribution.

Pensions should be increased by £5 a week for a single pensioner and by £8 for a married couple. Those increases would more than restore the link between pensions and earnings. Child benefits should be increased by £3, and supplementary benefit, at the full rate, should be made available to the long-term unemployed.

It is intolerable that long-term unemployment, which denies those who have been out of work for a year or more their skills, often their self-respect, and their hope, should also in the end deny them the proper rate of unemployment benefit. We would, and could, provide it, along with help for the pensioners and for families, at a cost of £3·45 billion. That would include the additions to supplementary benefit, to ensure for the pensioners that what we gave with one hand we would not take away with the other.

Fortunately, that sum is readily available. While the nation as a whole is paying an annual tax bill of £30 billion higher than it was in 1979, the richest 5 per cent. are paying less. The richest 5 per cent. are paying £3·64 billion a year less than they were when the Prime Minister was elected, when she promised to cut everybody's taxes, but not the taxes of the richest 5 per cent.

Those cuts have not come simply in income tax alone. There have been a wide variety of concessions to the richest 5 per cent. There were 15 concessions in 1980 alone, and the concessions to this favoured group have averaged five a year throughout the life of this Government.

Yesterday, on a quick calculation, there were nine. I make a simple point, which I think Conservative Members may find it difficult to dispute. The richest 5 per cent. of the population should at least be making their proper contribution to the national well-being. It is intolerable that when poor people are paying more, rich people are paying less.

During this three-day Budget debate I shall look forward to hearing an argument which says that we should reduce the taxes of the rich and increase the taxes of men and women on average earnings. It is intolerable that the wealthy should have been uniquely benefited in this way, not least because tax cuts cannot be isolated from the rest of the policy. By cutting the taxes of the rich, the Government have been forced to hold back benefits from pensioners, from families and from the long-term unemployed.

Taxpayers earning £50,000 a year or more, have received from the Government an annual tax reduction of £1 billion, while pensioners are living on £40 a week, and dying from hypothermia because they cannot afford their fuel bills.

The truth is that there cannot be any escape from the choice. We must decide whether cutting the tax on unearned income, or increasing child benefit, is the most important objective. We must decide whether abandoning capital gains tax and capital transfer tax, or helping pensioners, is the first priority. For us the priority is the pensioner, the long-term unemployed, and the child.

I end on a charitable note towards the Chancellor. I want to conclude on the wild assumption that his predictions of economic success—so wrong in the past —will this year be justified. Even if I make the wild hypothesis that the great breakthrough that he has recognised has come, that continued expansion of the economy is certain, and that continuing improvement in prosperity is not now in dispute, how will those successes affect the pensioners, the unemployed and the poor?

We know that they will not affect pensioners at all, for they have formally been excluded from any improvement in national prosperity, by the break in the link between pensions and earnings. We know that the number of families living in poverty increased by 1·5 million between 1979 and 1981, and then the Government stopped counting. We know from the pattern of taxes which the Chancellor has proposed, and from the holding down of benefits for which he is responsible, that the number of families living below the National Health Service poverty line will increase.

We also know that, despite his claims, unemployment at the next election will be 3·5 million to 4 million on the honest calculation that was made by previous Governments before the figures were manipulated.

The truth is that for those groups — even if the Chancellor's shop-soiled braggadocio turns out to be true —there is nothing in this Budget and nothing in this Government's policy. The truth is that the Chancellor has wilfully failed the pensioners, the long-term unemployed, the families and the poor. By failing them he has failed the nation, and the nation will make him pay the price.

4.40 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) finished with a forecast— rather a more shaky forecast than one is accustomed to hearing from him. I can understand why, because his record on forecasts and on understanding the underlying economic situation, has always been shaky. Just before the last election, he predicted that with our policies, inflation would soon be rising to double figures. It never did. It never has.

Only two months ago in the House the right hon. Gentleman raised under Standing Order No. 10 the urgent issue that there would be an imminent increase in real interest rates, which he described as being a matter that is directly within the responsibility of the Government. There was not, and the House knows today that the actual change is in the reverse direction.

So it was in approaching this Budget. Although the dramatic fall in oil prices has been good for British industry and for our economy, the right hon. Gentleman thought—there was a hint of it in what he said today— that it was really bad news for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, because of the known and substantial loss of oil tax revenue. He hoped that that would have completely destroyed any room for manoeuvre in this Budget—or that, if my right hon. Friend wished to find scope for tax cuts or other new initiatives, that could be achieved only by substantial increases in indirect taxes over and above inflation, especially on petrol.

[Mr. John MacGregor]

That is no doubt why the right hon. Gentleman encouraged his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to make the theme of his response yesterday jam tomorrow, because he thought that the Chancellor was in a jam today. But as the Budget unfolded, it became clear that my right hon. Friend was not in a jam. He was able to reduce both direct taxes and the borrowing forecast for next year, thus maintaining prudent and responsible control over the economy, without any increase in the real burden of indirect taxes — thereby ensuring that the benefit of the recent drop in oil prices remains with both industry and private motorists.

My right hon. Friend was able to announce a series of imaginative and innovative measures to promote enterprise, to spread share ownership and to help charities. He was able to agree to additional employment measures on top of the very large sums that we are spending already within our planning totals. Because of this prudent management, we now learn that interest rates have come down by one percentage point today, bringing further benefits to businesses and to families throughout the land.

The right hon. Gentleman talked a great deal about real interest rates, but the combination under the Labour Government was very high interest rates and even higher inflation. That combination was lethal.

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. Gentleman makes this point every week, I ask him a question every week, and perhaps he will give us the answer today. Was the real interest rate ever as high under the Labour Government as it is now?

Mr. MacGregor: There was a very simple reason. The right hon. Gentleman's Government had such an enormously high level of inflation, and the right hon. Gentleman always tells us that high inflation destroys jobs.

All this is a direct result of the underlying strength of the economy. The right hon. Gentleman called the Budget staggeringly trivial. He got it staggeringly wrong, because he staggeringly misunderstood the situation. He concentrated a great deal on manufacturing industry, so I shall respond to that point. However, we all recognise that there are many other aspects of the economy that are every bit as significant, including the £6 billion a year in invisible earnings that the City brings in and which the right hon. Gentleman denigrates so much.

Let us look at the record on industry and at some of the critical factors. The real rate of return of industrial and commercial companies rose to 8 per cent. in 1985—the highest level since 1973. Manufacturing profitability also reached its highest point since 1973. One of the most devastating symptoms of Britain's industrial decline in the 1970s was that we had far too low a rate of profitability.

The Opposition parties talk much of more investment going into research and development. This increase in profitability will enable that to happen. To judge from the record of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member, he and his colleagues may not think that company profitability matters and that it is somehow wrong for real profitability to return to this country. It is not wrong; it is essential. It is the engine of future investment and jobs, and of confidence among those with the capital available to invest in the future of this country.

It is quite clear that the Labour party simply does not understand that the return of profitability, and real rates of return at decent levels to industry and commerce, is one of the signs that the real economy is getting stronger. The signs can also be seen in investment. Total fixed investment rose by 8 per cent. in real terms in 1984 to reach an all-time high. Some further increase is expected to have occurred in 1985, and we expect another 5 per cent. increase in 1986. Total business investment went up 10 per cent. in 1984 and a further 2 per cent. in 1985. It is expected to grow 5 per cent. more in 1986. I can understand why the right hon. Gentleman does not want to listen to good news. This investment is happening now, and every increase in investment means that the economy is getting stronger.

The signs of what is really happening can also be seen in the balance of trade. The current account surplus was £3 billion in 1985—the sixth successive year of surplus. Since 1981, United Kingdom manufacturing exports in volume terms have increased their share of world trade. We are taking on the competition and matching it. That is a measure of our new strength, and what a welcome change it is from the story of earlier years, when our share of world trade in manufacturing was constantly declining.

Underlying these successes are the real changes that companies have made to become competitive. The number of industrial disputes in 1985 was the lowest for 50 years, and productivity—where we have lagged behind for so long — is rising steadily. Since 1979, manufacturing productivity has increased by around 3·5 per cent. every year, compared with 1 per cent. between 1974 and 1979. This means that our productivity has improved more than in France, Germany and the United States—more signs that we are again getting stronger.

Above all, we must never forget the essential part played by the reduction in inflation achieved by this Government's policies.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Will not the right hon. Gentleman give appropriate recognition to the fact that the rise in productivity is generally taken to be a consequence of producing 6 per cent. fewer goods with 25 per cent. fewer workers?

Mr. MacGregor: Since 1981, after the world recession had been got out of the way and we had dealt with the inheritance we faced, productivity has increased even more, with increases in manufacturing output every year. The right hon. Gentleman still fails to understand the significance for the long-term strength of the economy of achieving that level of increased productivity.

The devastating effect of high and fluctuating rates of inflation on industry, trade, commerce and confidence —and hence on jobs—can scarcely be measured. That is why the reductions in inflation are so important to the long-term strength of the economy. The right hon. Gentleman used to agree with that.

The fact that we could take further steps in all the directions that my right hon. Friend announced yesterday is another illustration of the underlying strength that our policies have brought to the economy. That strength allowed us to see through a year-long coal strike and a spectacular shift in oil prices, and still to keep on course.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): My right hon. Friend properly mentioned profitability, which is so important to manufacturing industry. We all want to see increased profitability. Does he agree that one of the wise things that the Chancellor did yesterday was to put the price of oil up by only 7½p—which was meant to come out of the excess profits of the oil companies—when the price could have come down by 12p. Will he try to ensure that profitability for manufacturing companies is not made up by profiteering by the monopoly oil companies? Can we be firm with them, as we were with the banks, and see that if they do not play the right game they have to pay excess profits tax, so that they serve the people and do not just profiteer?

Mr. MacGregor: I certainly hope that many of the comments that have been made will be noted by the oil companies. I believe that we shall now see considerable competition at the pumps throughout this country and that this will have an impact in ensuring what my right hon. Friend said yesterday that he hoped for.

Having talked about the underlying strength of the economy, I turn now to what I regard as three of the major themes of this year's Budget. This Budget marks a further step in our programme of reducing the burden of income tax on the British people, despite the constricting circumstances resulting from the loss of north sea oil revenue.

Our reasons are well known. Income tax as a proportion of most people's earnings has increased enormously over the years. Tax and national insurance paid by a married couple on average earnings was about 29 per cent. last year —double the share taken in tax at the end of the 1950s. It is therefore still too high, and I hope that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) will support us in all the efforts that we are making to get it down.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook referred to the burden of tax compared with 1979. What in fact matters is a person's take-home pay. Let me take the case of the real take-home pay for a married man with two children, on average earnings. His real take-home pay will be up by over 17 per cent. in 1986-87 compared with 1978-79. Under the Labour Government, from 1973 to 1979, the same person saw his real take-home pay grow by only 0·5 per cent.

Mr. Hattersley: Could the Chief Secretary tell us if he is glad or sorry about the figures that he has just given us, since yesterday the Chancellor of the Exchequer was urging people to keep their wage claims down?

Mr. MacGregor: Obviously, there is increased revenue when pay increases. The real problem—I will come to this later—is that our greatest danger is the increase in unit labour costs. One of the very important points about the changes in income tax is that they will help to ease that problem of increasing unit labour costs. What the right hon. Gentleman said about the burden of tax means, I hope, that he will continue to support us in our efforts to get it down.

We want to enlarge the area of personal choice so that individuals are able to keep more of what they earn and to spend it as they wish, including, if they choose, important areas of expenditure which the Labour party would see as the preserve of central Government alone, using, of course, the taxpayers' money.

Moreover, the evidence suggests that excessive tax rates damage economic performance. There are many reasons why this may be so. Higher taxes on individuals lead to the problems of the poverty trap, with which we are all familiar, the compression of incentives for those in work and the reduction in incentives to take jobs at all. High taxes on employers increase their costs relative to international competitors and reduce the number of jobs that they can afford to offer—a point which the right hon. Gentleman completely ignored. Above all, there is the stifling, crushing effect of high taxes on enterprise, on the activity of creating new businesses, on which lasting jobs and future prosperity depend. So much for the principle.

There are several features of this year's income tax changes which I should like to single out.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I really cannot give way again. I have already given way a great deal. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The Minister has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. MacGregor: I want to make some very important points about these income tax changes.

Mr. Straw: It is a matter of record that the shadow Chancellor gave way on a number of occasions to Back Benchers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is a matter for the hon. Member who has the floor whether he gives way.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Is it not a fact, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this is the Budget debate and that it is right and proper that the Minister give way and be cross-examined on the proposals of the Government?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is well known to the House that it is a matter for whichever hon. Member has the floor whether he gives way, but I have noticed that the right hon. Gentleman has given way frequently.

Mr. MacGregor: I am very grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have given way frequently. I know that many people want to speak, and my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will happily answer points made in the debate. There are many points that I want to make and I do not want to take too long.

I want to single out several features of this year's income tax changes and to begin by stressing that the gains, compared to indexation, have been quite deliberately concentrated on the vast majority of ordinary taxpayers, those in the broad income band fluctuating around the average—in other words, from well below average earnings to twice such earnings. I noted in some of the pre-Budget comments doubts about reducing direct tax rates because, so it was thought, this would particularly benefit the higher paid. The House will have noted that we have deliberately skewed the changes so that it does not do so. Those at the top of the earnings scale broadly get no greater gain than they would have got from simple indexation of allowances.

Those in all income ranges have seen their income tax reduced in real terms as a percentage of their tax liability compared to the last year of the Labour Government after adjusting for inflation, in other words, assuming normal indexation since that year. That is another response to the right hon. Gentleman. Until this Budget, the percentage tax reduction had been greatest at both ends of the income scale, but for those within the income ranges of £5,000 and £20,000 the percentage income tax reduction was less than for all the others. That is one reason why there was a strong case for concentrating on this large income band, for whom the 1p reduction in the basic rate means most. It was their turn.

This brings me to the rates v. threshold argument. In choosing to make a 1p reduction in the basic rate this year the Government are not saying that basic rate reductions are in some sense better than threshold increases. The fact is that we need both as part of our programme of reducing the burden of tax. Our record shows the importance we attach to raising the threshold. The basic allowances will be over 22 per cent. higher in real terms next year than they were in 1978-79. This substantial increase in allowances means that there are 1·4 million fewer taxpayers than if we had merely indexed the 1978-79 regime. It means also that the real value of the married man's allowance is the highest since 1945.

In the Green Paper on personal tax reform, which my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will be dealing with later, we described a possible strategy for the future. One of the main purposes of the paper is to show how we could increase thresholds in a way that is more cost-effective and gives more help to those whose family commitments are high. It shows that our long-term objective continues to be to make further substantial increases in allowances. All this demonstrates our commitment to thresholds.

It is time, however, that something more was done about the basic rate. It gives help to very large numbers of people on a very wide range of incomes. It is bound to do so, when some 95 per cent. of taxpayers pay at the basic rate. For all those taxpayers, their marginal rate will fall, so incentives will improve. The argument about marginal rates is a very important one in the context of the economy.

The reduction in the basic rate, moreover, is of greater benefit than an increase in allowances, for the same overall cost, for single people and married women with incomes as low as £115 a week. This is little more than half average earnings. It is of greater benefit for married men earning £180 a week, which is still well below male average earnings.

Let me just take the single person earning £140 a week to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred. Everyone agrees that he or she is paying too much tax. I suspect that in most people's minds that person is thought to benefit more from higher thresholds than from the basic rate reduction. On the contrary, that person will gain 95p a week from the reduction in the basic rate, compared with 69p a week for an equal-cost increase in allowances. I might add that, as a direct result of this Budget, he will have £1.70 more in his pay packet, and for a married man on average earnings the figure is £2.59. That, of course, comes on top of all the other benefits that will ensue from the Budget. So that is another argument for doing something about the basic rate this year.

A basic rate reduction also helps small businesses and the self-employed. I know only too well the argument which is sometimes deployed — that we have greatly helped the small incorporated business by big reductions in the small business rate of corporation tax, and that all other businesses have benefited by having the lowest rate of corporation tax — at 35 per cent. — in any major industrial country. The self-employed and our unincorporated businesses do not feel that they have always benefited to the same extent.

In fact, 90 per cent. of all self-employed non-incorporated businesses have earnings at the basic rate of tax. This 1 per cent. reduction in the basic rate will be of particular benefit to them, on top of all the other measures we have taken for them. It will enable the small business rate of corporation tax to come down again.

The basic rate reduction helps with one other issue of great importance which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook raised in his last question. The House is well aware that one of the greatest threats to jobs in this country today is the fact that our labour costs have been rising faster than those of our major competitors. I make no apology for emphasising the latest figures yet again. In the 12 months to the third quarter of 1985, unit labour costs in manufacturing in this country rose by 6·25 per cent. In the United States they rose by 2 per cent., in Germany by 1 per cent. and in Japan by 0·5 per cent.

For the employee on average earnings, the reduction in the basic rate of tax plus the increase in thresholds is the equivalent of £4 a week increase in gross pay. That is a pay increase which does not damage the competitiveness of British industry and does not put other people's jobs or that employee's job at risk.

As the CBI has acknowledged, it is essential that we bring our increase in labour costs more into line with those of our competitors through realistic and sensible pay settlements. The Budget—I notice that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is not listening; I am about to answer his question fully—through direct tax changes, through its encouragement of lower inflation and through its assistance in lowering mortgage rates, which were decreased today, has greatly helped that process. I hope that employers and employees will take note and act accordingly.

I turn to my second theme — enterprise and job measures. Of course, we all want the level of unemployment to be brought down, but the Government at least recognise the formidable nature of the challenge, which is a worldwide one, in the face of the increasing impact of technology, the increased threats from greater competitiveness in our own and world markets from more and more newly industrialising countries and the problem of coping with substantial increases in the potential work force — an all-time high in Britain of some 510,000 extra in 1984, which was a point conveniently forgotten by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook.

Faced with all these, we have made considerable progress, with more new jobs being created in Britain since the last election than in the rest of the Community put together. My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment will elaborate on that aspect if he catches your eye tomorrow, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall not give way, for the reason I explained earlier.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I should like to confine myself to three comments.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I have been giving way a great deal.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not customary and courteous for a Minister who has named a Labour Member to give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member well knows that it is for the hon. Member who has the Floor to decide whether to give way.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Blackburn just this once, and then I must continue.

Mr. Straw: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the name of the Paymaster General appears on the proposals of the Tory Reform Group which called for job creation before taxation cuts and for an increase in spending of £3 billion? What answer has the right hon. Gentleman given to the Paymaster General and the other two Cabinet Ministers whose names appear on the front of that document?

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General will make it clear himself that he was not part of the process of developing those policies and will give a very satisfactory answer tomorrow. My right hon. and learned Friend was not involved in framing that set of proposals.

I should like to confine myself to three comments on the employment side. First, the employment and training measures currently pursued by the Government are much wider and more extensive than ever before. We are planning to spend about £2·5 billion in 1986-87 on those measures, increasing to nearly £3 billion in 1988, compared with £300 million in the last year of the last Government. The bulk of the benefits from last year's Budget are only now beginning to work through. That is not surprising. The restructuring of national insurance contributions came into effect only last October. The two-year YTS begins next month, and the expansion of the community programme is only part way through. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor was therefore right to include those measures in considering the effects on employment in the coming year.

The new measures announced yesterday, at some £195 million gross, are on top of all that, so it is ridiculous to describe them as the response to the problem of the unemployed. They are in addition to everything else that has been and is being done.

Moreover — this is very important — we have concentrated on those measures which have been proved to be the most cost-effective. It is, of course, only too easy for one to promise to spend much more of the taxpayers' money on such schemes and to claim that in that way one was making a greater Government contribution to jobs, but it is false. What matters is that we ensure that this is the best use of taxpayers' money and that it is effectively spent. The Opposition constantly fail to take into account the fact that every £100 million spent on such employment measures comes from other businesses and other people in employment. Squeeze them too hard by higher taxes or higher interest rates and one destroys hundreds of thousands of jobs which would otherwise be lasting.

Secondly, as a former Minister with responsibility for small businesses, I am delighted to see the emphasis on measures to promote enterprise, to encourage small businesses and to assist self-employment. Two of the schemes for which I had initial responsibility — the enterprise allowance scheme and the loan guarantee scheme—have proved themselves, and I am sure that all my right hon. and hon. Friends will welcome their extension in the Budget.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I am delighted, too, that another scheme in which I took particularly close interest, the business expansion scheme, has received the thumbs up from the Peat Marwick report and is being extended indefinitely. I welcome, too, the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has recognised its value and supported what we have proposed in the Budget.

The CTT changes are important in this context, because their main effect will be to help the family businesses. There is little incentive to build up a family business beyond a certain scale if it cannot be passed on to the next generation without heavy tax bills on transfer. Increasingly, it has become clear that the effect of the lifetime gifts provision was to prevent new jobs being created. It led, possibly because of the need to meet tax bills, to the actual loss of many existing jobs. I hope that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook will reflect on that point if he concludes that he wants to oppose the proposal.

Thirdly, it is nonsense to suggest that the only impact of this Budget on jobs will be through the specific employment measures. Expenditure is only part of the story. The Opposition live under the delusion that Governments alone can create jobs by spending other people's money. We disagree. Lasting jobs are created by business success in the market place — by businesses producing goods and services which people want to buy and which they will have more money to buy after the Budget.

For me, the third main theme of the Budget is the further encouragement it gives to wider share ownership. For many years, I was an active member of the Wider Share Ownership Council, and, like my right hon. Friends, I have a passionate belief in seeing the capital-owning democracy, begun with the massive extension of home ownership, augumented by as many of our fellow citizens as possible being able to build up investments of their own, over and above their pensions and life policies, to enhance their financial independence of the state and to spread the investment habit.

We have built on the success of previous Budgets, of privatisation and of increased employee participation. We are breaking down the old demarcation between capital and labour. I am therefore delighted at the warm welcome —with the obvious exception of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook—given to my right hon. Friend's radical new scheme, the personal equity plan. It is important that the tax advantages hitherto given to institutional investors are counterbalanced. Small investors will now be able to build up substantial nest eggs for their retirement, to complement their pensions or for other purposes. More and more of our fellow citizens are increasingly coming to see that share ownership is just as natural and just as realistic an ambition as home ownership. I hope that this new scheme will help to turn those ambitions into reality.

Of course, I did not expect Labour Members to understand or welcome the new scheme. At heart, the Labour party believes in the municipal Socialism of the town hall landlord and the central Socialism of the man in Whitehall. On this matter, philosophically and in practice, there is a fundamental divide between the parties, and this Budget has intensified it. Not so long ago the Labour party showed itself to be out of touch with the aspiration of people to own their own homes when it opposed the sale of council houses. It had to come round to that because of its popularity. I tell hon. Members that the time for people's capitalism has come.

Something of the same spirit underlies the Budget proposals on charities. Of course, this Government have done much in successive Budgets already to help charities, but this is far and away the best Budget ever for them. My right hon. Friend has given an enormous boost to charities with the imaginative steps he is now taking. A vast range of activities are affected—good social causes, the arts, conservation, the heritage, education, including universities, medical research and the Third world. Of course, the proposals have been welcomed on all sides, and give charities the opportunity to attract a huge surge in charitable giving, estimated to be at least £120 million by next year, and perhaps more.

It is not just the national organisations which will benefit. I expect that there will be a significant boost to many county and small local charities and charitable activities and events, in my own county and constituency as in those of my hon. Friends, and not least to the churches, with the money coming from local employers and employees.

For me too there is a wider significance. There is state funding on a substantial scale for many of these purposes, and it will continue. But the decisions in practice are very often concentrated in a few hands, and very much focused on the centre. Letting individuals and companies decide what they want to give to, and to whom they want to give it, means that decisions are diffused throughout the community, are in as many hands as possible and have a strong regional and local focus. We have always supported an active and flourishing voluntary sector. These measures should reinvigorate it.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): As chairman of a national charity for mentally handicapped people, may I say that the proposals by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will without doubt enable us greatly to extend the recreational and sporting facilities for large numbers of mentally handicapped children who otherwise would not be assisted?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend; I entirely agree with him. Although the charitable proposals have had a wide welcome, I suspect that their real significance and impact have not yet sunk in. They are a major step forward for all charitable and voluntary activities.

The Budget documents this year do not announce any new major developments in public expenditure. The planning totals have not been changed from those set out in the White Paper and the package of employment measures will be met from the reserve. There should be no criticism of that. As we get nearer to the year in question, we are able to respond to changing circumstances by switching some resources from the reserve to specific programmes while remaining within the totals which we have set.

The essence of sound control is, as the Green Paper on the longer term expressed it,

"to establish a clear view of what can be afforded, set out our spending plans accordingly, then to stick to those plans".

That is precisely what we are doing.

Whereas in the autumn statement and in the public expenditure White Paper we expected the outturn for 1985-86 to be at the level of the planning total, we now expect it to be slightly below. That will no doubt surprise those who last autumn took the view that our determination to achieve the planning totals was no more than a pious hope which would be rapidly undermined in practice. But it shows that, far from it being a case of virtue tomorrow, good housekeeping and proper restraint of public expenditure are being practised right now.

How important it is that that good housekeeping should be maintained. For it has been the soundness of public finances, together with the underlying strength of the economy, which has enabled us to weather the huge fall in oil prices and its impact on Government revenues, to achieve yesterday's Budget and to make possible the interest rate fall today.

There could be no greater contrast than that between our plans and those of the right hon. Gentleman. Where we offer consistency and realism, he offers inconsistency and, as has been pointed out by one of my hon. Friends, unreality. The right hon. Gentleman clearly thought that he could play both sides against the middle. He thought he was on to a very good thing. He thought he could play a statesmanlike role, rushing round the City making play of his own conversion to the joys of sound finance, while at the same time, his colleagues were covering the length and breadth of the land making promises to lobbies and pressure groups, and committing themselves to more and more additional spending, to please the Left wing behind him.

But, to the right hon. Gentleman's evident chagrin, we were observing the process and noting down each and every promise as it appeared, until the total cost—as the House and the country now know—came to £24 billion. The right hon. Gentleman ought to be grateful to us for blowing the whistle at that figure. If we had not, who knows where the Labour party might have ended up. Since we announced it, the right hon. Gentleman has tried every way he knows to wriggle off the hook; and failed.

So far, on the basis of our exchanges and the right hon. Gentleman's assurances, I have agreed to make two changes. They put one figure down and another figure up, leaving the total pretty much the same. For weeks the alarm bells have been ringing in top Labour circles. Last Sunday's press quotes " a senior Kinnock aide" as saying that the Labour party has "got to get out of the habit of ringing up the promises on the cash register".

So we come to today's figure. I shall leave aside such things as pensions, although I assure the right hon. Gentleman that if he financed his programme as he intends, he would do devastating damage to much of the economy. I shall tot the figures up later but I reckon that the total would approach £10 billion. Perhaps he will tell me if I am too high.

Mr. Hattersley: On the programme I have described, the right hon. Gentleman is wrong by 50 per cent. I want to ask him about the previous figures. In regard to the £24 billion he will recall that on television last night and again this morning I called him something which the rules of order prevent me from calling him in the House. He will also recall that, when he told the House of the figures, he said that they had been compiled by the Civil Service. I have today received a letter from the secretary to the Cabinet. I shall quote two sentences:

"I understand that Treasury officials were asked by Treasury Ministers to provide them with estimates of the costs of implementing proposals which Ministers, with the assistance of their political advisers, had identified as having been put forward in Labour Party documents or by Labour Party spokesmen. The list of proposals to be costed was not compiled by officials."

Whom does the right hon. Gentleman think will be fooled by that?

Mr. MacGregor: We never argued that it was compiled by Treasury officials. We followed the normal practice of the past in asking them to do what they did. I sent to the right hon. Gentleman the list on which the figure was based. It was a list compiled by him and his colleagues from pledges which they had made. I have given the right hon. Gentleman many opportunities to deny them and so far he has denied only a tiny amount. I have admitted that we got one wrong; it should have been higher. I have told him constantly in the House, not least last Thursday, that he would have to bring his commitments down. It has only been our constant promptings, I suspect, that have caused him to do so. Today we are getting a response.

I do not think the right hon. Gentleman will be able to finance the other parts for which he thought the finance would come from the self-financing of capital taxes and higher rates of tax. For this year, we seem to be on £5 billion to £6 billion. I make only two comments. First, we and the country will watch constantly to see that the right hon. Gentleman really has control of his colleagues. We will want assurances that all the other programmes in the list of commitments which I sent him have been dropped. We shall be watching like hawks to see that they do not start ringing up the promises on the cash register again. I shall be interested to hear what his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Back Benches think about the pledges which, on what he has said today, he does not now intend to carry through. [Interruption.] If that is his strategy for the Budget, the fear remains for the country that that figure of £24 billion is what the Opposition are committed to. We now have it on record that the right hon. Gentleman's lower figure applies to this Budget, but we still want to see what in the £24 billion programme the right hon. Gentleman wants to knock out.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman's figure for this Budget is still far too high. It appeared that the right hon. Gentleman wanted to finance much of the Budget on the borrowing requirement. He said that borrowing is an option. He and his Government tried it, and look what happened. During that period we saw a rise in interest rates, devastation to the economy and higher inflation rates.

If the right hon. Gentleman intends to finance the extra expenditure today entirely on the borrowing requirement, that would have made impossible today's fall in interest rates. His figures would have pushed them much higher. Up would go mortage rates, squeezing the income of millions of families. Up would go inflation, harming the poor and the pensioners, about whom he talked, destroying existing jobs and new employment opportunities. Was it not the right hon. Gentleman who told the House last month how important it was to cut interest rates in order to bring down unemployment?

The right hon. Gentleman told the House recently that the Labour party would no increase the basic rates of income tax. I have explained to the House the benefits to jobs, enterprise and families of the penny off — the reduction to 29p that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has now announced. Will he and his party now oppose that? I take it that the right hon. Gentleman will support it.

Mr. Hattersley indicated assent.

Mr. MacGregor: That is useful to know. It means that the right hon. Gentleman must find another £1 billion on the borrowing requirement. The only conclusion that I can reach is that he would never be able to do so. He would have to turn once again to raising substantive VAT and petrol taxes, again with harmful effects on inflation, the poor and pensioners.

The right hon. Gentleman has not got out of his dilemma or off the hook at all. His programme is still unfinancable without devastating effects. The contrast is that, by prudent finance and sound public expenditure policies, my right hon. Friend was able to announce a Budget yesterday which will be good for enterprise and jobs tomorrow.

5.21 pm

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): I hardly wish to intrude in the private quarrel between the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). There is a sharp contrast between the oratorical style of the Chief Secretary and his predecessor the right hon. and learned Member for Dover (Mr. Rees), who has just left us. It is rather like having a machine gun battalion replacing a stately and elegant squadron of cavalry. I am not sure that the quick burst of tactical fire from the right hon. Gentleman, while in many ways very effective, enables him to stand back and look at the strategic landscape.

Let me look at the Chancellor's last three Budgets. I see that the Chancellor, who was the first Chancellor for 20 years or more to be late for the speech from the Opposition Front Bench, has now left us. I was about to pay him a few tributes, but he really is a remarkably bad listener. His first Budget was, in my view, remarkably well presented. It was taut, logical and lucid, the best for quite a long time —about 14 years, I would be inclined to say. It did not in my view engage wholly with the central problem, but it made some sensible changes around the edges.

The second Budget was less good. I think that the right hon. Gentleman had been rather thrown by the mismanagement of the sterling crisis in January of last year, and the bombast was a little more to the fore when he proclaimed that it was a Budget for jobs, which it manifestly was not, whatever else it was.

How does this year's Budget fit into the pattern? First, the right hon. Gentleman has had the advantage of being able to prepare things under the shadow of the Westland affair, while the attention of his colleagues was almost totally occupied elsewhere. Secondly, he seems to have learnt the lesson that if one wants to make a Budget speech interesting, it is rather a good idea not to put most of it in The Sunday Times two days before.

The Chancellor started with a brisk canter of contents, announcing exactly what he was going to say, and what subjects he was going to cover. I thought that the Budget was going to be as clearly delineated as his first Budget, but it did not entirely hold up in that respect. The pudding had some good plums in it, but in my view it did not have a theme. Nothing very logically or obviously followed from anything else, and several vital issues were glossed over. Poor old sterling M3, after its days of glory in the early 1980s, really was pushed firmly into the wastepaper basket. It can go away and grow if it must by 11 to 15 per cent., but do not trouble us again. That was the dismissive message it received.

The exchange rate also had some fairly cursory treatment. We heard a number of tributes from the Chancellor to the Plaza accord, but I missed the vital factor, particularly for next year, of the Chancellor's description of his exchange rate policies. The Plaza accord means that benign neglect is out of the window, was wrong, has been abandoned and will not be reverted to. But it does not amount to an exchange rate policy for Britain, which British business men would greatly like to see.

On Saturday the Financial Times leader said that British business men would "welcome a stable exchange rate, help for the unemployed, and lower interest rates, in roughly that order, with tax cuts far behind."

Judged by that test, this is not much of a Budget for business. How long will the Chancellor and the Foreign Secretary allow the Prime Minister to continue with her prejudice against joining the European monetary system, for which conditions are now almost ideal, and against which there is now hardly any rational case left?

However, it would be quite idle to deny that this is an ingenious Budget, with some good things in it. The provisions for charities are right, the paving of the way —although there is some way to go—to profit-sharing is right, the excise duties have been handled skilfully, and on the whole wisely, with just as much skill devoted to their presentation as to their formulation, and that is well done.

I have substantially more doubts about the destruction of capital transfer tax. This tax undoubtedly raised genuine and difficult problems, and it was not a perfect tax, but to go back to death duties, unsupported by any tax on gifts inter vivos, is pretty unsatisfactory, too. Death duties are an extremely haphazard and weak tax. If people die old, it is, broadly speaking, a voluntary levy paid by those who distrust their heirs more than they dislike the Inland Revenue. Therefore, it effectively becomes a levy on the rich who die young and unexpectedly, which is not a satisfactory fiscal basis. It is also a weak tax because of the arrangements, in themselves desirable, between spouses, which means that families have two chances to avoid it.

I am no believer in punitive taxation, but the forces making for inequality in Britain today are so strong that I am surprised that it should be within the philosophy, even of this Government, substantially to add to them in respect of inherited wealth. It cannot make sense for this tax, which is essentially one of long-term effects on the nation and long-term dispositions to the individual, to be such a political football, to be so frequently kicked back and forth and up and down the pitch. This is pre-eminently a tax for which we should try to get some permanent arrangement agreed between the parties, within the walls of which individuals can do some sensible planning.

There is another distributive point. In the argument over the turn of the year about the relation between direct taxation concessions, which it was thought would be much bigger, and a stimulus to the economy by an increased level of investment in the public sector, the Prime Minister, supported by the chairman of the Conservative party, was much concerned, as usual, to try to capture the populist ground and talked about people on lower pay who are paying too much tax. I remember her saying that nurses, in particular, were paying far too much tax. I am not sure that the Chancellor can have heard, because the low-paid will be lucky if they get a reduction of 0·2 per cent. out of the Budget. Those on between £15,000 and £20,000 a year will have a percentage benefit approaching 1 per cent., and therefore a significant level. It reaches its maximum in money terms even higher up, but to some extent that is inevitable with all direct taxation changes.

There can be no doubt that this is a remarkably stony-hearted Budget for those who are the casualties of the Government's policies. The Budget further divides an already dangerously divided realm. That is the major, but not the central, criticism of the Budget. The central criticism is that it is a complacent Budget. It is a modest Budget, and in this one respect it is the Budget of a Minister of taxation who accepts the economic weather, rather than that of a Chancellor of the Exchequer who tends, to some extent, to make the economic weather. Whether that approach is right depends essentially on two issues. First, is the present weather in the sense of the condition and prospect of Britain acceptable; and, secondly, if it is not, can a Chancellor do anything significant about it?

The Chancellor answered firmly yes to the first question about whether the weather is acceptable both now and in the future. That is the cause of his complacency. To paraphrase what he said, our growth is the highest in Europe, the fall in the rate of inflation is a triumph, the loss of half our oil revenues has been surmounted with hardly a tremor, and the prospect ahead is almost blissful. I became just a little frightened when I heard that.

On the individual points, there is, as the Chancellor and the House will know, a possibility—there always is—of putting different glosses on particular statistics. For instance, how good the growth rate is depends essentially upon the starting point. If we compare growh today to 1981, it is not too bad. However, if we take 1979, a date not without significance—only the starting point of the Government — our growth now is 1·1 per cent. per annum, which compares with 2·5 per cent. per annum in the preceding and now much-derided decade and a half from 1964 to 1979.

Inflation is certainly down, but it is not strikingly so by international standards. The record is at best indifferent, and at worst almost bad. German inflation is now probably below 1 per cent., and the French inflation rate is well below ours. I much enjoy recalling how the Prime Minister used to excoriate the French Government and their economic defence. We do not hear a great deal about that now. When the French Government came to power, for the first 18 months after 1981 they endeavoured to pursue a Socialist policy, and the result was a pretty good disaster. They then turned to a Social Democratic policy, and the result has been a level of unemployment barely two thirds of ours and a level of inflation barely half of ours. There is no question but that both the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition might well put this in their pipes and smoke it.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): The right hon. Gentleman has denigrated the Government's achievements on growth and inflation. He spoke about the higher growth rate in the 15 years preceding 1979, which was an era of high growth. Since 1979, and particularly since 1981, we have been in an era of low growth. The right hon. Gentleman compared our economy to that of the Germans. The achievement of this Government is to have reduced inflation from 27 per cent. to near 3·5 per cent.

Mr. Jenkins: The Government brought that about.

Mr. Browne: They did that because they had to absorb the shock that they inherited. The German achievement is to bring inflation down from a much lower point.

Mr. Jenkins: If the hon. Gentleman is to make rather over-long factual interjections, he should at least get his facts right, and he is not right on either point. He said that the recent period had been one of a low growth rate world-wide. The growth in the United States in 1983-84 was one of the most exceptional in a major economy of the world which can——

Mr. Browne: That was the exception.

Mr. Jenkins: As the economy of the United States happens to be about half that of the free world, it is not a minor exception. I hold no brief for the previous Administration, not at the end, at any rate. The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) will speak for that, if necessary. My recollection is that when he left office, inflation, perhaps temporarily, was only 10 per cent., not 27 per cent. We must have accuracy in factual interventions.

Sir Peter Hordern rose——

Mr. Jenkins: I do not have time to give way. Had the hon. Gentleman kept the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) a little shorter, I might have been able to give way.

We then have the Chancellor glorying in the fact that we have lost half our oil revenue in less than 25 weeks and we are still well on our feet. The sterling-dollar rate has stood up better than I would have expected [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Conservative Members should not get into the state of mind in which they think that every statement is so notable. I know that we are engaged in adversarial politics, but it is too tedious if that has to be seen in terms of one of these weather things, where the man comes out and the woman goes in. It is a rather two-dimensional and childish view. The sterling-dollar rate has, for the time being, stood up better than I would have expected.

The Chancellor reminds me of someone who falls off, or throws himself off, the 50th floor and as he passes the 25th floor says, "All right so far." It must be said that there is still some distance to go and the effects are liable to be delayed, because hitting the ground is still to come.

A thesis which is often forwarded by Conservative Members is that the capacity of an economy to adjust should not be under-estimated. Total catastrophe for national economies very rarely happens. Equally, the capacity to adjust should not be exaggerated. There is no method by which Britain can accommodate the disappearance of the oil surplus and the likely projections of our manufacturing balance of trade. Unmasked by oil, it would give us a deficit which there was no chance of covering by invisibles and services. One could cover it for a time by borrowing, particularly as we have had a fairly strong balance of payments recently, but not indefinitely. If one has to correct by deflation the effect on unemployment, starting from its present level, would be devastating and would take us to undreamt-of totals. Therefore, it appears to me that set alongside the Chancellor's self-congratulation there must be a range of considerations.

First, the oil surplus is going quite rapidly, although perhaps not the oil production. As the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, there is a considerable difference between a loss of revenue through falling price, which brings other benefits to the economy and to other economies, and a loss of revenue because the oil has run out, which does not bring any corresponding benefits.

We have not done much with the oil during that period. We have built up some overseas assets, for which there is something to be said. I am not against that by any means. [HON. MEMBERS: "Something?"] Yes, something, but certainly not everything. I do not believe that anybody sensibly believes that pouring money overseas and neglecting our investments at home solves everything. A certain balance must be struck.

During the Government's period of office the oil revenues to the Government have been £51 billion, and the unemployment costs during the same period have been £33 billion. That is a substantial proportion to have gone in that direction.

Secondly, manufacturing industry is in no position to close the gap. Investment in manufacturing industry is still well below the 1979 level.

Thirdly, unemployment is untouched, at significantly above 3 million. I started to believe last autumn, as the Government certainly suggested, that we were at least on a plateau and that there might be a slight fall. That did not happen. On the contrary, there was a vicious little up kick at the turn of the year. It is certain that it is now impossible seriously to sustain the view that a reduction in inflation will in itself bring about a reduction in unemployment. Inflation is certainly a scourge, and can also be the enemy of employment, but it is a logical fallacy to say that, because that is so, if inflation is brought down it will spontaneously generate employment. That does not happen without other sensible economic policies.

Fourthly, there is a serious rundown of general public maintenance of housing stock and a whole range of other matters of that sort. This rundown strikes most people coming here from outside the United Kingdom, and is strongly supported statistically. However, to an extent which I do not believe is fully appreciated yet — certainly not on the Labour Benches; I am not sure about the Conservative Benches, and perhaps not on our Benches — a major long-term public expenditure difficulty is looming. We have managed to get through with the vast costs involved in massive unemployment only because of the oil revenue. At the same time, there is no doubt that, whatever statistics are produced saying that more money is spent on the Health Service or education, there are serious strains on those services. Therefore, one has a conjuncture of issues which produce a different public expenditure forecast, whoever is trying to deal with it. The pressure on resources with unemployment and without oil is formidable, and the blissful prospect ahead seems to be highly dangerous.

What can and should the Chancellor do about it? There is fairly wide agreement nearly everywhere, except on the Treasury Bench and on some parts of the Government Back Benches. The Confederation of British Industry, nearly every Tory Minister, as soon as he ceases to be a Minister—with the exception of the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), whom I acquit of that for the moment—the all-party Charter for Jobs, the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade, the House of Commons Select Committee on Employment and the statement by the alliance, which is the clearest, most succinct and carefully costed of all, move broadly in the same direction. They may conceivably all be wrong, but it seems a little presumptuous of the Treasury Bench to be so certain of that. I wish that I was as certain of anything as the Chancellor is of everything.

As I said, the right hon. Gentleman is an ingenious Chancellor who presents his Budgets, particularly this one and his first Budget, skilfully, but there is a grave danger that he will have presided over almost the last opportunity to turn round the manufacturing decline of this country before it is too late.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): The unusual feature of this year's Budget is that it is remarkably difficult to find anyone who is significantly worse off. Indeed, if one takes the view, as I do, that there is a positively beneficial effect if those who smoke smoke less and have an incentive to smoke less, it is true to say that the only groups who have really been penalised are foreign artists and sportsmen who happen to be working here. If one looks at the Budget in the context of what I might presume to call Higgins' first law of Budgets—that those who have taxes increased scream louder than those who cheer tax deductions—I think that there is a strong argument for saying that this should be a popular Budget.

The Chancellor has had meagre resources this year and he has been heavily curtailed by the fall in oil revenues. As a result he has resorted to a variety of ingenious solutions to particular problems. Indeed, I think that it is true to say that ingenuity is the hallmark of this Budget, and it is reflected in almost every proposal that it contains.

I should like to begin by expressing appreciation of three particular items in the Budget. First, this is undoubtedly the best Budget ever for charities. It has not been an easy task. When one becomes involved in that area of policy, it is easy to disrupt those who are benefiting from existing concessions, particularly with regard to covenants. On the whole, that has been avoided. The change in the value added tax relief is important, as is the provision for public companies to make charitable donations and the arrangements for payroll giving. All those issues have considerable significance for my constituents.

Secondly, I welcome the proposal for a personal equity plan. That is a move in the right direction. I am a little worried about the scope of the concessions for tax relief on dealing charges. If we want to move the balance away from institutional arrangements to direct investment in shares, I think that we shall have to look carefully at the arithmetic.

Thirdly, I welcome the indefinite extension of the business expansion scheme. I should like to make one constituency point, to which I do not want an answer this evening, but I hope that I can have an early reply. The restrictions of the business expansion scheme with regard to proposals involving property investment are right in principle, but the Chancellor said that that would be imposed on shares issued from the day of his Budget statement. In my constituency, one business expansion scheme—I gather that there may be others—has started the operation of issuing the shares, but has not completed it. That could be a dangerous aspect of the problem. While it is not of great national significance, perhaps the Minister will look at it.

The changes in income tax are ingenious. I am a little worried that the Chancellor has not fulfilled completely the statutory requirements introduced as a result of the Rooker-Wise-Lawson amendment to the Finance Bill some years ago. None the less, the way in which the balance has been struck between those at the upper and those at the lower end of the scale, by not fully indexing the top end and by giving the 1p reduction in standard rate, has biased it in the right direction. That is to be welcomed. However, I continue to hope that the emphasis will be put on threshold raising rather than on standard rate cutting. We shall need to consider that in the context of the Budget next year.

I should like to refer to broader issues. The strategic success of the Budget must depend on its effect on unemployment. I believe that that is common ground on both sides of the House. If we are to analyse the problem correctly, we must appreciate that reasons for the present unemployment are different from those in any previous period. In 1979-80, the effect of the inflationary Clegg pay awards, which the incoming Conservative Government conceded—indeed, they went beyond them—the effect of the high exchange rate resulting from the high oil price, and the effect of the world recession squeezed company profits to an unprecedented extent. As a result, many companies that previously had not been prepared to make people redundant, because of the heavy costs of redundancy pay imposed by the so-called Employment Protection Act 1975, cut their labour forces by as much as third. They then found that they could produce virtually as much as before. The reality was that many of the jobs were not really there in the first place. There was much overmanning and concealed unemployment.

That once-and-for-all change, which was a terrible human tragedy for many individuals and their families—no one, least of all myself, would wish to deny that—had two results. First, there was the potential for a substantial increase in productivity the moment the economic situation began to improve. That is taking place now, and we need to take that into account. Secondly, the country has been faced with the task of generating an immense number of new real jobs. That is bound to take time. Against the background of that major restructuring, it will not be possible to solve the problem in the short term.

It is right to go for retraining, the youth training scheme, the community programmes, and so on. We have been generating many new jobs, and employment has been increasing, but the demographic trend has been against us. Therefore, the crucial question is: are we setting the right economic framework within which that huge number of new jobs can be generated as fast as it can reasonably be done without jeopardising that progress, so that we get a continual improvement rather than just a sudden improvement? The economic forecast in the Red Book shows that our growth rate is about 3 per cent. and, as the Chancellor said yesterday, we have been achieving that for some time. I have not heard from the Opposition any suggestion as to how much faster the growth rate should be. By historic standards, 3 per cent. is a high rate of economic growth, certainly when sustained for several years.

Therefore, my feeling about the level of demand in the economy is that, give or take half a per cent. here or there we are probably going as fast as we safely can, but we are doing so against the background of lower inflation. As the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, that is still not very good compared with some of our competitors. That remains a real problem, but it is certainly a great deal better than when the Conservative party came to office.

The overall combination of a reducing exchange rate and a safe but, by historic standards, fast rate of economic growth, gives us the best prospect for maintaining the upward trend in employment. As the demographic factors change, there should be a gradually improving trend in unemployment. However, longer-term improvement must also depend crucially on the level of investment. That is the main point that I want to make. It is a matter not only of profitability, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said, but of profitability in relation to interest charges or the cost of capital. My right hon. Friend mentioned the figure for profitability of 8 per cent. That has to be looked at against the cost of capital. It is therefore very important that we should reduce the real level of interest rates. That being so, we must face the fact that they are being maintained at the present high levels for either domestic or international reasons.

It is right that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor should seek to reduce the level of public sector borrowing because, the amount that has to be funded is less, and it can be done with lower interest rates while still avoiding an excessive increase in the money supply. I leave on one side the controversy in which the Select Committee on Treasury and the Civil Service has been engaged with the Chancellor—which, from time to time, the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook seems to understand — as to whether the proceeds of privatisation represent a means of funding the public sector borrowing requirement, revenue or a reduction in public expenditure. I do not want to go over that matter today. The crucial point is that if, for domestic reasons, we can restrain the level of borrowing, there is no reason for interest rates to be as high as they have been. That is reflected in the reaction of the City today in the light of the Budget itself. We could have had lower interest rates for domestic reasons, but they have been kept high for international reasons.

I was intrigued by the passage in the Chancellor's speech, when he said:

> "Short-term interest rates are the essential instrument of monetary policy. Changes in interest rates have a reasonably quick and direct effect on narrow money, as they do on the exchange rate."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 170.]

We do not have a monetarist policy now. In fact, it is not that monetarism is dead; it has never been born under this Government. At present we have an interest rate-exchange rate policy. Therefore, it is important that we get the interest rate down from an international point of view. That being so, it is extremely important that we should do everything possible to encourage the Americans to reduce their budget deficit, which is keeping up American interest rates, which, in turn, have been keeping ours up. We need to ensure that we have a sensible exchange rate.

The answer that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook gave to a question about the appropriate exchange rate was extraordinary. He said that it was that which maximised sales or turnover. If companies want to maximise turnover, there is no problem. They just cut their prices to ribbons. I say, if one is to say anything at all, that profits should be maximised, although I should be hesitant to make any such statement. The right hon. Gentleman's answer was not sensible.

Interest rates are higher than they need be because of the need to maintain the differential to prevent the exchange rate from collapsing. However, we must look at different exchange rates. It is not exactly true, but it is often said, that we buy in dollars and sell in deutschmarks. In the past six months there has been an extraordinary change in exchange rate relativities. They are more favourable for us now because sterling has depreciated significantly in relation to the deutschmark and, on the whole, its relationship with the dollar has improved. However, we must consider that in the context of the Group of Five discussions. That being so, it is now appropriate to consider the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system.

There are many conflicting arguments about that, and they are set out clearly in the Treasury Select Committee report which was published a few months ago. If one were uncertain whether to join and dithering on the margins, it would be difficult not to think that this moment is a much better opportunity than previous moments. I do not agree with the Prime Minister when she said at Question Time a couple of weeks ago that if we had joined earlier when we were being asked to join, we would have greatly regretted it. The implication was that it would be wrong to consider the matter afresh now. I still believe that we should consider it at this stage because, although it may not be worth buying something at a high price, that does not logically mean that one should not consider buying the same product at a lower price.

We need to analyse the matter carefully against the background of the change in the French Government. If the sterling exchange rate gave a greater impression of stability, it is possible that much of the money which is at present in Germany would, after the Budget, come to the United Kingdom. If that is so, the potential for cutting interest rates could be as much as 1·5 or 2 per cent.—a prize greatly to be welcomed. Against that background, and taking into account all the conflicting arguments which the Select Committee set out, we should consider the position in relation to the differential exchange rates which exist at present.

Overall, this is a remarkably ingenious Budget. It will be widely welcomed throughout the United Kingdom, and certainly by my constituents.

6.2 pm

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): The right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), for whom many of us have great respect partly because he is not afraid to rock the boat when he thinks that his party is on the wrong tack, has come down on the other side today. I agree with him that the Budget is ingenious, but not for the reasons that he has adduced.

The right hon. Gentleman said that he would judge the Budget by its effect on unemployment, and I shall refer to that shortly. The Budget was ingenious and wise in the sense that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was careful not to claim that it was a Budget for jobs. That is one claim that cannot be made for it, and at least the Chancellor seems to have learnt that painful lesson from previous Budgets when he has made that claim and been disproved each time.

Yesterday the Chancellor put on a slick performance, but he did little to allay the anxieties of most people, including a large number of Conservatives inside and outside the House, about the long-term prosperity of the United Kingdom. In that respect his performance was on a par with that of the Prime Minister when she spoke to her party disciples last Saturday. She used that occasion as an excuse for not attending the funeral of the assassinated Prime Minister of Sweden. Mr. Olof Palme was one of the finest international statesmen of our time. He was a ceaseless peace campaigner and a never-tiring worker for the underdeveloped Third world, yet our Prime Minister had no time for him or his principles. Her absence from his funeral was a contemptible dereliction of duty and a sad commentary on her sense of priorities and decency.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not see what the Prime Minister's attendance at a funeral has to do with the debate, especially as she has committed herself to attending the memorial service.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): This is a wide debate.

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman had better learn the first lessons of behaviour in the House before he seeks to intervene in that stupid way.

I wish to relate the Prime Minister's speech on Saturday to the speech of the Chancellor yesterday. The Prime Minister's speech was as raucous and deceptive as the Chancellor's was smooth, smug and complacent. After listing the post-1979 alleged successes, the Prime Minister said that we were only just beginning and that we had barely got past the stage of excavation. Some of us would put it another way. The hole that we are digging for the British economy is only half dug, so we must go on digging. That seems to offend the first principle of holes which was first annunciated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) who said, "When you are in a hole, the first principle is to stop digging." But the Prime Minister says that we must continue to dig because we have only dug half the hole.

Both the Prime Minister and the Chancellor sought and seek to create the impression that all is going to plan, so we must all continue to take the same medicine that has been forced down our throats for the past seven years. That medicine and their policies have led to the decimation of our manufacturing industrial base. Despite the Government's claims, manufacturing output is still less than it was when they first started out on this course in 1979. Despite the Prime Minister's boast about the level of investment, and indeed the boast of the Financial Secretary on television last night, manufacturing investment today is still about 20 per cent. less than it was when they took office in 1979.

The massive bonanza of North sea revenues has been squandered on the financing of ever-lengthening dole queues when it should have been invested in modernising our industry and infrastructure, notably housing, education, health and communications, as the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) and others have continually said. When the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade published its authoritative report eight months ago and made a devastating analysis of the parlous plight of the British economy, the Government ridiculed it. Yesterday the Chancellor rubbished it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) referred to the report this afternoon. The Chancellor said:

> "If we can survive unscathed the loss of half our North sea oil revenues in less than 25 weeks, the prospective loss of the other half over the remainder of the next 25 years should not cause us undue concern."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

That was breathtaking complacency. The right hon. Member for Hillhead said that it is the equivalent of a fellow hurling himself from the 50th floor of a multi-storey block and saying at the 25th floor, "So far I am all right." It is just about as logical as that.

This same Chancellor, referring to the Select Committee's report, said some time ago that the challenge to this country is to foster and nurture a low-tech or no-tech economy and that the future of this country lies in an increase not so much in manufacturing industry as in service industries. He said that we should make this country into a nation of cooks, shop assistants, bottle washers, Chinese laundries and waiters. That would be a low-wage, low-tech and suitably subservient labour force.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury referred to the increase in the standard of living and to the high earnings of British people. I do not know whether he approves of increased earnings or whether he sides with the Chancellor, who said yesterday that we have got to get wages down. I know what his answer will be. He is in favour of increased earnings if they are matched by increased productivity. I should be very glad if the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Government were to apply that policy to the City slickers and their very high earnings. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister are aware that they are on a very sticky wicket when they seek to lecture my workers, my nurses, my teachers—the teachers in Scotland and England—and also professors and lecturers about the need for restraint. The Government are letting City slickers who are not yet 30 years of age get away with earnings of £275,000. A few months ago the Government also granted high awards to those on top salaries—judges, admirals and generals—without the flicker of an eyelid and without a moment's hesitation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Should we not wonder at the very carefully planned propaganda campaign of the last two months in which the Prime Minister and, repeatedly, other Ministers made statements about what they intended to do before the big bang because of their great concern about what is happening in the City? They led people to believe that something would be done about those high salaries. The public may believe that something has been done, but in fact, nothing has been done.

Mr. Hamilton: Before the Budget, one forecast was that something would be done about City tycoons who are enjoying unearned incomes and that something would also be done about the managing directors and top executives of private companies and about the enormous unearned profits that have been made by the banks during the last few months. Nothing has been done about them, although, as I have already said, the forecast before yesterday's Budget was that something would be done.

Far from facing up to these problems and the future challenges, the Chancellor sought yesterday to create the feeling that I suppose the drug addict experiences when he gets his jab: the feeling of heavenly bliss that lasts for as long as he gets his jabs. Yesterday the Chancellor sought to persuade the British people that everything has been so magnificently planned during the last seven years that we must keep on with this policy. To prove it he gave out a few dribs and drabs, some of which are welcome, although others are less welcome. We shall deal with them during the proceedings on the Finance Bill and in other ways. Many of the proposals are to be welcomed, but I do not intend to enumerate them.

The right hon. Member for Worthing said that few people would be worse off after this Budget, but there are many millions of people who will not be much better off, either. There will not be much rejoicing about the Budget among the old folk, the unemployed and many other struggling sections of the community.

When referring to her concern about the high level of taxation, the Prime Minister has often quoted the nurse on £140 a week. Who put her on that figure and who has kept her on that figure? The nurse pays at least a third of her salary in tax, which we all deplore. She will not get all that much help from the Budget. If she is paying prescription charges or if she smokes cigarettes, she will get nothing at all out of the Budget. Furthermore, she might be evicted from her hostel accommodation. She will then have to seek accommodation for which she will have to pay an economic rent. If that happens in London or in other big cities, she will be very much worse off because of the measures that the Government have introduced.

Although Conservative Members approve of the Budget, I noticed yesterday that at least the first two Conservative Members expressed in their speeches the gravest reservations about the lack of a strategic plan, despite short-term ameliorations and the pretence that all will be well if we stay on this course. Many reservations are being expressed by people about the direction in which we are going. The Chancellor has included very little in his Budget that will help to solve the problem of mass unemployment that plagues us and the divisions in our society between rich and poor and north and south. There are massive social, economic, geographic and class divisions. They have been exacerbated during the last few years. The Budget will do little to solve them.

The rich have undeniably got richer during the last few years. Very telling figures have been given during this debate and they will continue to be given up and down the country during the next 12 months. The rich have undeniably got richer during the last six or seven years while the poor have undeniably got poorer not only in terms of cash receipts but also in terms of services provided, not least those of health and education.

In that context, I wish to refer to an article that appeared in this morning's edition of The Guardian. It is a devastating exposure of the cuts that are being made in a teaching hospital. Professor Sam Shuster is professor of dermatology at the university of Newcastle upon Tyne and he has written an article about what is happening to services which form a substantial part of the quality of life of the people whom all hon. Members represent. He said:

"At the same time as the NHS is run down, private medicine is being encouraged. Industry contributes increasingly to private schemes. Since the government persistently and dishonestly denies its attack on the NHS and has effectively prevented those administering it from speaking up, the most important contribution by doctors would be to put this on the public agenda for debate. The public must know that the NHS is being dismantled."

We all see evidence of that in our constituencies. Whatever figures are quoted by the Government, the fact is that the NHS is being taken apart. That is not denied by most knowledgeable people in the Health Service, whether doctors, nurses or patients.

The article continues:

"The public must know that the NHS is being dismantled, and will want to express an opinion on how the limited resources of our society should be used. It seems to many of us that politicians can no longer be trusted to guard the needs of society: they seem unable to face, let alone resolve, the paradox of an expanding military expenditure with less spending on social services, health and education."

In the next paragraph there is a reference to "the progressive deterioration of the NHS".

That is not an isolated opinion.

In education there is a similar grisly story of neglect and under-funding. This is producing rumbling and seething discontent at all levels among parents, teachers, students, university professors and others. I shall quote from an article written by Sir Kenneth Alexander that appeared in the Scottish Sunday Mail on 16 February. Sir Kenneth, who is the principal and vice-chancellor of Stirling university, wrote:

"top talent from Scottish universities is continuously draining away. And goes virtually un-noticed.

Within two years four professors have left Stirling. Two went to the USA and two to Australia, and it was a severe loss to a small university.

The process mostly affects science and technology, but talent is also drained from the arts, languages and culture.

The professors we lost overseas were in biological science, accountancy and business law, maths and philosophy.

Most professors going to the USA will enjoy at least a 50 per cent. increase in real income — with many doubling their salaries."

Sir Kenneth then addressed himself to Strathclyde university and wrote:

"Strathclyde lists five departures to the USA and three to Norway in the last two years. Edinburgh reports that a major project, given special support as being of international standing, is being substantially hindered because two key personnel have gone to the USA.

The Glasgow School of Art is losing its brilliant director to Chicago.

In addition to the overseas brain drain, losses to industry in the UK are reported by all universities.

A technological university in England recently held ten professorships vacant — a deliberate decision by the vice-chancellor, who couldn't get good enough candidates."

Sir Kenneth concluded — [Interruption.] It is interesting that Conservative Members do not want to hear an exposé of what is happening in Britain. When listening to the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday, no one would have thought that the problems which I have recited are exercising the minds of many responsible people in all political parties.

Sir Kenneth concluded:

"When too high a proportion of a nation's intellectual seed-corn goes abroad, there is trouble ahead."

That is happening at a time when the Government have the benefit of North sea oil revenues. How much worse will the problem become as the revenues rapidly cease to exist? It is a frightening proposition. In the context of the long-term well-being of the United Kingdom, the Budget must be seen as little more than short-sighted and mean-minded. The one thought uppermost in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and that of the Prime Minister was all too obvious. They were intent on winning votes at the next general election, and damn the consequences.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I shall not take up the comments of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) except on a few matters as I proceed with my speech. First, I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the simple way in which he has laid out his Budget. His statement was easy to understand and I have never known a more comprehensive and clear exposé than that which my right hon. Friend gave yesterday of Britain's financial position.

I pay tribute to the Government's sound monetary policy and their control of inflation, which is probably one of the most important factors in the economy. Inflation is now running at 5 per cent. and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates that it might fall to 3·5 per cent. next year. The record of the previous Labour Government on inflaton and the control of it bears no comparison with what we have been able to achieve. When the previous Labour Government were in office, inflation was something over 20 per cent. Over the years, it increased to 27 per cent. or 24 per cent. The Government's control of inflation is a remarkable achievement.

At the same time, growth is running at 3·5 per cent., and it is estimated that it will increase to 5 per cent. next year. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) said, our old industries, which were overmanned, are beginning to fade away. They are being replaced by new industries with fewer employees, and this is producing an extremely worrying situation. I welcome the schemes which have been introduced to assist young people, which are ingenious and well thought out.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) addressed themselves to unemployment. I listened especially carefully to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman. As always, his remedy for unemployment was to borrow, borrow and borrow again. I found it difficult to estimate what it would cost in money terms to implement the programmes which he suggested. He spelt out the cost of the various programmes bit by bit but he did not present the House with the overall cost. I hope that the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) will take up this important matter when she replies.

The Government have created 700,000 jobs, and I acknowledge that that has reduced unemployment by only a fraction. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that a Labour Government could cure unemployment, but I suggest that that would be done by borrowing, in the same way as the previous Labour Government. I have no doubt that the result would be the IMF moving in as it did then.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) was wise when he spoke of the serious strain that unemployment imposes on Britain's resources whichever Government happen to be in power. For once, the right hon. Gentleman was right.

I was surprised by the agreement of the right hon. Member for Hillhead about investment abroad, which now stands at £90 billion. I understand that this investment yields about £6 billion a year. Our overseas investments provide a great source of revenue.

The capital transfer tax concession will help the continuation of small family businesses. We are talking about steady expansion. As the Chancellor said, expansion is determined by many factors, but the principal one is that if the public sector borrowing requirement is controlled and if labour costs are restrained, then there is the opportunity and the right climate for expansion. That applies especially to small businesses to which my right hon. Friend has paid so much attention in the past and to which he has given much of his time.

A property-owning democracy is one of the bulwarks of Tory philosophy. As we know, home ownership has increased, but equally important is wider share ownership in the denationalised industries and the concept of the people having a shareholding and owning a stake in the country. It is of paramount importance that they have a stake in the industry in which they work, and the £2,400 a year tax concession is certainly an incentive towards that goal.

I should like to see shares being owned by more ordinary people. Figures show that a great proportion of shares are owned by great institutions, but I should like to see share ownership apread much wider so that the ordinary man can be a shareholder and a property owner. I am certain that is the meaning of a property-owning democracy.

One of the problems that has for years taxed successive Administrations is how to deal with charities. I have seen numerous early-day motions of one form or another and all of them have touched on the same point—how can we help charities? While the state provides a certain amount of help, it is the voluntary organisations upon which we rely for many services, and to be able to give them more money by the incentives produced by the Chancellor is commendable and will be welcomed on both sides of the House and certainly by all sections of the community.

I am sorry to say that there is one point upon which I do not agree with the Chancellor; that is the penny off the income tax. I would rather see the threshold reduced. I say that for two reasons. My first reason is that it would have a good effect because it is important to narrow the gap between what is earned from work and what an unemployed person receives from the state. Secondly, it would give people an incentive to work. A penny off the top does not make much difference, but reducing the threshold would be far more acceptable because it would reduce the number of taxpayers and tax inspectors and narrow the gap between earnings and social security payments.

Britain has the beginnings of a great expansion. It will be a new expansion and one in which the economy will be strong enough to be able to give more by way of public and social services. There is no point in saying that we should spend more in this or that area, because the money has to come from somewhere and it can only come from proper administration. We cannot get money out of the sky. It has to be earned and the only way of earning it is by increasing our economic capacity and the output of our industries and selling it to other countries. As I said earlier, those industries have to be changed and our whole concept of industry has to be altered. We must recognise that some of the traditional industries will have to go and will need to be replaced. I know that that will create problems but I am afraid that change will have to be accepted. The encouragement the Chancellor has given to the saver and to small businesses is most encouraging.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): There are some good and sensible elements in the Budget. They are few, but one of them that I readily acknowledge is the decision to make concessions to charities. That is long overdue — not just from a Conservative Administration—but it is a fine gesture.

I was also pleased to hear about the increase in the tax on cigarettes. I sincerely hope that as a direct result of that increase we will see a sharp diminution in the consumption of cigarettes. Far too many people in Britain often meet a painful and premature end as a result of that form of drug abuse. There is a warning there for some hon. Members. I am certainly not aiming my remarks at you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was sorry to learn of the refusal to introduce a swingeing increase on the tax on drink, because alcoholic beverages are far too cheap.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Killjoy.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) says that I am a killjoy. I am not a killjoy, nor am I a prohibitionist—not by a long chalk—but if it is correct, as has been suggested in a recent Select Committee report, that the drug of choice for far too many Americans is cocaine, certainly the drug of choice for far too many British people and far too many youngsters is alcohol. It is a major social evil, and I should like to see it costing more.

I want to focus attention not on drink or on tobacco, but on unemployment and poverty. I have a lot of sympathy with this morning's editorial in The Scotsman, which says:

"What will not escape criticism is his refusal to make any concessions to those, including many of his Cabinet colleagues, who consider that the Government's priority ought to be tackling unemployment. His measures on the jobs programme front will cost a net £165 million which, in what he describes as the fastest growing economy in Europe, is only the small change. He has changed neither his remedies nor excuses though the case for more public investment is accepted everywhere but in Downing Street. Even the £900 million he has conceded to taxpayers, the brightest of all the pieces of tinsel, would have produced a better return in jobs had it been directed not to people's pockets but to their roads, houses, schools and hospitals."

The Chancellor has given little hope to the millions of British citizens living in poverty. I say that despite his statement that a total of £485 million is to be spent on additional measures to tackle unemployment. The right hon. Gentleman claims that such proposals are aimed at helping young people aged between 18 and 20, and those unemployed people aged over 45. I believe that the total is made up of £195 million in 1986-87 and £290 million in the following year. That money will be taken from the reserve so that there will be no increase in public expenditure planning totals. I give those five main measures—the enterprise allowance scheme, the small firms loan guarantee scheme, the new workers scheme, the community programme, and counselling for the older unemployed—a qualified welcome. Indeed, the latter may be important in helping many dispirited middle-aged unemployed people.

However, the expansion of the community programme should be accompanied by a much better wage than the increase from £63 to £67 per week. My experience of the community programme and of the complaints that some of my constituents have made leads me to say that the Chancellor should urge on his colleagues in the Department of Employment the need to eliminate, wherever possible, the lengthy, cumbersome and bureaucratic procedures and regulations surrounding such programmes and applications for assistance.

The Chancellor's so-called employment measures have met with a sceptical, if not jaundiced, reaction in Scotland. This morning, the chairman of the Scottish CBI, Mr. Ian Little, said:

"The Chancellor has missed the opportunity created by the strengthening UK economy to make a substantial attack on unemployment . . . The figure is likely to stay at the present horrific level for some time to come. He could have taken the opportunity to expand public sector capital investment rather than taking the wrong course on personal taxation. Those at the bottom of the tax ladder caught in the poverty trap are still not going to escape into work."

The truth is that the Budget will do nothing for the 370,000 Scots who are registered as unemployed. The unemployment statistics for my constituency are a scandal. In Greenock and Port Glasgow 9,000 people are unemployed. In the Greenock travel-to-work area, which embraces part of the constituency represented by the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), the number of unemployed stands at 10,500. I am using February 1986 figures. I can tell the Chancellor that the unemployment rate in that travel-to-work area stands at 21·9 per cent. Moreover, male unemployment is 26·1 per cent.

Unemployment in the Strathclyde region is almost 44 per cent. higher than the figure for Great Britain as a whole. In addition, the figure for the Greenock travel-to-work area is about 60 per cent. higher than the figure for Great Britain. However, I have painted only part of the very dismal picture of poverty in the west of Scotland. In November 1979, there were 157,000 supplementary benefit claimants in Strathclyde. By July 1985, that figure had risen to 305,000 claimants—an increase of 94 per cent. That massive increase is largely the result of the Government's economic policies.

In Scotland as a whole, 531,000 people were claiming supplementary benefit in July 1985. So far I have mentioned only claimants, but if their dependants are included — wives, husbands, and children — the total number relying on supplementary benefit in Strathclyde in July 1985 was 495,000, or 20 per cent. of the population. The figure for Scotland was 867,000, or 16 per cent. of the population.

The figure for Glasgow is much worse. About 39·5 per cent. of the population of that great city exist on, or below, the level of supplementary benefit. The Government may have written off Scotland's economy, but it is becoming increasingly clear that Scotland has written off the Tory party. Recent opinion polls show that to be the case, as does the disastrous result for the Tory party in a recent by-election. Indeed, I believe that the Tory candidate finished behind the Communist party candidate.

Mr. Hirst: The Labour party lost the seat.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I must tell the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) that the Labour party won that seat.

Mr. Hirst: It lost five others though.

Dr. Godman: As always, the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden is rather adrift from reality.

I make no apology for voicing my concern about the problems of unemployment and poverty in Scotland or for focusing my criticisms on the Government's failure to deal effectively with such scandalous issues. Scotland has experienced both decline and growth in industry, neither of which began in May 1979. Once a leader in shipbuilding, marine engineering, steel-making, heavy engineering and manufacturing industry, the country is now seriously adrift in the league of advanced industrial nations. There has been a dreadful decline in employment in all those industries, as well as in textiles, clothing, motor car manufacture, and coal mining.

Taking 1980 as the base year, the index for employment in manufacturing in Scotland was 111·4 in 1977. By June 1985 it had slipped to 76·5. Last year, a Scottish economist, Mr. Bell, said:

"The rate of growth of real incomes in Scotland lags way behind that in the United States of America, France, West Germany and Japan . . . These countries have also, by and large, provided a continuous growth in employment to absorb any increase in labour supply . . . In Scotland, employment opportunities have tended to decline even though labour supply has increased, leaving little option but emigration or unemployment".

Emigration is the traditional Scottish solution to unemployment. In last year's Budget debate, the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) said that if it were not for the 18,000 skilled Scots leaving the country each year, unemployment would be far worse. During a debate in the House last year, I said that North sea oil, the new high technology industries and the service industries, particularly the tourist industry, had saved Scotland from utter humiliation, but that for many Scots the experience was one of poverty amidst much affluence. One year later, the position is precisely the same for many Scots. Last year's Budget was not one for jobs. The same can be said of this one. In the debate on the economy and industry in Scotland, I said:

"Investment in the infrastructure would be one of my policy recommendations. Such investment is desperately needed in my constituency for the replacement or modernisation of a decaying housing stock. Secondly, economic trade and industrial policies should be centred on a precise objective—the development of a manufacturing industry which can compete in all the worlds markets."

I went on to quote Sir Alec Cairncross in a paper that he presented a few months earlier, when he said:

"In the end we cannot escape from the present depression without a large increase in demand and there is no likelihood of such an increase without an initiative on the part of governments. It is pure fantasy to suppose that output will recover of itself." —[Official Report, 29 March 1985; Vol. 76, c. 816-17.]

The only reversal of the Government's employment policies that I have come across recently has been the decision by the Secretary of State for Social Services to increase over the next year by more than 5,000 the number of officials employed in local DHSS offices. This is needed to deal with our worsening economic circumstances and the growing number of claimants. That reversal of Government policy, in terms of increasing numbers in that Department, more than anything else shows to my mind the measure of this Government's economic policy.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) does not seem to understand that in recent years Scotland has had the second highest GDP in Great Britain, after the south-east and East Anglia. There has been tremendous growth there, which has not been reflected in the north-east and north-west, and if the hon. Gentleman does not understand that, I invite him to visit some of the other regions of our country.

This is a popular Budget, and it has had a good press. It is a people's Budget, and I do not say that in respect of the various alliances and the bits and pieces of good news. Time and again, when weighing up the balance of advantage, one sees that it is a people's Budget, because the Chancellor has favoured individuals rather than institutions. That is as true of the cut in the base rate as it is of the imaginative new schemes for share ownership, capital transfer tax and the relief on giving to charities rather than to the institution receiving it. It is also true of the training measures, where the emphasis is on job clubs, job start, the enterprise scheme, and on the individual trying to get himself into work, rather than on the organisation that might or might not be helping him to do so.

That has to be right, because individuals, after all, are the key to enterprise. It is the individual release of talent and energy, of personal potential, that will create an enterprise culture. It will not be done by politicians, enterprise boards, county councils, development agencies or all the machinery and paraphernalia of the 1960s and 1970s.

Job creation will in the end depend on individuals, and I should like to stress four aspects. First, and most important, there is employment. We can no longer depend in our industrial society on large employers and on job-intensive, internationally mobile investment. Our culture has to rely much less in the employee mentality and much more on the self-starter, the risk taker, the small business man and the new business man. I give a warm welcome to the extension of the enterprise scheme; to the 100,000 places that will be provided by this low-cost, high-value scheme, because 70 to 80 per cent. of those who pass through the scheme are still in business long after the subsidy stops.

I also particularly welcome the extension of the job club and job start scheme nationwide, which restores the link — which I do not think should have been broken, although I understand how Sir Derek Rayner recommended that it should be broken — between the unemployment office and jobcentre. The only way to tackle long-term unemployment is on an individual personal basis, by calling in the individual who is out of work and offering him practical help and a real measure of support.

In placing the emphasis on that kind of support, the Government recognise that this is part of a much more general change in the nature of employment in our industrial culture, which embraces the growth in part-time working, contract working and the huge increase in self-employment. There is a curious paradox in a society with too high unemployment. As the manager of my local unemployment benefit office put it, "There is plenty of work about, but very few jobs." That distinction is still not properly understood in Whitehall, and the implications for the better and more rapid distribution of jobs into work really needs to be followed through.

Mr. Maxton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fallon: No, I will not.

There are two ways in which it has to be followed through. We need to boost the self-employed. The self-employed are the enterprise corps at the heart of our economy. There are 2·6 million of them now — up nearly 1 million since the Government came into power. More significant than that, one in three of the self-employed hope to take on another person within two years. That will mean 750,000 new jobs.

We need to help make that happen. I should like to see us cut national insurance contributions for the self-employed further and make self-employment a right for anyone who wants to be self-employed, rather than a privilege accorded, after long deliberation, by officials in the Inland Revenue. I should like to make VAT registration an option—not compulsory—for the self-employed, so that if it is beneficial to them they can register, and if it is not they need not do so.

We need to do something about the black economy. We need to buy it in. The black and grey economies are rampant in my region. They are far larger than the Inland Revenue thinks, especially in areas of high unemployment. I should like to see a radical, imaginative approach by the Treasury, to offer incentives to get people to cross the line from the black and grey economies into the white economy; to bring the Arthur Dalys and Terry McCanns out of the Winchester club into the legit world, so that they can pay in a little revenue in taxation.

Let us have an imaginative proposal to pull those self-employed people, who have these nice little earners after their main job, or those who are out of work and earning a little on the side, into our system. A few months after the Bill becomes law, why not have an amnesty for two or more months, with no retrospection. Let us not look back at anything that has gone before. Let say to them, "Come on down. Cross the line. Pay a little tax and national insurance, and from that point on we will consider you part of the system. There could perhaps be tougher penalties thereafter for non-declaration."

On share ownership, I give a warm welcome to the personal equity plan. I have no hesitation in saying that my right hon. Friend went further than I had dreamt or even hoped as part of his moves to widen share ownership. It has been obvious that simply selling shares in public utilities, important as it is, would not in itself dramatically extend share ownership in the way that we have dramatically extended home ownership.

That has been a huge achievement, but nonetheless there is a striking disparity between what we have achieved in home ownership and what we have yet to achieve in share ownership. I had it costed last year, and it was calculated that the average Briton puts into his home about £654 a year in mortgage payments, repairs or rent, whereas the average commitment of each of us to share ownership of industry and our place of work is £2·20. In other words, each of us in investing 300 times more in his home than in his place of work. I welcome the introduction of the personal equity plan and the measures, on which my right hon. Friend will consult industry, to widen share ownership and to convert us from a nation of small shopkeepers to a nation of small shareholders.

Another side to that policy is the need to ensure that the huge growth in home ownership is not artificially stimulated by too liberal a credit policy. We must ensure that growth in home lending is real and organic, rather than being driven merely by favourable fiscal treatment. In other words, I do not believe that mortgage tax relief at the higher rates can escape my right hon. Friend's review if it is shown that house prices are being driven up and that the real benefit passes through the recipient into the price of the land. That would make initial purchase more difficult, rather than less difficult, for the first-time buyer and would widen the differences between the north and south of our country by making mobility and the movement of the middle and lower management sectors that much more expensive.

I welcome the cut in the base rate, which benefits everyone and, most important, the lower paid. I welcome even more the commitment of cuts to come. I also welcome the reminder of the present Foreign Secretary's original commitment to 25 per cent. income tax, which was made in 1979. It is a commitment which I am sure the Treasury has not forgotten. It will mean our money coming back in our pockets, and that is the best employment policy of all.

In the meantime, on the road to 25 per cent. tax, I can cheer the tax breaks that are being given to pensioners this year. We should not forget that 40 per cent. of all pensioners pay tax, and that they have paid quite enough tax as it is during their working lifetime. I also welcome the tax breaks for donors to charities.

In the longer term, as we pursue the goal of 25 per cent. tax, it will be important to ensure a greater contribution to it from those institutions which at present benefit too favourably from the tax system, such as the pension funds, banks, and some financial services.

In my view, there is no case at all for tax breaks for the City. There is already a danger that the big bang will become an excuse for quite unjustifiably high salaries. The stronger our commitment to a market economy, the more ruthless we must be in tackling fraud—and to be seen to be tackling it—and taxing money which at best can be said to be ill-made.

In that connection, I should like to comment on the business expansion scheme. It will not have escaped the notice of the Treasury that too many of these schemes are essentially candy floss schemes. Some of them have been very important in attracting new venture capital into investment, and I know that a high proportion of that has gone into manufacturing industry, but even after the tightening up about which we heard yesterday, some of these schemes remain candy floss schemes in which the principal beneficiaries are the directors, whose salaries and pension prospects are enhanced, or the banks and the funds which have placed these schemes and have earned large commissions as a result.

I suspect that too little of the risk involved is low risk rather than high risk, and that too little of the money is getting out of the south-east into our older industrial areas. I very much hope that the next time my right hon. Friend looks at the business expansion scheme and tightens it up further, after removing the mainly asset-based schemes, he will look at the possibility of establishing job-creating criteria which can be applied to other policies, such as regional industrial assistance.

I am suggesting that fiscal reform is by no means complete. I hope that I can be assured that the programme of fiscal reform will not in future years be restricted by political lobbying and the vested interests which will obviously be upset. I hope that we will restore the goal of fiscal neutrality and continue a medium-term fiscal strategy to complement the medium-term financial strategy. I accept that in that programme the Treasury cannot fight alone. It will need a substantial input from other Departments of State, and it will also require other measures by other Departments to continue to loosen up our labour market.

The truth is that too many people in our industrial culture are trapped on council estates in the province of high-spending councils. They have the low-rented council house, the free bus pass and the regular giro. But they do not have a job, and they do not yet have the chance to move to a job or to price themselves into a job, perhaps in another part of the country.

Given that programme of continuing fiscal and labour market reform, and given my right hon. Friend's promises to continue to tackle national insurance contributions, personal taxation and his moves towards employee share ownership, the verdict on a popular Budget from a people's Chancellor—certainly from those who want to set these people free, particularly in the north of the country, and who want to release the individual talent and energy that is at present wasted on unemployment—remains proxime accessit.

7.9 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): It is always of interest to follow the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), because he is a constituency neighbour. I listened with great interest to his speech. Along with his hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant), he made a number of propositions to the local newspaper that were obviously designed for local consumption before the Budget. He referred to one of them this evening when he spoke of the black economy. The hon. Gentleman will recall as well as I do what the Northern Echo thought of those comments.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned a series of fictional television characters whom he believed we ought to copy, but most of those characters are crooks. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is genuine and sincere in thinking that we should adopt the kind of model to which he referred as the model for the north-east. He also made great play of the black economy in the north-east.

A feeling that afflicts many in the north-east, not only the hon. Member for Darlington, is that somehow the prosperity in that region is based on the black economy and that the people that can buy goods in the shopping centres can do so because they have earned their money in an underhand fashion. I reject totally the suggestion that there is such a black economy in the north-east. I reject totally also the concept that those who fiddle ought somehow to be given an amnesty so that they stop the fiddling. If the hon. Member for Darlington believes that a black economy exists he should ask himself why it exists after something like six years of a Tory Government. He seems to mix his high monetarist principles with a concern for his constituents and for the rest of the people in the north-east. I am prepared to give him the benefit of the doubt about his concern and to say that it is genuine.

The hon. Member talks of low-rent council houses, of those with free bus passes and of giro, but of course he has not had personal experience of having to wait for a giro coming at the end of the week and the dilemma of those who, if for any reason the giro does not arrive on a Friday, have to wait until the Monday without the benefit of a cheque book or a credit card. It is for all these people, many of whom live in my constituency, that we are concerned about this Budget and the fact that it does not address itself to the ordinary people who live in the council estates and in the terraced houses in my constituency and elsewhere.

I do not wish to broaden the debate to all the aspects of the Budget, but I will confine my remarks as much as possible to the impact of the fall in oil prices upon our economy, on which the Chancellor spent some time yesterday. I submit that the Chancellor has made a monumental blunder in his assessment of the impact of the fall in oil prices upon our economy. Over a period of weeks, even months, he maintained a haughty silence on the subject. Yesterday he accepted that the oil price fall has bitten deep into our North sea oil tax revenues and our earnings from exports. In fact, the fall has wiped £6,000 million from the national economy. That is the exact amount of the Contingency Fund. It is also twice the cost of the Falklands war. For every $1 fall in the price of a barrel of oil, a further £500 million is wiped from the revenue, and that is on the assumption that the exchange rate against the dollar stays as it is today.

In his budget statement yesterday the Chancellor made the remarkable claim that the fall in oil prices takes us back in real terms not to 1979, when the price of oil shot up from $12 to $30 a barrel, but to 1973, before the Yom Kippur war and before the recession which the massive increase in the price of oil—at that time from $3 to $12 a barrel—had inaugurated. It also takes us back to a time when Great Britain was still relatively holding its own in the export of manufactured goods and before North sea oil truly came on stream, although the report of the Select Committee on Overseas Trade from another place makes it clear that by 1972, in relation to manufactured exports, the rot had already begun to set in.

The Chancellor yesterday implicitly accepted that for the outside world the pound sterling is a petrocurrency, for in his Budget statement he accepted that he had intervened earlier in the year, in January, with a 1 per cent. increase in the interest rate in order to prevent a free fall in our exchange rate. The fact that this put up our industrial costs and made our industrial goods less competitive apparently hardly crossed his mind. We see again the familiar emphasis on the City and the importance of confidence in the City, as opposed to the importance of building up our industry and keeping interest rates, and therefore the cost of industry, down.

The Chancellor also admitted yesterday that he had resisted the pressure to raise interest rates still further. He claimed that he did this in order to quell the turmoil in the financial markets caused by the free fall in the price of oil. He has not, however, addressed his mind to what the consequences will be for sterling in the event of the oil price falling still further, and even less to what the attitude of the British Government should be if the price should drift slowly down to $8 a barrel with the onset of the summer and the traditional weak demand for oil.

The true hostage to fortune was the Chancellor's statement:

"there is no question whatever, and never has been any question, of the United Kingdom cutting back its oil production in an attempt to secure a higher price." [Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

Those words are not — nor could they be — a true statement of fact. At least they lay to rest the shibboleth that the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot intervene with the oil companies, a pretence that he and the Secretary of State for Energy have kept up for some time, stating that there is a free market in North sea oil and therefore the Government cannot tell the oil companies how much they should be pumping.

Of course, that has not been accepted by any of the oil-producing countries. The Egyptian oil Minister, when he went to the conference of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries this week, echoed the words of the Secretary of State for Energy, saying that the Government could not intervene, but no other OPEC country believes that—certainly not the Government of Saudi Arabia. The British Government can intervene with the oil companies if they wish, and the message from the Chancellor yesterday was that they do not so wish.

Another statement that the Chancellor put out yesterday attributed the success of North sea oil to the fact that it is the freest oil province in the world. He was paying homage there to the statement that the Prime Minister had made before him. But the success of North sea oil has nothing to do with its being a so-called free oil province. It is, in the first instance, a national bonanza, an unexpected energy resource that we have found in the bed of the North sea and in which £36 billion was invested between 1965 and 1985. Because of its national importance, the Labour Government set up the British National Oil Corporation to protect the national interest, although, in order to assist the oil companies, the Labour Government of 1974 agreed not to interfere in oil production for a period of 10 years. Therefore, with the British National Oil Corporation, the oil companies were as free then as they are now to bring the oil out from under the North sea.

Since 1978 we have seen the importance of oil to our national economy. Eighteen new fields have begun production since 1978 and nine fields have been approved for further future production. Oil should begin to flow from two of those fields from 1987 and from five more in 1988. I mention those figures not only to show the importance of North sea oil to our economy but to show again that there can be and there is no such thing as a free market in oil. If it takes seven years to find the oil, to put the platform modules into place and to draw the oil from the North sea, how can we say that there is a free market as regards the price of oil on a day-to-day basis?

The oil industry employs over 60,000 people, 29,000 of whom work on installations on the United Kingdom continental shelf, surface vessels and manned mobile drilling rigs and, of course, in the refinery industry and the module yards. I declare a constituency interest here because we have a series of module yards on Teesside. They recently obtained £85 million-worth of orders from Shell for continuing exploration for oil in the North sea.

However, none of this—this is the point that I want to make—has anything to do with a free North sea oil province. It has everything to do with the nature of the product, the investment over 20 years and the input of the work force. If we were able to get back to a British National Oil Corporation tomorrow, the benefits would be even greater, for we should be able to get some planning into our North sea oil production, the depletion of which must be a matter of national concern, while at the same time avoiding the disasters inherent in the Chancellor's present policy.

The Chancellor's second misstatement was

"we are not only, or even principally, a major oil producer".

In fact, only the United States, the Soviet Union and Saudi Arabia produce more oil than we do. If being the fourth producer in the world does not make us a major oil producer, it is difficult to see what does. The Chancellor compounded that misstatement by declaring:

"we are also a major world producer and trader of many other goods and services—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

The recent report by the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade showed us just how far we have fallen away as an industrial power. We import more manufactured goods than we export. The report showed how enfeebled we have become in the world of competition.

The Chief Secretary spent much of his speech making unconstructive attacks on the Opposition, the shadow Chancellor and the costing of our proposed Budget. He did not seek to draw attention to the massive deterioration in our surplus in manufactured goods since 1980.

The House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade cited startling figures showing that we have fallen from a surplus in manufactured goods of £5·5 billion in 1980 to a deficit of almost £4 billion in 1984—a deficit equal to 8·25 per cent. of manufactured exports and 1·2 per cent. of GDP. We can see, therefore, how important it was for the Government not only not to refer to that report but even to rubbish it, as the Chancellor did yesterday.

As usual, when one hears the Chancellor's Budget speech—yesterday's speech was the third to which I have listened—it takes a little time to digest it. It takes a little more time when one reads through the speech carefully to find his sleight of hand. Yesterday, he was boldness personified, because he actually dared to quote part of the report by the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade, when he said:

"as the oil revenues diminish the country will experience adverse effects which will worsen with time".

Yesterday, the Chancellor again refused to face the prospect of an oil price of $8 a barrel. He again preferred not to face the consequences of his policy of non-intervention. Yesterday, that was clearly revealed as the policy of the Chancellor rather than of the Secretary of State for Energy. The Chancellor and the Treasury are making what might be called an energy policy rather than the Secretary of State for Energy and the Department of

[Mr. Stuart Bell]

Energy. The Chancellor, in his haste to wash his hands of the oil policy, pushed—metaphorically at least—the Energy Secretary aside to take the credit for the consequence of falling oil prices. He will continue to do so—provided, of course, that the price does not fall too far.

North sea oil, as the Chancellor predicted, wil last on a diminishing basis for another 25 years. I suppose that that will see the right hon. Gentleman and me through our respective lifetimes. I wonder what future generations will think, looking back at what I have described as this North sea oil bonanza. Will they ask: how was it spent? What happened to it? Where did it go? yesterday, the Chancellor would have been hard pushed to answer any questions on forward planning because he was living in the present—the everlasting present, as some of us might say. He was not prepared to look beyond what could happen if the oil price were to fall cataclysmically still further. He declared:

"If we can survive unscathed the loss of half our North sea oil revenues in less than 25 weeks, the prospective loss of the other half over the remainder of the next 25 years should not cause us undue concern."

The Chancellor will live to regret such statements. Even he had to admit:

"the really big gains will be made by the major non-oil-producing countries, such as Germany and Japan, where growth will be boosted and inflation, already low, is likely to fall virtually to zero."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 168.]

The Chancellor was again acknowledging what he had denied—that British industry would not be in the same competitive position as industry in Japan or Germany. He might have added, for good measure, that we would not be in the same competitive position as France, Italy or the United States.

The Chancellor admitted that our oil exports would decrease, but he avoided giving details. He simply ignored the unpleasant facts. However, oil has accounted for more than 20 per cent. of all United Kingdom exports in the past three years. That represented a sterling value of £16·05 billion in 1985 and £14·85 billion in 1984. Net exports of oil were £8·2 billion and £6·9 billion, respectively, in those years.

Happy is the Chancellor who can sniff at the loss of such exports—happy, or ignorant, or living in a fool's paradise. The Chancellor was simply reinforcing his own self-fulfilling prophecy because, although the oil will last for another 25 years, the impact of lower revenues from it has been expected for some time, and the expectation was that the revenues would decrease as the volume of production fell. The fact that the loss has come earlier has given the Chancellor the opportunity to seek to prove his point—that our economy is essentially service-oriented and that the abolition of exchange controls since 1979 has permitted extra foreign investment. The return on that additional borrowing investment will cover the loss of North sea oil revenue.

The Chancellor said:

"Our net overseas assets have, in fact, risen more than sevenfold from £12 billion at the end of 1979 to almost £90 billion at the end of last year."

Some might feel that that is not a transfer of assets but theft from the British people. It is theft from investment in our country which could have created jobs in Britain, defended traditional industries and made us a competitive force in the world. Japan's success lies in its investment in its country, but we have signally failed to carry such investment forward here. Even the greatest failures that we have with the Chancellor have to be trumpeted as some kind of success.

Yesterday, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"This is a far bigger total than that possessed by any other major nation."

No other nation has invested £90 billion abroad. What other nation would be so crazy as to invest so much of its vital assets in the wealth of other countries? This must be the most lunatic economic policy in the world. The only other major country with larger net overseas assets is Japan, as the Chancellor said. He did not say that Japanese investment is aimed essentially to assist its manufacturing industry and to provide against the day when the major industrial countries begin to close their doors to Japanese imports—hence the Nissan factory in Washington in County Durham, where CKD sets from Japan will be converted into European manufactured goods for the European market.

British investment abroad has been essentially in services and in property. That does not provide work in Britain or safeguard jobs. It provides only profits in the best traditions of the Conservative party, of the Conservative Government and of the City of London. Even the Chancellor, with his usual sleight of hand—as I said, one must read his speeches carefully to see how he covers all his options—agrees that "the British economy may not gain a great deal overall as a result of the oil price collapse"—[Official Report, 18 March 1986, Vol. 94, c. 168-69.]

Of course, there will be considerable differences within the economy. I can list one difference immediately. The fall in oil prices assists European plastics producers who are making their highest profits since the 1970s because the price of naphtha, the industry's chief raw material, has halved since the beginning of the year. There has been no benefit to the consumer. What happens to the consumer in regard to all the benefits? In the plastics industry prices have remained strong and some producers are even seeking increases. Therefore, the benefit is going straight into their pockets, not into the pockets of the consumers.

Yesterday the Chancellor took the easy way out by saying that the price of petrol should come down by about 12p; therefore, although he was putting a higher tax on petrol, he hoped that the petrol companies would not pass it on. How naive can he be? How easy it is to brush aside one's responsibility and put it upon others. Of course the petrol companies will increase their prices, and the extra money will come out of the pocket of the consumer. The electorate will not be fooled by such sleight of hand.

There will be losers because of the rapid fall in the price of oil. The losers will include oil companies, and many will go into bankruptcy. Those which wish to listen have already heard of the severe impact of the fall in oil prices on Texas and Louisiana, on oil drilling in Canada and even on new oil drilling in the North sea. Companies are already cutting back on investment, expansion and exploration because of the drop in the price of oil.

The Chancellor yesterday told us how the Government had weathered the storm of the year-long dispute in the coal industry when the pits were not working. What will happen to the plans for coal and to those who work in that industry as the generating plants of electricity boards change to oil because it will be cheaper? What crisis will we have again in the coal industry? What will the impact of the fall in oil prices be on the module yards, to which I referred earlier, in the north of England and in Scotland? Will they continue to turn out production rigs? Will the refineries which take oil from the North sea find it prohibitive to continue to refine oil when the price falls below $13 a barrel? Will the oil last for even 25 years if exploration in the marginal fields is to cease?

Neither the Chancellor yesterday nor the Chief Secretary to the Treasury today referred to the financial consequences for debtor nations which, although they produce oil, still have to service the massive debts which they have accumulated since 1974. Already the combined current account deficits of Mexico, Egypt, Algeria, Iraq, Iran and Nigeria are projected to be $15 billion. There will have to be more borrowing on the international market from international banks just to enable those countries to stand still. I believe that Mexico has about $90,000 million of debt and needs another $9,000 million to cover the interest which it has to pay. Because of the fall in oil prices, Mexico no longer has the wherewithal to cover such a massive debt.

Probably the Chancellor has already foreseen the consequences of his non-policy on North sea oil production and prices. Already the familiar exercise of washing his hands and transferring the burden of responsibility has begun with the Budget statement. Of course, as he said, and as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said earlier, the conditions are there for British industry to become more competitive. Again the Chancellor warned that labour costs would have to be kept down; but he said that there must be more investment in research, development and training. At least he referred yesterday to the need for more investment. Today the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said that it was the lack of investment in the 1970s which was the cause of the difficulties in industry. Yesterday the Chancellor said:

> "Both the opportunity, and the responsibility to see that it is not thrown aaway, rest fairly and squarely on the shoulders of British management."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 169.]

Surely it rests fairly and squarely on the shoulders of the British Government and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Thanks to the surplus from North sea oil, the surplus for the year on the balance of payments is £3·5 billion. It is like the man who, having thrown himself out of a window on the 25th floor, half way down says to himself, "This does not hurt a bit." There has already been reference to that twice in today's debate, perhaps because great minds think alike or because hon. Members have come to a sensible conclusion. Having lost £6,000 million of oil revenue in a few weeks and having braced himself for the loss of a further £3,000 million, the Chancellor is saying, "It does not hurt a bit." As oil exports fall and as oil prices are continually whittled away, it will bite on the balance of payments. The advantage of North sea oil will be thrown away even more quickly.

Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday, towards the end of his statement on oil, was reluctantly accepting the serious consequences of the free fall in oil prices for the Treasury. Again, in contradiction to the Chief Secretary, he said that North sea oil revenues, which were likely to be £11·5 billion for 1985-86, would be severely reduced in 1986-87.

I began by saying that the Chancellor had made a monumental blunder in regard to oil. He comforted himself by believing that the price of oil would stabilise at around $15 a barrel, thus halving North sea revenue to £6,000 million. What if the price should fall to $8 a barrel? The consequence will be that the tax revenue will be halved again to £3,000 million. Will the Treasury be able to live with that, too, or will it feel that the time has come to be prudent and to talk to the OPEC producers to see if there can be a planned rather than a free market in oil? We should have a market planned in the interests of consumers and producers.

The fall in the price of oil has presented the Government with an opportunity which they have not had until now. They can regain a position of influence in the world. They can seek to stabilise oil prices so that the gyrations in the price of oil from $12 to $30 a barrel and back again in a decade need not happen again. That would genuinely create conditions for a planned and steady growth that would be of benefit to the world. By washing his hands of that opportunity, the Chancellor lost the chance to show leadership. He lost the chance to show leadership in dealing with a scarce commodity, in preventing yet another energy crisis and in preventing the price of a barrel of oil from going up to $30. In the meantime he has brought closer the risk of a world monetary collapse, with debtor nations going bankrupt. He said that the British economy will find more minuses than pluses as other nation states take advantage of the lower oil prices to our detriment.

Again the Chancellor will have to tell the House that he got things wrong. Last year's Budget was to be a Budget for jobs. In the meantime, 116,000 more people have found themselves out of work. Yesterday he said that there would be no question of talking about a limitation on the production of North sea oil. As others have learnt before him, he, too, will learn that jaw-jaw is better than war-war on the oil front. In any event he will find that there will not be scope for his promised tax cuts. All there will be room for are more asset sales to keep the Budget afloat and to make up for the loss in revenue from North sea oil.

The debate should be constructive and objective rather than having the Chief Secretary to the Treasury seeking to score easy political points. The world has a major problem in the production of oil and its price. The Government have an opportunity to add their weight to the resolution of that problem. They refuse to do so for ideological reasons because they believe in the so-called free market. They do not believe in protecting our investment in the North sea.

It will be a tragedy for all the British people—for all those who work in the oil industry and for everyone else when we seek to help by the creation of jobs and the steadying of prices—if the Government do not, in the weeks and months ahead, take a lead, talk about oil production and prices and thus stabilise the world's energy market.

7.40 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): It ill becomes the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) to lecture hon. Members after a speech lasting more than half an hour, about "jaw-jaw". So far as I could tell, the hon. Gentleman's speech could have been condensed into one sentence: we should join the OPEC cartel. He said that we should enter "meaningful negotiations". I took down his words. I assume that meaningful negotiations must have some intent or purpose.

Mr. Bell rose——

Sir Peter Hordern: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not want to intervene. I shall give way, but the hon. Gentleman had better be quick.

Mr. Bell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Every time one seeks to make a balanced and objective speech on oil prices and oil, the immediate response of Conservative Members is to say that we wish to join the OPEC cartel. That is not the policy of Her Majesty's Opposition. It is not the suggestion that has been made. We do not seek to join OPEC, nor do we advise the Government to do so. To enter into meaningful talks on oil production between OPEC and non-OPEC countries is a constructive suggestion, without the implication which the hon. Gentleman has given to it.

Sir Peter Hordern: I understand that the hon. Gentleman is a lawyer; I do not know whether he is. The truth of the matter is that, however it is wrapped up, meaningful negotiations, if they are to have any meaning, must lead to negotiations towards either production or price fixing. They cannot be otherwise.

I have listened to the hon. Gentleman at great length, and I can say only that if there were such a cartel I wonder how pleased his constituents would be to find that production had been curtailed and that the operations of the oil companies had been restricted in some way.

If it were the case that oil prices were a great deal higher than they are now, no doubt it would be good for our revenue, but it certainly would not be good for world trade, which has received a considerable impetus from the reduction in the price of oil, from which nobody can be calculated to have received greater benefit than Britain as one of the major industrial countries—a point which the Select Committee in the other place might have taken into account.

While I am on that point, the Select Committee might have referred in greater detail to the increase in wage costs which has occurred in Britain and which is still occurring. If the distinguished people on that Committee had bent their energies and influence to keeping down wage costs, which they may be in a position to do, our industry would be in a great deal better position than it is today.

In the introduction to the Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation my right hon. Friend the Chancellor reminds us that before the last war a married man on average earnings paid no income tax. In 1960 the threshold was 60 per cent. of average earnings, and I believe that it is now 38 per cent. My right hon. Friend was right to remind us that if the tax burden is to be further reduced the first need is to contain public expenditure, which, between 1964 and 1984, rose from 35 per cent. to about 45 per cent. of GDP.

After the many compliments that have been paid to my right hon. Friend, especially about charities, the business expansion scheme and the expertly aimed measures to help employment, I hope that I will not sound ungracious if I say that there is still a long way to go, not just in reducing taxation but in recasting our public expenditure so that it accurately reflects the social changes that have occurred over the past 20 years and is far more responsive to modern needs.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his new personal savings plan. It seems to form the third leg of a tripod, the first of which is to own one's own home, the second to provide for one's retirement, and now to provide a savings fund during one's lifetime. I have no doubt that this may take time to catch on, and perhaps it would have been better brought about through specific tax concessions such as in France and the United States. Whatever success there may be will bring with it an increasing sense of security and confidence which could have a profound social effect. I recognise that it is also designed to secure wider ownership, although unhappily not in quite such a generous way as the loi Monory in France.

Let me contrast the tax treatment of those who now wish to buy equities and those who seek to save in Government securities. For years, Government securities have had tax privileges not available to equities. Low coupon gilts, as well as index-linked stocks, have been free of capital gains tax if held to maturity, and only the income element has so far been taxable. Now, as a result of this new and welcome measure, investors may buy equities in their own fund which may be held free of tax on dividends and capital gains.

It would surely make sense to allow the same privilege for Government securities if they were held in a special fund. Otherwise there is bound to be some switching out of Government securities into this new equity fund. The equity fund is bound to be more favourably treated and more warmly received than gilt-edged securities.

I yield to nobody in my admiration for wider share ownership, but there is much to be said for the incentives for saving generally and not just in equities. The savings ratio generally has fallen recently and the real returns now available on Government securities are most attractive. There is a real need, as many who have contributed to this debate have already said, to bring interest rates down. That would be helped by switching from consumption to saving, because lower interest rates encourage investment and it is investment which is fuelling the West German economy.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor mentioned West Germany as a country which benefits relatively more from the fall in oil prices than we do and that is true. Indeed, if one takes into account the recent reduction in taxation in West Germany, which amounts to 13 billion deutschmarks, and adds to that the benefit to the economy from the drop in the price of oil, that produces at least another 13 billion deutschmarks.

This extra demand in West Germany that makes West Germany an extremely attractive target for our own exporters, but of course the West Germans are tough competitors. Last year in West Germany prices rose by 1·3 per cent. and the latest figures show that the rate of inflation is now 0·7 per cent. If things go on as they are there could be a negative rate of inflation. Prices could fall in real terms in West Germany. Over a year ago its prices fell by 1·3 per cent. and its wages are rising by 3·3 per cent. At the moment our prices are rising by 5 per cent. and our wages are rising by 8·6 per cent. The other important point is that three months' money in Germany is 4·5 per cent. In the United Kingdom, even after the drop in the interest rate, it is over 11 per cent.

How is it that the West Germans manage to keep not only their inflation rate but their interest rate so low? They do so by the strictest control of their money supply, and in particular through the control of their central bank money stock. This includes the currency held by non-banks and the required minimum reserves on banks' domestic liability. The only point about this is that monetary policy in West Germany is strictly applied and for the past two or three years, our monetary policy has been at the very least confusing and, in the more important sense, hardly in existence at all. Not only does monetary policy work for the West Germans in the sense that inflation is controlled, but it allows for a continuing regime of low interest rates, which encourage investment.

There are many good things going on in our economy, such as the control of inflation and the record in growth, and I yield to no one in the admiration that I hold for the Government for the way in which they have succeeded in reducing the rate of inflation and advancing the rate of economic growth. However, our level of inflation owes much to the fall in commodity prices, which are now 20 per cent. down from a year ago, and many former Chancellors would have liked such a thing to happen to them.

Growth is uncomfortably dependent at present on consumer expenditure in our economy. Real personal disposable income is due to increase by 5 per cent. this year, and most of this will be reflected in higher spending. That is what the money supply continues to reflect. The M3 statistic is designed no longer to represent a target, but as a sort of running commentary on how free and easy credit is. There is no attempt to regulate the monetary figures, as used to be the case, by selling more gilts than necessary to fund the borrowing requirement—there is over-funding. Instead, we have, as the House must accept, a plastic card economy, which will fuel the consumer boom that is going on. In turn, this is likely to lead to further pressures on wage increases, which will be readily conceded by the likes of Sir John Harvey-Jones, who has the nerve to criticise the Government for not reducing the price of sterling and allowing his products to become more competitive.

In the absence of monetary policy, the Government have only one method to counter defeatist industrialists of the kind who wrote to the House of Lords Select Committee, and that is the interest rate, which will be used whenever it looks as though the exchange rate is falling too far.

However, the interest rate is too blunt a weapon. It would be better to have a proper monetary policy, like the West Germans, so that we can have stable prices and much lower interest rates. In its absence, it is now a complete mystery to me why we have not joined the European monetary system. If we were to join, we should have the additional protection that a closer association with the deutschmark will bring. Somebody must think that it is a bad idea. I do not know who it is, but whoever it is, whether a he or a she, some explanation, of which the House can determine its relative importance, should be given.

It matters that our interest rates are so much higher than anybody else's in real terms. It matters to the Government as well that this is the case. In 1982 and 1983, interest on Government loans amounted to £14·5 billion. The forecast for the coming year is that it will be £18·2 billion. That is 11 per cent. of total expenditure. It is clear that if interest rates remain at the same level as they are, this level and proportion of public debt will assume even greater proportion than it now has of total expenditure. Therefore, from every point of view, it is desirable to reduce the burden of interest rates on Government, expenditure and industry.

It is worth noting that the level of consumer credit is now at an all-time high and growing fast. I notice that in the first three quarters of this financial year, consumer credit was as high as for the whole of the previous year, which was itself at a record level. The evidence points to the need to encourage savings and, besides tax concessions to help industry in many ways, there should be tax concessions on saving. Perhaps the best form would be to encourage the portable pension schemes by more generous concessions. It is horrifying how poorly protected we are for old age. Only a tiny minority retire with two thirds of final salary, and I notice what a powerful position the National Association of Pension Funds has. It had only to fire a few shots across the bows of the Government last year to produce a retreat. It is disgraceful that more is not known of the true level of pension for the great majority of those who retire from occupational schemes.

Most people change jobs at some time in their life, and therefore carry with them only their contributions plus a tiny amount. That is never admitted by the National Association of Pension Funds. Nor does it say that the proportion of people who are protected, so-called, by pension funds remains at about 50 per cent., with the other 50 per cent. of people who retire having no occupational pensions at all. Therefore, the case for portable personal pensions is strong.

There should be tax concessions, of the kind that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has started, in an encouraging way, with his support for personal equity savings, to encourage people to contribute to funds much more than they are likely to do with the rather slim concessions in the social security White Paper, which does not go far enough.

The prospects for the growth of world trade are excellent, for the very reasons that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough was deploring—the fall in the price of oil. It would be good if we could have a larger share in the increase of foreign consumption rather than depend as much as we do on domestic consumption. If we are to have that, we need lower interest rates, which would come from higher savings as well as a low borrowing requirement. It would help nationalised industries in their borrowing and it would help local authorities. It is not enough to keep public borrowing low. We have to have a long-term review of all our public expenditure.

I have to ask why it is that the pattern of our public expenditure is so very different from those of other countries. I recognise that education will never be properly funded while it is supported by the rate support grant, which in its turn is reduced every year as a matter of fixed policy.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): The rate support grant is reduced only by this Government.

Sir Peter Horden: That is not the case. The rate support grant has been reduced by successive Governments over a long time.

Education should be directly funded, like the Health Service, and it is time to look at the organisation and structure of public expenditure. For example, when will we stop supporting cereal farmers? Is there any need for a whole tier of health authorities—the regional health authorities? Why has it been necessary to spend £5,000 million on torpedoes? Could we not have the housing benefit properly reformed in integrating the tax and benefits system?

I think that there is a good case for a Green Paper on public expenditure. We have a good Green Paper on the taxation of husband and wife which breaks new ground and I think that if we were to have a similar Green Paper on a long-term review of public expenditure, we would see whether our public resources are being properly directed.

I think that it is quite right to boost enterprise with job creation schemes as well as training schemes, which are involved in this Budget and in other ways. However, what about education for the large number of youngsters who have not been able to find work? Are we sure that our education budget is sufficient under the present system? Are we directing public expenditure in the best way available? I believe that the whole of our public expenditure needs to be reviewed to see that it is being properly used.

I believe that in our system we have a little too much interest and emphasis on tax reform and not enough on the reform of public expenditure. Much could be done to help housing and other important matters in our economy. The most direct way of doing so would be the abolition of rent control for first time lets. I hope that that will be introduced as soon as we win the next election and that no further excuses will be given. There is nothing worse than the sight of those who want to accept work in busy parts of the country, such as the area I am fortunate enough to represent, only to find that there is nowhere to live. The sooner the Rent Act 1977 is abolished, the better.

I give my right hon. Friend's Budget a sincere welcome. I hope that what I have said will be accepted as a long-term look at what I still think is desirable—the imbalance of our enthusiasm for tax reform and not enough attention to the essential reform of public expenditure.

8.2 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): My views to some extent accord with those of the hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) on the oil price. I have given that matter much thought over the past few weeks and I increasingly draw the conclusion that what is happening to the oil price may spark off a new era in world trade and have a major impact. My natural planning and interventionist instincts have somehow had to be subdued on the question of the oil price and even on the question of negotiations with the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries. I think that there is an argument for keeping out.

That may well appear to be the kind of argument that a Socialist should not advocate. However, I think that the moment we enter into discussions with OPEC, by our presence we imply controls on production and certainly some desire to introduce a mechanism into the pricing arrangements for oil. That in itself may well put a block on the development of world trade. I think that we all have that in common.

I dissent from the view expressed by the hon. Member for Horsham, because I am not altogether convinced that Britain is equipped in every way to deal with the surge in world trade which might arise. I know that falling oil prices have had a good effect on the exchange rate, in that sterling has fallen, and that must obviously help our export efforts. However, even then are we equipped? Do we have the pool of adequately trained people to support the sort of industrial take-off which might take place? Is it not fair to say that substantial damage has been done to the British economy over the past few years, certainly to the industrial base, and that we might not be able to deal with it in the way that we should?

There is another problem. If we accept a non-interventionist policy on oil prices—of which, as I say, I am generally in favour—I think that we must be very wary of political developments in the middle east. They are matters that we would do well not to ignore. Islamic fundamentalism and its growth is geared in many ways to the failure of middle eastern economies, and we must take those matters into account when we take decisions and draw conclusions.

When I was asked yesterday by my local television station, Border Television, what I thought of the Budget, I summed it up by saying that there were a few interesting delicacies to be found, but, in general, it was the same old main course of cod and chips which really would not succeed in putting my constituents, and certainly not the people of Cumbria, back to work.

This is not an imaginative Budget. There are a number of small and interesting measures. For example, I think that the measures introduced to help charities will have a major impact. We should not under-estimate their potential effect on the funding of charities. However, we must not get those minor changes, although they may be important to charities, out of proportion. The effect of the Budget is quite neutral. It will have no real effect on demand in the economy. Indeed, the business men who say to us all the time that enterprise packages require increasingly buoyant markets and increases in consumption, will be upset by this Budget. They may well be making positive noises now, but within a matter of months the truth will sink in and they will realise that we are really in for very little change in the medicine we have had over the past few years.

I want to address my comments to the issue of the £24 billion about which Conservative Members have spoken repeatedly and, I must say, quite successfully over the past week. It is obviously an orchestrated campaign on the Tory Benches. They are feeding out the questions at Prime Minister's Question Time on Tuesdays and Thursdays and they are using every opportunity to discredit the Labour party and its alleged programme.

The £24 billion has no basis. Any hon. Gentleman who does his homework will quickly establish that it has been drawn from a few grey statements and inferences about the priorities of a future Labour Government. It is no more than that. Some Treasury official, pinched by a Minister, has been instructed to put a price on it, and we are now left in the House defending the accusations of the Government who have whole Departments costing out those things. The figure is wrong.

I can say that a Labour Government will increase expenditure in a number of areas. We will easily find the money. If I am right about the impact of the oil price and its affect on world trade and if I am right that the policies of the Labour Government to put people back to work will generate additional wealth which will have to be taxed and therefore increase the tax take of the Labour Treasury, that will provide funds. If I am right that every year since 1979, on average, £3·65 billion of taxation has been removed from the richer people in society and we are to restore levels of taxation, if not to the former levels of 1979, certainly to far greater levels than currently exist for the top 5 per cent., that will produce funds. I believe that, from those sources we will find sufficient money to fund the programme of the next Labour Government, who, in my view, will be elected in 1988.

The problem is that the campaign being waged by Conservative Members may well be getting through today, but in the long term it will not get through. Last weekend on "This Week, Next Week" we saw a junior Minister from the Department of Health and Social Security, pushed into a corner and realising that he was about to be caught out, making statements which he knew were not true. When he was asked by Mr. David Dimbleby where a Labour Government would find the money to fund the child benefit, pension and other benefit increases, he said that we would raise it by way of national insurance contributions. He insisted, throughout 15 minutes of that programme, on adopting that line, knowing that it was not true and that it had already been denied by my right hon. Friend the Shadow Chancellor.

It is obvious that this campaign is being organised on the basis of telling a series of lies. I am not referring to statements in the House, because I know that I am not allowed to use such a word in relation to statements by Ministers, but I can refer to them outside. In the end, when the truth comes out, Conservative Members will have undermined their whole campaign. If they attempt to go into the next election on the basis of a lie, they will quickly be found out. We should remember the headline in the Daily Mail in the 1979 general election. A major lie was told to fool hundreds of thousands of people. It will never happen again.

In his statement, the Chancellor referred to the enterprise culture. That is an interesting term. The first phase of the Government's enterprise culture was the introduction of the business expansion scheme in 1982. It provides us with a good basis on which to examine the success of that approach. I supported the business expansion scheme in part on its introduction, on the basis that it could direct funds into small manufacturing industry. To that extent, it has failed because the Chancellor has refused, apart from a minor amendment last year connected with land, to intervene where abuses are going on. According to the Inland Revenue's statistics, published this year, only 4·4 per cent. of the £700 million invested by the year 1983-84 had gone to the north-west and the north of England, only 12·8 per cent. had been invested in Scotland, Wales, the north-west and the north, and 61 per cent. had been invested in London, the south-east, the south-west and East Anglia. Therefore, there is an emphasis on the south in the location of funding from the business expansion scheme.

Those areas do not provide the industrial base, the engine room, of the British economy in terms of industrial and manufacturing industry. One must ask why the scheme was not devised in such a way that more emphasis was placed on the need to back manufacturing industry in the regions. Under the scheme, most of the money is being invested in the very areas where we have the highest employment—that is to say, the lowest unemployment. If one looks at the regional location of firms financed under the business expansion scheme, one finds that only 8 per cent. are in the north-west and north-east of England, while 53 per cent. are in the south-east, London and the home counties. That is a major problem for the Government, which they should examine. I know that it is hard to regionalise the tax system, but further amendment to the scheme might have the effect of generating business enterprise, certainly in manufacturing, in the areas of the United Kingdom where unemployment is at its highest.

The second phase of the enterprise culture to which the Chancellor referred yesterday is to be found in the personal equity plan that he announced. At first glimpse, I thought that it might take off. I was not endorsing the principle, mainly because I think that it is unnecessary. However, I am not now altogether convinced that it will take off. I have been able to establish that, due to the high threshold for capital gains tax, which this year is to be raised from £5,700 to £6,300, only a small number of people buying personal equity plan packages will benefit from this half of the beneficial arrangements available under the scheme. I should have thought that they would have to invest £20,000, £30,000, £40,000 or £50,000 before they saw any benefit, depending on the level of capital gain. They might benefit from the dividend payment arrangements, but that would never be sufficient to generate enough public interest.

If great public interest is generated, a time bomb will be placed at the heart of the enterprise culture. People like to buy shares when they are going up. Some might say that today we are in bull times, but what happens when we are in bear times? What happens when the market begins to fall, and people point a finger at the Government and say, "It's your fault. That is why we are losing."? A sense of recrimination will set in against the Government if there is a fall in the market. It is highly likely that there will be a fall. The public might be insulated from the fall by the big bang and the interest that it will engender in the City in November, but I believe that it is inevitable that the stock market will fall. In those conditions, many people will be lured into share ownership under the principle of the enterprise culture and the personal equity plan, and, when their investments fall, they will blame the Government.

Furthermore, to some extent those people might come under the looser arrangements in the City after November following the big bang. They might be lured into buying shares that they should never have bought. Under the arrangements in the Financial Services Bill the policing of the City is to be carried out by a private company, the Securities and Investments Board Ltd. It is not a public authority that will police standards in the City; it is a private organisation. There are great dangers in that, certainly if there are failures. Public perception of the City will be affected. A public reaction might set in against many City institutions, which would be unreasonable.

The employment premium scheme provides people with £40 a week if they go into business and if they can cough up the additional £1,000 for the funding of their enterprise. Under the Budget proposals, there is an increase in the number of places available, from 60,000 to 100,000. The complaints that I have heard were about not only the number of places available, but the value of the payment. The sum of £40 a week is too little. That sum should have been inflation-proofed this year.

[Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours]

Many people want to go into business, but find that they can neither raise the £1,000 nor manage on the £40 a week. We are talking about people on the lowest rung of the enterprise ladder. Every help should have been given to them. I vigorously supported the introduction of an allowance when it was first announced by the Government some two or three years ago, following the original six pilot schemes. A mistake has been made. That money should have been raised. Money for capital gains tax or capital transfer tax reductions should have been earmarked for that scheme.

I have a reservation about the community programme. The number of places is to be increased by some 20 per cent. Under the present arrangements, the only people over 25 who can apply for support under the scheme are those on supplementary benefit. That is wrong, because it excludes many people who should be entitled to community programme places. I know that the allocation of places is in favour of those who have been unemployed for more than 12 months, but people who have been unemployed for less than 12 months have an equal right to employment. People throughout the country, certainly my constituents, are sore about that.

Three months ago when the rate support grant settlement was notified to Cumbria, we realised that a great deal of money had been cut from our budget and that, unless we slashed services in a way which the people in the county would find unacceptable — many Conservatives want the services provided by Cumbria county council—the rates would have to increase. No one wanted to do that, but they were increased to compensate for the loss in rate support grant. Yesterday's tax reductions do not cover the rates increase for the majority of people in the county. They are of no consequence to us. What the Government have taken away with one hand they may have given us with the other, but it is insufficient to match our needs.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I shall endeavour to be brief, to allow my colleagues who have sat throughout the debate to have an opportunity to speak.

We have been living with the collapse of oil prices for so many weeks now that many of us have been conditioned to limit our expectations about the Budget. So, like most people, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what appears to be an ingenious Budget, handing out so much and satisfying so many interests. However, I paused this morning after reading the comments of adulation or criticism, depending on the newspaper, to consider how the Budget may affect my constituents. I have listened to the speeches of Labour Members who represent Scottish constituencies, and they make me wonder what part of Scotland I come from because the evidently gloomy picture which they paint is not shared in every part of my constituency.

There is unemployment and the worrying problem of young people who have been unemployed for some time. Therefore, I listened particularly attentively to the measures which the Chancellor announced to assist the long-term unemployed. When I visit local factories I invariably ask the management what it expects of Government, and what the Government can do to help it. After one overlooks a particular gripe, whether for more public expenditure or whatever, management invariably settles for stable economic conditions, low inflation, the prospect of economic growth and, particularly, for lower interest rates.

Managements must all welcome this morning's change in the latter respect. They will have seen the confirmation of those conditions in the Chancellor's forecasts yesterday. When asked about the prospects of employing more people they say that they seek some incentive to make it worthwhile. I hope that the new workers scheme will prove to be a financial incentive to employers, that they will be prepared to take it up and, through it, to generate employment.

I am pleased, as are many of my hon. Friends, that the national restart scheme will provide, not just an allowance, but the opportunity for the long-term unemployed to have a counselling session. There can be no better way to restore the morale of a person who has experienced unemployment for a long time than the knowledge that somebody is sufficiently concerned and is taking a continued interest in one's plight.

Opposition Members condemned the community programme for its shortcomings, but I have seen some of the excellent work that it does. Eighteen months ago when there was a shortage of take-up in the south and places were transferred north of the border, the community programme made a significant surge forward in parts of the west of Scotland where it has already significantly improved some of the areas of dereliction, and provided training for young people into the bargain. They are imaginative, successful schemes, and we should all welcome them.

While I particularly welcome the increase in the number of places, I find, from constituency experience, some of the rules about eligibility particularly irksome. It does not seem reasonable that a man who has been unemployed for more than the qualifying period and who possesses experience to make a significant, worthwhile contribution to the scheme but who happens to have a wife working part time should be excluded. I shall continue to make representations to Ministers to relax the rules in such cases.

I am interested to see further encouragement for the enterprise allowance scheme. Recently, I met several young participants who had taken advantage of the scheme. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) says, they were self starters and had pulled themselves up off the ground. They showed enormous pride in what they could achieve by being self-employed. The importance of proper financial control of a business should be emphasised during the vetting procedure. No matter how talented or how much flair people may have for sales and marketing, if they cannot control the finances of a business, it will not ultimately be successful. There is a responsibility on professional firms to respond with the services that these people need.

We must not allow these improvements in job creation schemes to be obscured by the chorus of critics on the Opposition Benches saying that they are not enough or that there should not be tax cuts. The argument that tax cuts and spending on jobs are mutually exclusive is wholly fallacious. I make no apology for taking the time of the House to say again that tax reductions stimulate demand, which in turn creates lasting, worthwhile jobs. We should be prepared to take the political kudos for lifting 500,000 people out of tax paying altogether and, more particularly in our tax-cutting measures, to direct the principal benefit of those cuts to those on average wages and below. The Opposition cannot have it both ways. They cannot criticise the Government for increasing the tax burden, as the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) did, and then condemn our efforts to reduce that burden in the Budget.

My constituents who are happily in business will be encouraged by the Budget's incentives. I welcome the abolition of capital transfer tax on lifetime transfers. From professional experience I have seen how that tax has borne down—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) may laugh. It may benefit her to speak to the people who create work and provide employment and who have had to live with that tax. The diversion of management skills into looking at ways to carry on a family business while that tax has existed is a complete waste of time. I hope that its abolition will prove worth while to those who wish to pass on family businesses and create employment.

I am delighted to see that the Chancellor has lost none of his enthusiasm for abolishing taxes. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will know that on previous occasions I have offered advice about taxes which may be abolished. Development land tax has been abolished, and today I remind him of capital gains tax. Despite the Finance Act 1985, it remains an iniquitous tax in that it taxes inflationery gains pre-1982. It is probably a disincentive to investment, and it should be a candidate for abolition in 1987, with short-term gains being taxed as income and with a taper for gains on assets held between one and three years.

I am aware that many colleagues wish to speak, so I shall comment on the Budget proposals on charities. I am encouraged and refreshed by the Chancellor's reiteration yesterday of the importance of the voluntary sector. Charities do excellent work, and I am delighted that the Budget proposals recognise that fact. It is good to reverse the automatic conditioning whereby people constantly look to the state to fulfil their every need. The voluntary sector can often fulfil those needs far more efficently.

For many years I have been involved with a Scottish hospital, the Princess Louise Scottish hospital for the war wounded. It does outstandingly good work and about £3 million a year is needed to run it. The hospital frequently complains about the imposition of value added tax on the medical equipment that it requires. It benefits from the largesse of social schemes run by companies and from the contributions that it receives from other voluntary bodies. I am glad that the Budget contains proposals that will encourage company donations and employee tax deductions. I am certain that that hospital, like many other charities, will benefit from the Budget proposals.

Once again I say, as a Scot, to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that the Scotch whisky industry will appreciate the assistance that this year's Budget has given it. During the proceedings in Committee on previous Finance Bills I have criticised the burdens that are placed on that industry. It is vital to Scotland. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) does not recognise the importance of this industry to exports, wealth creation and employment in Scotland. I am certain that the industry will welcome the relief that was afforded it yesterday.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his brevity. I understand that the first Front Bench speakers will seek to catch my eye at about 9.15 pm. I see that about five hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, so the arithmetic is fairly obvious.

8.33 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I noticed with some amusement the anger shown by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) when the Opposition expressed dissent from his comments on capital transfer tax. I wish that I had constituents who could afford to worry about it. Many thousands of my constituents are faced with a much more pressing problem. It is called worrying about a job, or trying to find work for school leavers. Most of my constituents could afford to transfer only their social security payments. They could not transfer their wealth.

What will this Budget do for St. Helens? Will it increase its industrial base? The Budget contains no proposals to aid construction or to encourage investment that might produce more jobs in St. Helens. We talk about capital gains tax. I should like to know how many of my constituents could afford to put aside £200 a month. Many of them have to live on £200 a month. They have to try to keep a family on £200 a month. The idea of saving £200 a month can be only a dream to them. If the Budget meant that every elector in my constituency could put aside £200 a month, we should be going somewhere.

The Budget is supposed to result in a penny off income tax. I ask myself what that means to those who live and, if they are lucky, work in St. Helens. The reality is that if somebody earns under £80 a week it does not mean very much. It means piffling pence. If somebody earns between £80 and £150, again it means piffling pence. Many of my constituents would give their right arm to be able to earn £150 a week.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said that the rates will be increased. Of course they will be increased. Rate support grant is being cut. Furthermore, the abolition of the metropolitan counties will result in an increase in rates. In St. Helens it will result in an increase of 22p in the pound on the rates. That is the consequence of taking over services that were formerly provided by the disbanded metropolitan authority. It is ridiculous to dismantle something that costs money and then to find that the cost of dismantling it imposes an extra burden on the people who live in the area.

Treasury Ministers have the gall to tell those who live in the north of England that this is supposed to be an adventurous Budget, a forward-looking Budget. It is anything but that. It is a Budget of mudge and fudge, of fiddle and squeeze, of giving a little bit more to those who have already got an awful lot of it and doing nothing for those who are at the bottom end of the scale. Oh yes, they have got their allowances and their tax thresholds and a penny has been taken off the standard rate of income tax. But the reality is that the Government have forgotten about the rates that people will have to pay. They have forgotten that in reality this Budget means a few extra pence per week for the average family, if members of that family are lucky enough to have jobs.

The Government keep telling us that they are good for the country and that the Budget is good for the country.

[Mr. Gerald Bermingham]

If the Government had any go about them they would be asking themselves, "How can we get Britain back to work?" I look at the figures contained in the Budget. I am no economist——

Mr. Hirst: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Gentleman says, "Hear, hear." The reality is that I can read a balance sheet and can tell when funds are not being utilised properly.

Last year, £5 billion were held in the reserve. This year, £4·5 billion will be held in the reserve. If I understood the Chancellor's speech correctly, a little of it is to be used for his advice shops for the long-term unemployed. How about the Government being really adventurous and using the rest of the reserve? It should be used for creating jobs in the construction industry. It should be put into the public sector. The Government should take a gamble and do what the Americans have done. They should invest in this country. They should not allow the money to go abroad. The Government will not waste the £4·5 billion by investing it. It might result in getting people back to work. Then they might want to buy goods. They would also pay tax and national insurance contributions. They would not have to draw the dole or get supplementary benefit. If the Government did that, we should begin to cheer.

There is an old economic maxim which goes like this: speculate to accumulate That is as true of individuals as it is of countries and Governments. If the Government believe that they are good for Britain, they should invest in Britain. They should not for ever be thinking of chopping, scrimping and saving. They should not for ever be thinking of what this country can do without. They should begin to think about investing in Britain and putting people back to work. It is not a very adventurous suggestion, but I do not expect for one second that it will be taken on board by the Government.

The Government are headed by a Prime Minister who will sell anything. They intend to sell off the water industry and British Airways. They have already sold off British Telecom. It reminds me of the shopkeeper who sold the shelves. The reality is that we are selling, not investing. But to invest would be to think forward: to think forward about how we can give back respectability and a future to the people of this country.

The object of the Budget must be to help, to encourage, to build. In reality, this Budget helps nobody. Unless one is at the top end of the scale, nobody is helped. What encouragement does this Budget provide for the people of St. Helens? In reality, it means very little to them. The people of St. Helens could tell the Government about the amount of money that needs to be injected into the local economy. They could tell the Government about the need for money to be spent on public sector housing and new houses for first-time buyers, upon industry and the infrastructure. if the Government adopted that policy, the glassworks of St. Helens and its other factories would begin to produce goods and employ people. That is what the people of St. Helens want. But what are they getting? As I said earlier, very few of the people of St. Helens have £200 a month to invest. I say again that many of my constituents have less than £200 a month on which to live. I say to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, do not bring in a Budget that offers so little because it insults so many.

8.40 pm

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): The Leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), is on record as saying that the Government must be judged by their stewardship of the economy. That is indeed an acid test.

Let us cast our minds back to ascertain the precedent. Under both Conservative and Labour Governments since the war there has been a continual series of stop-go policies. What do we see now? Since 1979 there has been steady growth and clear policies, which are key ingredients to investment into the economy both from outside and within.

Where we saw low growth, we see high growth. Our growth is the highest throughout Europe. Indeed, it is even higher than that of the United States. Where we saw high inflation, we see low inflation. Amazingly, inflation has been controlled and pulled down from a staggering high of 27 per cent. Where we saw balance of payments deficits, we see continual balance of payments surpluses. Where we saw low productivity and low profitability, we see high productivity and high profitability.

Where we saw employment decreasing, we see employment rising. Indeed, Britain has achieved the highest rate of job creation throughout Europe over the past two years. We see job creation, wealth creation and the promise of being able to afford to spend much more on improvements to law and order, education, health and social services.

All this has been achieved despite a crippling one-year miners' strike and the loss of £5·5 billion of our oil revenues—that is half of our oil revenues—in less than six months. We now have a steady and growing economy. There is solid, quality growth that is not only non but anti-inflationary. What is most impressive is that it is the manufacturing sector, or non-oil sector, of the economy that has allowed the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be generous in his Budget. I point especially to the treatment of charities. The package for charities is the best that has been offered by any Chancellor.

The leader of the Liberal party set an acid test and the Government have shown that they have achieved that which has eluded all other Governments since the war. They have managed the British economy prudently and successfully and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, his predecessor, his team and the Government generally.

The Budget is courageous as well as being filled with ingenuous and constructive measures. In the long term it is an employment, enterprise and wealth-creating Budget. My right hon. Friend was courageous in resisting the temptation to finance the shortfall in oil revenues by raising the borrowing requirement and, therefore, putting upward pressure on sterling interest rates. It is essential that he continues to manage the economy on a sound and prudent footing and with clear policies because that will create confidence, which in turn will create investment.

I am pleased that my right hon. Friend abolished the tax on lifetime gifts but I am sorry that he did not announce the abolition of capital gains tax. In my opinion CGT is unfair and it wastes an enormous amount of management or enterprise time.

The ingenuity that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has shown in the Budget is outstanding. He was boxed in by the fall in oil revenues, yet he has produced a superbly balanced and creative Budget. The raising of income tax thresholds, skewed heavily towards the lower paid, and the reduction in the basic rate of income tax has achieved a good balance, especially in the light of the NIC measures taken in the last budget.

The withholding tax on foreign performers is innovative. It will not have an adverse effect on them because they would have paid tax in their own countries in any event. The yield of £75 million will finance the capital transfer tax changes, the personal equity plan and the transfer of the pension calculation date from November to April.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer achieved a major initiative in removing some of the discriminatory tax privileges that past Governments have given to the pension funds, which were leading to over-funding. This led to the siphoning off of moneys into major institutions and away from individual hands, and the large institutions have the very worst record of investing in venture capital.

The Budget is constructed to enhance enterprise, and as chairman of the Conservative small businesses committee I thank my right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Financial Secretary for meeting many of the measures for which we have been campaigning. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who was the Minister with responsibility for small businesses, also had some important influence in this area. From a small business point of view, the Budget is outstanding. It is extremely creative. Some of the most notable measures are the raising of VAT thresholds to the EEC maximum, the extension of the loan guarantee scheme and the abolition of the lifetime gifts tax. Those are three substantial measures.

The abolition of the gifts tax must not be under-estimated. There are those who argue against it, and in effect they are arguing for a one-generation economy. It is difficult to start a new business and it is even more difficult to start a successful one. A new business has to meet competition, and when it grows its markets will become increasingly competitive. This measure will prove invaluable when it comes to raising finance to enable the business to expand in competitive international markets where financing "flow production" is often the key.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was absolutely right to close the loopholes in the business expansion scheme. It is important to concentrate the scheme on high-risk, low-asset companies.

The personal equity plan is an outstanding development for enterprise and a real step forward in the creation of venture capital. It is individuals who are both the natural and most efficient investors of venture capital, and not institutions. Individuals better understand and often know individual entrepreneurs, and on the whole they make the most successful investments.

There are no easy answers to dealing with unemployment and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be praised for resisting popular gimmicks. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer, argued that the Government must finance and create jobs; he must learn that it is customers, not financiers, who create jobs. He must realise also that it is entrepreneurs who create customers. The Government have gone for the creation of real jobs that are financed by customers. The Government have created an enterprise culture that will encourage the creation of jobs by encouraging entrepreneurs to start businesses and succeed.

The Government are helping by initiating training schemes. They are spending £2·5 billion on the youth training scheme and they are now offering advice in a consultation process. I welcome the spread nationally of the job club and the job start programmes.

The clear message of the Budget is that the non-oil economy is growing steadily in an anti-inflationary way. The economy is under sound and successful management, which is the envy of those in other political parties and of most Governments in the developed world. The Budget offers real reason for thanks and real hope for better things to come.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his team of Ministers and Civil Servants. They have done an outstanding job.

8.50 pm

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Budget days are usually exciting. However, I have been a Member of this place for seven years and I can say that yesterday was as flat as a pancake. The Government have been in office for seven years and we have had seven years of misery. The Government have blamed the previous Labour Government on numerous occasions for the actions that they have taken. Time is running out for apportioning blame on previous Governments. How many years do the Government need to get the economy going? If seven years is not enough, what do they need—70 years? The Government have an abysmal record.

I was fascinated last night watching the Chancellor making his statement on television. He used graphs during his statement on television, and it struck me how selective he was with his illustrations. On some occasions he quoted from 1983, not from 1979 when this Government came into power. On other occasions he switched and quoted from 1973 and 1974 when there was a world oil crisis. That was the sort of comparison he was making. However, he never presented the people with a graph showing the implications of mass unemployment. He was afraid to put that on the television screens, because it would have shown the people the monstrosity that unemployment has become since this Government came to office.

One after another, Conservative Members have congratulated the Chancellor but I liked the comment made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), that he would not even buy a secondhand bike from the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit). That sentiment will be shared by many people outside this House.

What is wrong with this Budget is that there is no sharing of prosperity. It is the same theme as the one we have had from 1979. Since then there has been the selfishness of consistently giving to the rich, and this Budget is no different.

People have gradually recognised that tax reductions ought not to be the first priority. The Government and Conservative Members proclaim this great achievement of a 1p tax reduction, but I can tell the Government and those hon. Members that people will not jump and shout and sing in the streets about a 1p tax cut. The people that I represent will hardly even notice it. Many industrialists said that tax reductions were not essential to get the economy right. Along with the people, those industrialists said that the best way to use any available money would be by investment in industry. Not only did they call for investment in industry, but they said there ought to be more money for technology and research. We claim that in the long run investments will create prosperity that everyone can share, not just the people in the stock exchange.

We need more skill training. It is ironic that we have a shortage of skilled people, yet this Government in their campaign to make cuts and so-called savings have closed skillcentres. I am a member of the Select Committee on Employment, and nobody is more conscious of the horrific unemployment figures than I am. The measures outlined in the Budget come nowhere near solving some of the problems in that area. After seven years of this Government, we have 3·2 million unemployed. That is the official figure, but it is probably far higher than that. If it were not for the massaging of the figures, we would know the true extent of the problem. Some 1,352,000 have been workless for over a year; 193,000 under 25-year-olds have been workless for between six and 12 months; and 532,000 people have been unemployed for over three years. People are just rotting away, and many of them are highly skilled people. People who are over 50 will probably never work again.

There has been a lack of investment in the infrastructure, and hon. Members who represent city constituencies will recognise the grave deficiencies in housing alone. There is massive unemployment in the building trades, yet there is a desperate need for houses. In the Budget there is no mention of a surge forward to revitalise the building industry, even though people are crying out for help.

Contrary to the Government's claim about investment, there ought to be more massive investment in the National Health Service. I tabled a question today on the behalf of some of the pensioners in my constituency. They ask what kind of sacrifices they are expected to make. It appears that some health authorities are posing questions about a system based on what is referred to as a quality adjusted life years formula. The Government are saying that they have less money for the Health Service. People who are getting on in years and reaching retirement age are asked about their possible life expectancy and the Government are asking whether they should be spending money on such people or saving it. That is creating horror in the minds of old people, but those are the sort of cuts being introduced.

The Chancellor says he has a certain amount of money to spend, but some pensioners are living with cuts year in, year out. Hon. Members will remember that two or three weeks ago there was talk about hardship over the expense of fuel. What mention has been made about giving assistance to old people for fuel bills? There is also hardship relating to transport but things like that do not matter to the Government or to Conservative Members. They are important issues that we should be considering.

This is a cosmetic Budget. The Government are more interested in the stock exchange than in anything else. That has been admitted on numerous occasions by hon. Members on the Government side. Many of my hon. Friends claim that many people in the stock exchange ought to be in prison, but the stock exchange seems to have a new respectability nowadays. Not many of my constituents will queue up at the banks to invest £200 a month in stocks and shares. The looting of public assets cannot go on for ever. What will happen when the Government finally sell off British Gas and British Airways? The time will come when there will be nothing left to sell. Perhaps then they will put Buckingham palace up for sale or put the Palace of Westminster on lease.

The Goverment are building up problems for a future Labour Government to pick up. They have done nothing for the poor or for the pensioners. Of course the next Budget will be quiet different. It will contain the usual manipulation, priming the people to go forward with this dynamic Conservative Government; but, as soon as the election is over, if the Conservatives come back to power, they will resort to the type of economic policy that they are pursuing today.

I hope that my constituents and voters throughout the country will recognise this miserable Budget for the sham it is.

8.58 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I shall address my remarks to the Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation. Its publication marks an important step forward towards the equal treatment of women, and at the same time stresses the importance of marriage in the fabric of our society.

The Green Paper is long overdue, and I congratulate the Government on tackling the issues directly in a well-argued case. I believe that the first requirement of reform must be to place men and women on an absolutely equal basis. It should not matter whether they are married or single, or whether they work unpaid at home for the family, or in the office or factory for pay. A tax system based on the equal treatment of the individual is another step towards a society with those values.

The first step must be a move towards a single personal allowance, with the phasing out of the married man's allowance. Equality of treatment — and flexibility in family relationships — suggests that there should be no distinction between husband and wife. Thus, each individual would be responsible for his or her tax returns and correspondence with the Revenue, and would remain, if they so chose, absolutely independent for tax purposes.

These allowances would apply to all forms of income. The present bizarre treatment of married women in relation to savings income should be ended. That is an important point, and is by no means as peripheral as some would have us believe. It is a mistake to think that only the wealthy have savings income. Everyone with a building society account does. Likewise, as home ownership has moved towards 60 per cent. owner-occupation, as occupation and private pension provision increases, and as employee share schemes multiply, so the level of capital ownership in society rises.

The fact is that the spread of ownership of wealth is improving. A simple example illustrates that. Let us take a couple aged 50 with a mortgage that they have nearly paid off. They may well have savings invested, and the possibility of an occupational pension. Let us then say that the wife's parents die, having previously bought their council house, and that she inherits that house. Even following the appropriate tax, the wife will still have substantial capital to invest. As home ownership spreads, this will be more and more common, and the tax system should recognise it.

I strongly support the case that the Green Paper makes for transferable allowances. I do so because I believe that the current tax regime offers disincentives against marriage, and because equality of treatment between the sexes combined with transferrable allowances will remove that disincentive and alleviate the difficulties experienced by couples when the wife works unpaid in the home.

The Green Paper sets out the figures in paragraph 3.24. Under the present system, there is a sharp increase in the percentage of income paid in tax when a wife stops paid work—hardly an incentive to do so. Nor are some of the attitudes expressed an incentive. I have heard transferable allowances described as a "housewife's charter". Why should that be such a bad thing? There is no finer career for a woman than to be a housewife and a mother. Can there be an hon. Member here who does not recognise the maternal influence on his or her life, beliefs and values? Is it a complete coincidence that for 40 years we have discriminated against women who worked at home with their families, and have witnessed a simultaneous increase in violence and a lack of self-discipline in society?

Society needs to recognise the importance of the role of parents who choose that one should take on the continuous responsibility of caring personally for their families. The more that the state can do to support family units—or rather, the more unnecessary disincentives it can remove—the greater the stability of society as a whole. The consequences, not least in terms of Government expenditure, needed to perform a role historically taken by families themselves, are profound. It is right that the state should regard the family unit as the main building block of society, and marriage as the foundation which supports it. The tax system needs simplicity to be seen to be fair; it needs, too, to reflect society's values. It is, as the Green Paper suggests, invidious to treat one married couple differently from another.

It is argued by some that this form of transferable allowance scatters relief where it is not needed, to the detriment of those with young children in the poverty trap. The argument continues that it would be better to target assistance by, say, abolition of the married man's allowance, and using the money saved to fund a substantial increase in child benefit. But this implies that the state should give greater weight to the bearing and raising of children than it does to a wide range of other unpaid activity which people do, and upon which society also depends to a great extent. Those who argue for the child benefit route are arguing ultimately that the wide range of other voluntary activity should be replaced by state-run bodies, with the bureaucracy and uncertainty of long-term policy that that inevitably implies.

I have heard another argument against transferable allowances. If a spouse transfers allowances to his or her partner, on returning to work later they pay tax from the first penny earned. In some way this is said to be unfair. That is hard to understand. A person returning to work would presumably use his allowance, which would no longer be transferable. That is perfectly equitable. More money would be being earned and the family would be better off overall. The spouse who had previously received the transferred allowance might be paying more tax, but together the couple would be paying less tax, exactly as before, with the same overall relief.

It is worth remembering that it is not just the married woman now who will benefit. The single woman of today will be the married woman of tomorrow. Whether married or single, they should all have the opportunity to make their own choice without disincentives.

Reform of personal tax can do more than stress equality. It can act to encourage self-help, and the removal of high levels of dependence on the state, by use of reliefs and allowances. In the latter category, allowances for the blind, widow's bereavement and dependent relatives, are obvious cases. These are specific allowances, and the transferable allowance will complement them in less specific areas. One such case is that of a dependent relative who does not live under the same roof but whose care prevents a person from seeking paid work.

The other category of relief lies in the area where the state provides a minimum level of provision, but where by personal choice individuals can, throughout their lives, improve upon that. Pensions are the first example of this.

It is right that the state should recognise and make possible the widest possible take-up of occupational and private pension arrangements. Not to do so is to fail to see that Government expenditure has limits, that people prefer to make their own decisions about their lives, and that such relief will assist in mitigating the effects of poverty in old age. The key is Government as facilitator, and not as controller.

The same can be said of housing and mortgage interest tax relief. The ceiling limits are a matter for judgment, but the point of the relief is clear. Owner-occupation implies a personal responsibility for the quality of one's environment. Taking action on repairs is not hamstrung by bureaucracy, or restrictions on how, or when, or by whom that work is done. By providing this relief the Government give impetus to the development of the majority of the nation's housing stock being in the hands of those who have responsibility and direct personal interest in its maintenance. It is cheaper than direct intervention, and allows funds to be provided for the repair and additional provision of public housing.

There is one anomaly in the Green Paper that I would like to see ended. At present, mortgage tax relief is available on the basis of individual borrowers. This means that an unmarried couple receive tax relief on loans up to £60,000, but on marriage this figure falls to £30,000. That is hardly a situation favouring marriage. The answer is for the maximum of £30,000 to apply not to individuals but to the property itself.

These are my personal thoughts on the reform of taxation. I look forward to the earliest introduction of proposals in the Green Paper. The problems are complex, but what is needed is the political will to sort them out. It is outrageous that this discrimination against women still continues, and the sooner we correct it, the better.

9.9 pm

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): A few weeks ago in an interview with CBI News, the Prime Minister trailed what she thought should happen in the Budget. In her usual style she lectured the CBI membership through this newspaper. She said:

> "Let me tell you, a nurse on £140 a week pays £40 in tax and national insurance contributions, and I think she pays too much. So just you in the top quarter have some regard for those in the bottom half who are paying far too much tax."

But yesterday she allowed her Chancellor to introduce a Budget that produced tax reliefs for the better off and did very little at all to help the nurse on £140 a week. Indeed, if that nurse is living in residential accommodation provided by the hospital, she will probably find herself booted out and will be desperately looking for other accommodation locally.

This Budget does very little for the unemployed, still less for the low paid, and nothing at all for the 500,000 families that are caught in the poverty trap. The low paid on £5,000 a year will benefit to the tune of about £1·40 a week. The high paid on £20,000 a year will benefit to the tune of £4·96 a week. The highest paid on £50,000 a year will get an extra £11·36 a week. The Chancellor has wasted the money that he was going to spend on tax relief by reducing the standard rate rather than raising personal allowances.

If the Prime Minister really was concerned about the proportion of pay taken in tax and national insurance contributions—she linked the two in her remarks to the CBI—and if she was really concerned about families caught in the poverty trap, personal allowances would have been increased rather than the standard rate reduced.

The changes that have been introduced in this Budget do nothing to relieve the poverty trap for the 500,000 families that are now caught in it. The Low Pay Unit estimates that that figure has gone up fivefold since 1979, when it was 90,000. None of those families will get much out of this Budget.

If income tax and national insurance are taken together, people on five times average earnings do far better than people on average earnings or below. For example, a married couple with two children on five times average earnings will find that the proportion of their income taken in tax and national insurance contributions has gone down by 13 per cent. since 1979.

Even the little that has been gained by the very poorest families as a result of the tax changes in this year's Budget will soon be absorbed in the increase in petrol duties, which have been passed straight on to the customer, and the increase in cigarette duties. Of course, the Opposition do not quarrel with the latter.

There has been no help for the low paid and for families caught in the poverty trap. Those families could well have been helped by an increase in child benefit. We would like to have seen that benefit go up by £3 a week. That would have been of real assistance to low-paid families. Instead —despite what the Prime Minister said both in her "Panorama" interview and to CBI News—there have been further tax cuts to help the wealthy. There has been the abolition of CTT on lifetime transfers — so-called popular capitalism, which is still best called top people's capitalism, because, despite all the Government efforts to increase share ownership over the past seven years, only six out of every 100 people own shares.

According to The Economist, in 1985 even the sale of British Telecom, which almost doubled the number of individual shareholders then, did not prevent the personal sector as a whole from being a net seller of shares. As for putting away £200 a month in order to get the full tax benefits from this new scheme, few of my constituents have anything like that amount of money to save, and many of them must eke out an existence on £50 a week.

All these tax concessions, including the halving of stamp duty, total £155 million—three times the cost of the recently announced child benefit. No wonder the Government have given up calling themselves the party of the family. They have abandoned any concern for the family, especially the low-paid family.

It is going to be a difficult Finance Bill. The Opposition will resent a Bill that, for the seventh year in succession, will give tax cuts to the rich at the expense of the poor. We shall resent a Bill in which the Government side will be led by the Chief Secretary, a Minister we cannot trust. He has distorted statements made by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor, other right hon. and hon. Friends and myself. He plainly believes that it is useful to employ the well-worn propaganda techniques which depend on the belief that if lies are repeated loud enough and often enough people will accept them. If this is the way in which he intends to behave, he must understand that the Opposition will treat him with the contempt he deserves and I am afraid that the ill feeling which he will have aroused in the Opposition will bode ill for our deliberations on the Finance Bill when it is eventually introduced.

Mr. MacGregor: I obviously heard what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said this afternoon about this year and I understand that the figures which he is proposing are a good deal less than the £24 billion. That, of course, is a hypothetical situation, because he is not in a position to implement any Budget proposals in the coming year. The £24 billion to which the hon. Lady was referring is a figure for the Labour party if and when it ever gets into full swing with its programme. Quite simply, the remedy lies in the right hon. Gentleman's hands. If he wants to take items off the list, I shall be very happy to tick them off.

Dr. McDonald: Let me just give an example of the pure invention in which the Chief Secretary has indulged. Part of the £24 billion, the figure that he has dreamt up, purports to cost a number of education proposals described in The Guardian on 17 April 1985. I give the reference because hon. Members can then go away and read the article for themselves.

The Chief Secretary claims that the Labour party proposes to spend £235 million on teachers. No such figure appears in the article, nor can such a figure be substantiated from anything that appears in the article. On building and equipment, the figure £871 million appears in the Chief Secretary's cumulative list. Again, no such figure appears in the article, nor is there any figure by which it can be justified. The article is headed "Labour pledges £200 million boost for schools". The Chief Secretary's calculations increased that to over £1 billion. The article is there for all to read. The claims in the article are clearly made. I cite this as just one example of the fantasies in which the Chief Secretary indulges.

Mr. Hattersley: Withdraw.

Mr. MacGregor: I say quite simply to the hon. Lady that I am happy indeed to get the record right. What I want to establish is precisely what pledges the Opposition are putting forward. I shall be very happy to tick them off from the £24 billion because I believe that that is in the interest of all of us. If the right hon. Gentleman would like to write to me telling me what pledges I have got wrong, I will do the costing accurately.

Dr. McDonald: As I have just said to the Chief Secretary, I cited one example. I chose it because it concerned a specific pledge. It described the money that we proposed to spend on education and the items on which we proposed to spend it. The Chief Secretary should have the decency at the very least to withdraw that allegation. His behaviour in the House is utterly disreputable.

We made specific pledges, which have been costed. I cited one, and the right hon. Gentleman did not even have the courtesy, never mind the decency, to withdraw his allegations. That was not the only example I could cite. The Chief Secretary well knows that, in the unemployment debate, I disputed his allegations about my letter to the Chancellor. On 17 February I wrote to the Chief Secretary repeating what I had said in that letter and asking him to withdraw what he had said. However, the right hon. Gentleman has not even done me the courtesy of replying to my letter of 17 February—more than a month ago.

If that is the type of behaviour that we get from the Chief Secretary, obviously we cannot trust him. That is why I referred to the manner in which the Finance Bill debates might be conducted. We cannot deal with a person who distorts the statements we make during our speeches and produces fantasy figures.

Of course we know why the fantasy figure of £24 billion was produced—it was to cover up the fact that, in the past seven years, unemployment has already cost this country more than £24 billion. The costs in terms of lost output must be immense. No wonder the Chief Secretary wants to distract attention from the Government's record. The fact that he has to resort to these methods shows how utterly disreputable his behaviour is.

The fact that the right hon. Gentleman has not at least apologised for the item to which I referred shows how discourteous and how lacking in courage he is—never mind his failure to acknowledge, reply to or withdraw his allegations about my statements. The Chief Secretary's behaviour is amazing. It shows the Government's moral and intellectual bankruptcy. They have no direction in their economic policy. Faced with falling oil prices, they do not know what to do to put the economy back on the right course. Such decisions as they do make on those issues are entirely wrong. I should gladly sit down at any point if the Chief Secretary has the decency or courage to apologise, but I do not think that he has those qualities.

I should like to give an example of the mistakes that the Government have made in the Budget. Petrol duties have increased more than the rate of inflation. Obviously that was a mistake. It was clear that the increase would be immediately passed on to the consumer. Shell could not act quickly enough to do that, despite the Chancellor's plea, and, this morning, BP announced that it would do exactly the same thing.

What is important is not just the fact that these prices are passed on immediately to the consumer and hit the consumer's pocket but the fact that, despite what the Government say about the value to the economy of falling oil prices, unless the fall in crude oil prices is fully passed on to industrial and domestic consumers, our economy cannot possibly benefit from lower prices to the extent that it should. Our economy will suffer in terms of inflation — although to a lesser extent — unemployment and growth.

The failure to pass on the full benefit of the 50 per cent. drop in crude oil prices is immensely damaging to the economy. The Chancellor knew that. He was warned that that would happen. He was warned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and by several of my hon. Friends about the dangers of increasing such taxation. He was warned that, if he allowed the oil companies to profiteer in that way, it would damage the economy. That is what will happen. It is possible to demonstrate that, even using an optimistic economic model such as the London Business School model. That shows clearly that if oil prices do not drop for industrial and domestic consumers, we will not get the fall in unemployment and the growth which might otherwise occur.

Mr. Higgins: If the hon. Lady thinks that the taxation increase will be passed on entirely, does it follow from that that she thinks that the elasticity of demand for petrol is zero?

Dr. McDonald: Of course it does not mean that. By applying a model to such calculations we see clearly that we do not get the benefits for unemployment and for growth that we might otherwise get. Of course, that is even more damaging for us because some of our main competitors, such as Germany, are oil importers and get far more benefit from lower oil prices. That makes it even more difficult for us to compete with them, and to overcome the problems already faced by our manufacturing industry.

In all the Budget debates the effect of falling oil prices on the balance of payments has been overlooked. Plainly, the Chancellor would rather not think about that. Again the LBS model suggests that about £2·5 billion will be knocked off the balance of payments this year. That figure could increase in subsequent years because of the fall in oil prices. To make up the gap in the balance of payments, service industries would have to grow by 10 per cent. and manufacturing exports by 4 per cent.

Service industries are unlikely to meet the growth necessary to fill that gap because, although growing, they have a falling share of the world market. As for manufacturing industry, our share of the world export trade in manufactured goods was just over 9 per cent. in 1979. Despite the constant repetition by the Chancellor that the value of our exports is at record level and so on, the truth is that by 1985 our manufactured exports had fallen to 7·8 per cent. of world trade.

In a harshly competitive world, when others benefit more from falling oil prices than we do, it will be very difficult to make up through manufacturing industry the gap left by declining oil prices in our balance of payments. Neither investment in manufacturing industry nor manufacturing output has reached the 1979 level. Today the Financial Times reported:

"The pace of growth of Britain's manufacturing output appears to have slowed and the upward trend of overall industrial production has also weakened in recent months."

So output is growing much more sluggishly than it did in the past. The Budget does nothing to remedy that. Investment will not go into manufacturing industry as a result of the Budget. There is no public spending in the Budget that would give a boost to the construction industry or to any other of our basic industries.

I listened to the Chancellor's interview on the "Today" programme this morning and heard him, once again, being extremely dismissive about the importance of investment in manufacturing industry. He said that it is not just a matter of going out to buy a new machine or piece of equipment. He does not understand manufacturing industry. His training and experience have been in finance and financial journalism. He neither understands, cares about, nor even likes manufacturing industry. He makes no attempt to understand industry and its needs. Nor does he understand the importance of investment.

No, it is not just a matter of buying a new piece of machinery; it is now a matter of applying new technology and high technology to industry. Unless we adopt and apply techniques such as computer integrated management to our industry, we shall be unable to compete with American and German industries. That is the kind of investment that is essential, yet the Chancellor does not even begin to understand that. Such investment is important. Without it, we fall behind.

The Chancellor and the Treasury rely far too much on the importance of price competitiveness for exports. Of course that is important. [Interruption.] My hon. Friends are saying loudly behind me, with the connivance of Conservative Members, that we see that the Liberals and Social Democrats are not here to say anything. It appears that Banquo—my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)—has also turned up at the feast to tell us of the absence of Social Democratic and Liberal parties. It is not surprising that they are not here because they have nothing relevant to say about the needs of our economy and our manufacturing industry.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: To be fair, only nine hon. Members who support the Government are present at the moment.

Dr. McDonald: After gathering so many Tory Members at the last election, it is unfortunate that not many are here to hear the second to last Budget before the next election.

The Budget is immensely disappointing and it does nothing for manufacturing industry or exports, nothing to make up the gap in the balance of payments, nothing for the poor and nothing for the unemployed. Despite the Prime Minister's promise, there are only yet more tax cuts for the rich.

9.33 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): We have had a wide-ranging debate. We have had contributions on the overall strategic judgment and on all aspects of the economy. There have been detailed speeches on topics ranging from the Health Service to the North sea to Scotland.

I share the views of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) about the extraordinary absence throughout the major part of our proceedings of the parties which are supposed to represent what they regard as part of the Opposition. The hon. Lady was right to draw attention to that. I had assumed that the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) would be present for the closing speeches. I had wanted to make some references to his speech, but I had better restrict myself to his description of my right hon. Friend's Budget as a pudding that had some good plums but no theme. He was reminding us of a quotation by the late Sir Winston Churchill. I find the concept of a pudding with no theme more fitting to the policies of the alliance than the serious decision-making process in which he once participated, when he was in government. Its absence from the conclusion of the second day of the Budget debate shows the lack of seriousness with which the alliance views the House of Commons.

I have now a slightly technical matter that concerns arrangements for bringing Budget changes into operation, which affect income tax and corporation tax. Every year, some changes have to take effect more or less immediately. For those which work to the taxpayers' advantage, the normal rule is that they take effect on or after Budget day, but for those changes that work the other way—by imposing or increasing tax—the practice has been to apply the changes after Budget day. In most cases, this works well enough, but there may be occasions when some people engage in forestalling, which could be costly to the Exchequer, by doing business very quickly on Budget night. To allow this would be neither fair nor sensible, and it may be necessary in future to make changes effective from the start of Budget day. I thought it right to draw the attention of the House to this change, which may be used in a future Budget.

The Budget continues the process of radical reform started by my right hon. Friend's predecessor as Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, and welcomed by my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). It completes the corporation tax reform package of 1984, and following this, the main corporation rate will be 35 per cent., for those paying mainstream corporation tax and for small companies, 29 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington, and my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) in a thoughtful and distinguished speech, drew the attention of the House to the Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation which has clearly been associated with the Budget. I know that hon. Members may not have had time to read the Green Paper, but it is an important contribution to the next stage of the reform of the taxation system. I trust that the House will not mind if, as there have been references to it, I take a little time to discuss certain aspects of the Green Paper. General and genuine consultation and a full debate outside and inside the House on this Green Paper will be beneficial.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House find the present system quite unacceptable. It discriminates against women in marriage, denying them independence and privacy, and placing tax penalties on marriage, which must be changed. The question is to what kind of independent taxation it should be changed, and two basic kinds are generally argued for. There is what might be called independent taxation, with transferable allowances, which is the argument outlined in the Green Paper, and there is the argument for mandatory separate taxation—MST. I shall consider both briefly, as they are germane to the overall Budget debate.

I wish to show why we see transferable allowances as clearly superior. The Green Paper goes into this in some detail. First, they recognise the key role and importance of marriage. Secondly, they remove all discriminatory features from the present system. Thirdly, they offer independence and privacy for all and—this is crucial—the flexibility of transferability as well. This is particularly effective in recognising the life cycle of couples in marriage and their changing needs. For almost all couples one partner is dependent upon the other at some time—often at a time of greatest need, for example the birth of the first child, or when a wife may give up her job when her husband's job forces him to move.

Fourthly, transferable allowances recognise that an allowance is not much use without an income to set it against. There have been several criticisms of these proposals, with two basic criticisms. One is that the new system will be complicated. I am not sure that I fully accept that because——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What has this to do with the Budget?

Mr. Moore: This has a great deal to do with it. I have sat throughout the debate, and I shall endeavour to make my own speech on a rather critical part of the overall tax system.

The first criticism is that they were complicated. Anybody who looks through our tax system could, when he looks at it with some care, regard the already existing set of allowances as very complicated. I do not think that they could be more complicated. Secondly, it is suggested that operationally the new system would be complicated. Provided that the proper mechanical, computerised system is put in, the additional flexibility will create operational difficulties and extra operational work for the Revenue. The staff consequences of that are covered in the Green Paper. However, I do not think that they will be any more complicated for the customers of the system — the general public. In fact, I think that they will be more simple.

The second main criticism which genuinely puzzles me is that the proposals might be a disincentive to women to go out to work. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne discussed that in part of her speech. I find that very difficult to understand. The disincentive argument rests on a strange view of British men. Will they really object to family income going up if it means their own take-home pay goes down? In most cases the couple would be going back to the situation before the wife gave up work.

Dr. McDonald rose——

Mr. Moore: I should like to continue, because I am genuinely trying to contribute to what I hope is a serious debate on this issue.

As I said, in some cases the couple would be going back to the situation before the wife gave up work—in other words, one single allowance each. It is the preference for mandatory separate taxation that I cannot understand. In practical terms, mandatory separate taxation and transferable allowances both give each partner a single allowance. However, mandatory separate taxation will not allow the husband to use the allowance when the wife is not in paid work. Therefore, the only difference is that the husband cannot lose an advantage which he never had in the first place. Therefore, it is not obviously a superior system. My difficulty is that this is a consultation debate and we will not have the opportunity in Committee to discuss what is obviously an important issue. It is critical to note that the liberal nation in western Europe which has the highest percentage of married women in work is Denmark, with transferable allowances. I think that we have to consider that carefully.

I should like to look seriously at mandatory separate taxation. [Interruption.] It would be helpful if I could continue without sedentary interruptions. Some of us have listened very patiently to the debate throughout the whole evening on areas surrounding all aspects of the Budget.

The problem we have when looking at mandatory separate taxation is that in principle it seeks to ignore marriage. It does not think through the practical consequences. Perhaps—this is a legitimate point which I see the strength of — it is because very different schools are espousing this set of suggestions. I see arguments in logic for all of those schools. There is the tax theology school which will want to see people taxed as individuals.

Mr. Bermingham: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not an abuse of the House for a Minister not to reply to a debate and the many speeches made by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but to use it to raise what is clearly a Committee point?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Financial Secretary has been speaking for about seven minutes. I think that this may be a preamble. He has plenty of time to answer the debate.

Mr. Moore: It is more than a preamble; it is a fundamental part of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's speech and a critical part of some of the Budget announcements. I immensely resent somebody who has spent little time in the Chamber tonight suggesting that I am not answering the debate.

As I was saying, there are three different schools which suggest that we should espouse mandatory separate taxation. Those who believe in tax theology would want to see people taxed as individuals, irrespective of their circumstances or responsibility. The social theology school would not want to take any account of marriage as distinct from other relationships in tax or social policy. Then there are what might be called welfare theologists, who believe that there is a pot of gold in the married allowance and want it directed to those most in need rather than, as they see it, to all one-earner couples. The practical consequences are critical for millions of our fellow citizens in the debate that we should be having on the issue. Those theologists have not thought through the practical consequences, which I want to draw to the attention of the House. Those consequences flow from the logic of a tax system ignoring marriage.

The first, I imagine, is the need to abolish married women's retirement pension and widow's benefits. The second is the setting up of an anti-avoidance system, discriminating specifically against marriage, to ensure that under MST in one-earner families, the transfer of income between couples, via covenanting, trusts and other settlements could not occur. [Interruption.] I know that some hon. Members were not present to hear the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne on that subject, but I was.

Within the capital taxes system, there would, of course, be no spouse exemption. We would have to establish precisely, in a marriage, separate taxable interests in the assets of the marriage so that any transfers could be properly taxed. For example, a widow would face intolerable hardship when she would have to pay tax on her inheritance of the family home.

We could examine that in great detail, and I shall not go into much more, but let us consider the couple who would lose from MST not recognising marriage, who benefit under the present system, or who could benefit under transferable allowances. Hon. Members should note well that, where the wife does not go out to paid work, two thirds of those of working age look after children. Presumably there would be a need to ensure that they were at least no worse off. Of the remaining one third, many look after dependent relatives, are themselves unable to work, through illness or disablement, or are of an age when it would be difficult to return to the labour market. It seems absurd to allow them to suffer because of a refusal to recognise marriage and its responsibilities in the tax system.

What about the 340,000 wives who support their husbands who are ill or unable to find work? Do they suffer because of a rigid adherence to an inflexible form of mandatory separate taxation? What about families where the husband or wife has moved to find work or transferred to an area of high unemployment—the high unemployment that was discussed legitimately earlier in the debate? What happens if one spouse simply cannot find a job? Are those families to suffer a further blow than the loss of one income because there is to be no transferability of allowances?

What about the elderly? Over two thirds of couples drawing married age allowances are one-earner couples. They would lose sharply through MST and, clearly, would need to be compensated.

The reality is that only about 10 per cent. of all wives of working age, who are not in paid employment, and who might—I stress "might"—be in a position to seek work, may benefit "indiscriminately", as is said, from transferable allowances.

I should like to conclude this important section. It is vital. I trust that hon. Members will look at it with care because it is a serious issue. Transferable allowances offer the opportunity for privacy and independence for all married women, but recognise in a fair and flexible way the fact that at different times and for different reasons, one partner in a marriage supports the other. Transferable allowances let that person keep more of his earnings. MST, though offering independent taxation and privacy, would be inflexible, so it would fail to recognise marriage. It is that absurdity in practice that makes it unsurprising that no other country has a tax system that fails to recognise marriage or proposes to adopt one.

The second major theme of the debate arose when many of my right hon. and hon. Friends and Opposition Members tried to understand the ways in which the Chancellor, in his Budget, sought to create an enterprise culture. As my right hon. friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) rightly said, in what I thought was a wise analysis of the problem of long-term unemployment, it is from enterprise that lasting jobs will come.

The Budget has three basic interlocking themes in regard to ownership. First, it seeks to encourage ownership at the place of work. I think that there is some amity across the House on that. There is some support—I hope that there will be in Committee—for the changes that the Budget foreshadows in employee share ownership. In past years the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) has raised many points about constraints and I am sure that hon. Members on both sides will be delighted at the extension of employee share ownership in future.

The hon. Member for Hodge Hill will not mind me mentioning the name of Paul Derrick in relation to industrial co-operatives. I am sure that the significant advance in ownership opportunities and benefits will be welcomed in Committee. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer spent considerable time on the encouragement of ownership of the place of work and profit sharing. My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) and the right hon. Member for Hillhead, who is absent, welcomed that, and we look forward to detailed consultations on that.

Secondly, the Budget seeks to encourage ownership of equities in general. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), prior to a detailed lengthy speech, to which I listened with considerable care and enjoyment, with 33 minutes spent legitimately on the subject that he regards with the importance that I place on the Green Paper and particular aspects of tax reform, asked from a sedentary position why we should encourage the ownership of equity when my hon. friend the Member for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) was arguing for it. The reason is that we can expect to create the climate in which entrepreneural activity can flourish through an understanding of the risk and rewards of ownership. I am sure that that was my hon. Friend's argument when he sought the extension of ownership.

I was delighted by the way in which my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, and my hon. Friends, the Members for Darlington, for Windsor and Maidenhead, for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) and for Winchester (Mr. Browne) were excited at the Chancellor's commitment to the new personal equity plan. It is a major and significant extension of what may be called popular capitalism — an extension beyond the ownership of homes and the ways in which people seek legitimately to own parts of their place of work to ownership of the wider equity market.

I know that my hon. Friends welcome our encouragement of people to understand ownership and the risk-reward relationship. It will be regarded in future as one of the single most significant movements forward. I shall look with interest at the remarks of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who dismissed the plan, and of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) who was worried about the implications for bear markets and who saw a time bomb. I am sure that they will eat their words and worries as they did with the concept of council house sales. Their reaction is precisely the same. They simply cannot understand the nature of ownership and the way in which it creates genuine benefits, not only for individuals and their families, but for the wider community. I was delighted at the reaction of all of my hon. Friends to that significant part of the Budget.

The third main aim of the Budget in the encouragement of the enterprise culture is to encourage enterprise by supporting and rewarding risk taking. My hon. Friends the Members for Darlington, for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) and for Windsor and Maidenhead rightly recognised the role of the enterprise allowance scheme, and welcomed its extension to this area. Obviously, I look forward to their further support of that. My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester, who had to apologise to the House for his absence during the replies, particularly welcomed the extension to three years and the reduction in the premium on the loan guarantee scheme from 5 per cent. to 2·5 per cent. That has received a relatively wide welcome. I am delighted to receive the support of the hon. Member for Workington.

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing and my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington greatly welcomed the changes and extensions — as did some Opposition Members, including the Leader of the Opposition—of the business expansion scheme. Hon. Members have not yet had an opportunity to read the very large but very good Peat Marwick report, but when they have had an opportunity to do so they will see that the scheme has been a considerable success. The final picture for 1983-84 shows an investment of £105 million in 715 companies.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Mostly in the south.

Mr. Moore: I shall turn to that point in a moment. Last year the hon. Member for Workington quite legitimately referred in Committee to the nature of the geographic spread. I am sure that he will again legitimately raise that point. The preliminary figures for 1984-85 show an investment of £135 million in 688 companies. The final figure will be higher than that.

Hon. Members will be interested to note that the Peat Marwick study shows that 72 per cent. of the companies raising finance are under five years old, that 54 per cent. of them raised £50,000, or less, that 69 per cent. raised £100,000 or less, and that 42 per cent. of the companies were engaged in manufacturing. Hon. Members might wish that percentage to be higher. I understand that wish, but 42 per cent. is not quite so insignificant a percentage as many people thought it would be. The Budget proposals intend to build on that success. The Government hope to try to promote a better focus on this area of high risk investment.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said yesterday that we shall seek to extend indefinitely the life of the scheme. We shall exempt from capital gains tax gains on shares qualifying for business expansion scheme relief in order to encourage high risk investment. We shall extend the scheme to ship chartering companies to help to promote high risk investment in the United Kingdom shipping industry. This proposal has received a general welcome from all sides of the House. We are also seeking to tighten the controls so as to restrict the scheme to high risk investment. We shall seek to exclude investment in companies that have substantial property backing or those that carry on the trade of holding investment goods—for example, fine wines and antiques. We shall take power, by statutory instrument, to make further changes in the coverage of the scheme.

The Budget contains changes in stamp duty. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury will seek to deal with those changes tomorrow evening, if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker.

Despite the dramatic and unprecedented fall in world oil prices, the Government's objectives remain unchanged. They have two objectives: the conquest of inflation and the creation of an enterprise culture. Their policies also remain unchanged. They are sound money and free markets. They provide the only route to more jobs and to lasting jobs. The Government's adherence to firm monetary and fiscal policies has enabled the economy to weather both the coal strike and the fall in the price of oil — two more than significant events in the last two years. Despite that, the Government have maintained inflation on a downward trend, with steady and balanced growth, a current account surplus and rising—I stress rising—employment.

The high level of unemployment remains, as my right hon. Friend recognised yesterday, a major problem, although the prospects are better now than they have been for some years. The responsibility for a reduction in unemployment, as my right hon. Friend stressed yesterday, lies primarily with management, through improved industrial and economic performance and through a lower rate of pay settlements. We have to recognise that the excessive growth in unit labour costs is the Achilles heel of the British economy.

The Government continue to pursue an economic policy that remains within the framework of the medium-term financial strategy. It is designed steadily to reduce growth of total spending power in the economy at a pace that will gradually squeeze inflation out of the system while leaving adequate room for sustained growth in real output. The central role of monetary policy in influencing growth of money GDP through variations in short-term interest rates remains essentially unchanged. The precise mix, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said yesterday, is not sacrosanct; monetary policy must always be supported by low public sector borrowing.

Given the dramatic fall in the price of oil, with consequences for North sea tax revenues and the need to maintain a prudent fiscal policy, the 1986 Budget updates the medium-term financial strategy to 1989-90——

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Petition

Social Security Reform

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): I wish to present a petition organised by the Cumbernauld and district campaign against benefit cuts, which obtained 9,500 signatures in opposition to the Social Security Bill. The Bill is based on the Government's White Paper on the reform of social security. The first signatory to this massive petition is the provost of Cumbernauld and Kilsyth, district provost James Pollock, JP. The signatures in the petition represent 21 per cent. of the electorate in my constituency and therefore reflect the weight of public opinion against the Government's objectives.

The Social Security Bill does not reform social security. It is merely a means of making the poor even poorer and the needy more needy. The Bill is bad news for mothers, for families with children and for those with occupational pensions. It holds nothing for every unemployed householder and every ratepayer on a low income. My constituents have concluded that the Government's proposals should be rejected. They are bad for them and bad for the nation as a whole. Therefore, the Bill should not receive the approval of the House.

The petition concludes:

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will not pass legislation arising out of the reform of social security White Paper.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I beg leave to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Unemployment (Wentworth)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

10.2 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The average rate of unemployment throughout the United Kingdom is 13·8 per cent., which is very high. That means that one person in seven throughout the country in the age groups which should be economically active are unemployed.

Unemployment in my constituency is dreadfully severe. The official figure in the travel-to-work area is 23·1 per cent., but that does not present an accurate picture. Officially, almost one person in four in my constituency is unemployed; but in reality the position is much worse as many of the unemployed are not included in the official statistics. Many ladies who leave jobs are not registered and many men who are below retirement age, often far below it, are excluded, as are all those on the youth and community programmes, which, though welcome, are only palliatives.

Enforced inactivity is bad enough for anyone, but on the scale that we are now experiencing it corrodes our community. It becomes a grave matter when it seems an inescapable prospect for young people. In my constituency the dreadful inevitability of unemployment must command attention, for we neither provide work for our youngsters nor sufficient opportunities for meaningful leisure.

Of the 1985 school leavers, only 14·4 per cent. have found normal employment after almost one year of ending their full-time education, and 2,319 are either unemployed or on Government schemes, which seem merely to be a deferment of unemployment. Some teenagers seem to have lost so much hope that they tend to believe that retirement begins when the youth training scheme is completed.

Of the 1984 school leavers, only 42 per cent. are economically active. All that those youngsters see is a dreadful pattern of decline in employment with no scope for ambition, interest, responsibility or challenge lying ahead of them.

Since 1981, the area that I represent has lost about 4,000 jobs in mining, over 2,500 in steel and another 2,000 to 2,500 in manufacturing industry generally, and a net loss of about 1,000 jobs in the service sector.

Almost 25 per cent. of our officially unemployed are under 20 years of age; 40 per cent. are aged between 20 and 29; and 40 per cent. of our unemployed have been without work for over a year. That is a quite horrific picture. What causes me the greatest anxiety is that some of us perceived years ago that difficulty would come, although we never believed that acceleration in the decline could have taken place at the pace we have experienced in the last four or five years.

As a young councillor I recall rejecting the view that new industry should not come to our area because it would tempt men away from the coal industry where wages were then not at all competitive. Our area was deemed to be too important as a coal producer for work to be undertaken to secure economic diversification. I hope the Minister fully understands what I am saying—that the nation has an obligation to those entrapped in the present position.

I live in the middle of South Yorkshire which is being abolished as a legal unit in 12 days' time. I live 200 yards from the house in which I was born in that mining community where once most men worked in or in jobs related to the coal mining industry. In the not too distant past many boys went to the pits at which their fathers and uncles worked and many were trained in skills that went on to sustain small businesses elsewhere. What do we see now? The youngest man in the South Yorkshire coal industry is nearly 20 years of age. There has been no training and no recruitment for an unconscionably long time. That is bound to damage our local economy.

As I said, 14·4 per cent. of last year's school leavers have a job. The prospect of bitterness is inevitable. In Brampton Bailow, in which lay Cortonwood colliery before the miners' strike, there was high unemployment. Some 57 per cent. of the men there worked for the National Coal Board. In January 1984 those men were assured that their pit had five year's life. Five weeks later they were told it should shut in five weeks, and the strike began. It increasingly looks as it it was intended to begin. That pit is now closed. Some of the men have been transferred and others have taken the pension or payment available and retired. Altogether, we have undergone a devastating community experience.

It is not only in Brampton, because in the Bramley and Wickersley ward at the other end of the constituency 1,091 people have lost their jobs. In Thrybergh and Dalton 1,377 jobs have gone. In parts of Dalton—for example, in Dalton Brook—I cannot find a single teenager in normal employment. In Rawmarsh 1,816 jobs have gone and in Wath and Swinton the figure is 2,560. Altogether there are 6,766 local claimants of unemployment benefit. As I have said, over 40 per cent. of our unemployed have been without work for over a year, and they are not included in that number.

What is also galling is that our other local major industry, steel, has suffered terribly, despite the long term and determined commitment to change and to success shown by workers and management over a long period. In the 1960s there was major change to adapt to modern requirements, and that continued in the 1970s when we were immensely proud of the enormous success of the new Thrybergh bar mill, the holder of world records and an example of co-operation and wise investment. In that case, we demonstrated what good investment and decent industrial relations policies could achieve. Then came the dreadful decline since 1979 when the rest of the Common Market steel industry looked after itself and we rushed headlong down the contraction route. Thousands of steel jobs were lost in south Yorkshire. When our manufacturing and engineering industries recover, as one day they must, if we are not careful the resulting orders will have to be met elsewhere whilst our own people languish.

One cause for anxiety is that for the last two or three years there has been insufficient investment in steel whilst those in power have indulged in the obsessive game of furtive negotiations for privatisation. Those negotiations drag on for years and leave us with increasing anxiety. Despite that, the Minister may have noted the motion that I tabled yesterday congratulating the Aldwarke works on breaking its ninth record this year. It is to be hoped that the potential achievement that demonstrates will justify an early decision, which should have been made by now, to provide Aldwarke with the continuous casting facility that it needs.

But we cannot look to coal or steel to meet all our employment needs. Economic diversification is essential. The dominating analysis of the early 1970s does not suffice. Then the Department of Trade and Industry believed that in our county economic need could be met from within. Plainly the need is so immense that that view will not do. My local authority recognises that. I know that it is the Government's view that some local authorities do not seem to be attractive to outside interests, but the Minister cannot say that about the Rotherham metropolitan borough, which is a prudent and respected authority which is desperately eager to develop the local economy. However, it has been hit by the ravaging effects of central policy and a loss of revenue from industrial sources, as well as by the huge cuts in central Government support for local authorities.

Despite our enormous efforts to keep down local spending, the Government have cut the grant again this year, disregarded the reduced rate income, and forced the council to increase the rates by a substantial amount. The council will not be rate capped. We cannot afford it. But our desperate prospects will not be helped by this result from the Government's utterly unhelpful approach. Rotherham has lost scores of millions of pounds in central revenue since 1979, and has reduced the number of jobs as a result.

Our housing programme, including the provision of private improvment grants, has been slashed, yet serious needs continue to exist. That issue requires urgent consideration, and the Government should not now force the council to curtail the use of capital receipts. Today moneys should be spent on investment in areas such as housing, as jobs are desperately needed, but next year the council is to be allowed to spend only £6,030,000 on all of its housing investment, which is enough to buy 15 houses like the one that the Prime Minister has recently purchased, or a dozen of the two-bedroomed flats that are on sale one mile from the Chamber.

Our needs are glaringly obvious, and that is perceived by bodies throughout our society. Our churches are deeply anxious, and some of them are heavily involved in community programmes which are an acceptable palliative. Our trades council is concerned. Only last Saturday I attended a meeting in Rotherham that was devoted to analysing the need and to pointing to the solutions to our economic problems. There is wide and substantial local involvement in the treatement of the symptoms, but we are now powerless to deal with the problems. That is for the Government to do, but yesterday's Budget was an almost frivolous response to our desperate need.

Perhaps the Minister will agree to some proposals. We need security for such mining as we have left in the constituency. I hope that there can be something of a guarantee for the Manvers complex and for continued investment there, and for Silverwood colliery, which recently broke yet another European record. We need recruitment and training again in the mining industry.

Moreover, we need further investment and the provision of continuous casting at Aldwarke, as our basic industries must not be allowed to shrink any further. We also need an immediate and substantial expansion of our environmental reclamation programme to ensure that the Victorian legacy is transformed more swiftly than is currently planned. The area must be made more attractive for development. Perhaps that will lead to some interest among the financial institutions of the City, which seem to give more priority to overseas investment than to the safeguarding of sanity in our provinces.

We need full and proper recognition from the Government that our communities merit higher priority and that we are not going to see the creation of mini Northern Irelands and no-go areas in the 21st century. In our area we have seen a unity of purpose. The local council, the parish council, the trades council, the chamber of commerce and the churches all perceive the needs and they are working together in a co-operative approach. I am sure that the Minister will be impressed by the co-operation between the chamber of commerce and Rotherham council which is demonstrated in the splendid work of the Rotherham enterprise agency, which could be given greater resources. We have that unity and adversity, and it is adversity.

Some time ago I urged the Prime Minister to arrange a multidepartmental approach, and a ministerial conference in Rotherham, to show that there was a proper awareness of our position. Despite the fact that the Prime Minister recognised that we were to lose 2,800 mining jobs, she declined to assist. That disdain for that part of the country is quite intolerable. It is disdain for one of the major casualties of the divisive economic approach which besets our nation.

We need a more sensitive response to our plight than was shown last year when I went to the DTI to ask for assistance for a warehousing project. That was denied on the grounds that it would not create either local or national benefit. The Minister will understand that I question the sanity of those who gave that advice. The project proceeded, and although it did so on a smaller scale than we had hoped, it has remained the largest single job creator for some years in my constituency, yet it provided fewer than 100 jobs.

It is fashionable for the Government to say that Opposition Members are not co-operative in seeking to promote development. That is not true in the Rotherham area. My colleagues and I have made a number of proposals. In the last 12 months I have suggested reasonable schemes to promote timber growing and timber use, clock making, and the restoration of the Rockingham pottery, which made internationally famous porcelain before 1841 and which could be assisted with EEC grants.

We welcome the creation of NCB (Enterprise). Every week I look at the rapid progress of the scheme at Wath upon Dearne, where I know the excellent people involved. It is very welcome, but it is still only scratching the surface. That scheme may actually not provide as many jobs as we are going to lose, or already have lost, at Wentworth Woodhouse, the largest stately home in Britain. Rotherham borough council is responsible for that. Now that Sheffield polytechnic is moving out—perhaps as a result of Government policy—Rotherham will be left with an enormous liability and Rotherham council has no resources to seek alternative use, which is necessary. I asked the Government to assist with the further use of that tremendous asset. Unfortunately, assistance was refused, as a result of which the cost will continue to be incurred, and the enormous potential for the physical and recreational provision that exists is likely to be lost.

The Minister will no doubt mention our enterprise zone. Unfortunately, it is not filling with wealth creation. We have seen the development of imaginative ideas of enormous scale in shopping and entertainment complexes. I only hope that local disposable incomes will be capable of sustaining such development. I believe wealth must also be created, but we have seen our potential for future creation rejected.

This is not merely a question of economic statistics. We are talking about the future stability of our society. In my area, in the not too distant past, people did not need to lock their doors. In the last few months, more than 200 pensioners living within 1½ miles of my home have had coal stolen from their homes.

That is a shocking indictment of the change that the Government have inflicted on south Yorkshire, for today we have more magistrates than we had criminals a quarter of a century ago. I hope that the Minister will respond to these pleas, recognise the harsh reality we face and try to ensure that we will no longer take only one step forward for every 20 that we are forced to retreat.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): I very much appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) about unemployment in his constituency, and the seriousness with which he put his case. I shall try to answer as many of his points as I can, and I welcome the opportunity to do so. The hon. Gentleman is aware that unemployment, particularly serious though it is in his constituency, is not just of local or even national concern, but is an international problem.

The Government are continually searching for ways which will help real jobs to be created, and despite the unacceptably high national unemployment rate, the number of jobs has been rising since March 1983, and by 220,000 in the year to September 1985. The number of employees in service industries is at a record level, and the rate of decline in the number of manufacturing employees has eased considerably since 1983. The CBI has forecast 460,000 new jobs over the next two years, so new jobs are being created.

There are, therefore, real grounds for optimism on the national scene. I know that this is of no immediate comfort to those in areas of particularly high employment. The rate for the Rotherham and Mexborough travel-to-work area—where the hon. Gentleman's constituency is located—is too high. The area suffers from the all too familiar problem—particularly in various parts of the north of England—of traditional industries such as mining and steel in historic decline, having to adjust, often painfully, to new world market conditions.

That sort of change has happened in the past and will happen again in the future, but I recognise that the transition period is always very difficult. There have recently been a number of closures and redundancies in the area, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned. He referred to his appeal to the Government for a co-ordinated ministerial approach to the problems of the area. He might like to know that I was in Sheffield very recently, where I visited the newly established and encouraging job club in Woodhouse. In addition, the Secretary of State was in Huddersfield, Wakefield and York only last week, and my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr.

Trippier) will be in Doncaster shortly. Therefore, our Department is not unfamiliar with south Yorkshire's problems.

Not least among the companies declaring redundancies in recent years has been British Steel. The Government have been concerned to help to ensure a continued United Kingdom presence in the engineering steels sector and have supported the setting up of a new company — United Engineering Steels — in a joint venture between the BSC and GKN to enable Britain to compete internationally, thereby safeguarding the longer-term job security of those who work in this sector. The BSC steel plant in the Rotherham area will represent an important part of the businesses going into the new company. Therefore, although redundancies have been announced recently, I am optimistic about the future of the new company.

I have seen the early-day motion tabled by the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) relating to the achievements of the Aldwarke steel works in breaking production records. I gladly join the hon. Gentleman in congratulating the works on the nine new records that it has established this year.

The Government have agreed the provision of funds to the BSC to subscribe £55 million for preference shares and loan stock to United Engineering Steels — the new company to be formed under Phoenix 2 — on the understanding that the new company will undertake further investment, particularly in continuous casting. The timing and location of such investments will rightly be a matter for the board of United Engineering Steels.

Another industry in which there has been major redundancies, which have hit south Yorkshire as much as anywhere, has been the coal industry. But keeping open uneconomic pits is no answer to unemployment, and the size of the current investment programme in south Yorkshire is a measure of the commitment, both by the Government and the NCB, to the future of the industry. The restructuring that has been entirely necessary has been achieved by the NCB without a single forced redundancy. The NCB maintains its policy of offering a job to any man who wishes to remain in the industry.

The NCB has also demonstrated its concern for the future of the coal mining communities most affected by pit closures by setting up NCB (Enterprise). At the end of January, this company had committed £1·8 million to aid new industry in Yorkshire, creating more than 900 job opportunities. A further £6·5 million of investment has been attracted from other sources, and this is very encouraging. For the first time we have an organisation specifically to provide loans for the creation of jobs in coal mining areas, and there is no shortage of funds available for all those coming forward with suitable proposals. I should like to emphasise that NCB (Enterprise) will consider all sensible ideas put to it, and any individual, company, or other organisation that has such a project should approach it.

The old industries have been contracting, but other sources of employment are available. For example, the enterprise zone in Rotherham has been successful in attracting new businesses to the area. Between August 1983 and August 1985, 58 new and established companies, employing around 1,500 people, were attracted to the 260 acre site.

Jobs are being created in the service sector. For example, Stadium Developments is to build a £100 million retail and leisure complex — the Parkgate centre — on the outskirts of Rotherham, which will create several hundred new jobs. Co-operative Retail is to build a £6 million super store selling home furnishings at Catcliffe, near Rotherham, over the next three years, creating 200 new jobs.

It is also encouraging to see that over 4,700 people were placed in work by the public employment service alone between April last year and February this year, a rise of 15 per cent. on the previous year, and many more will have found jobs by other means.

I mention all these facts not to contradict the hon. Gentleman or to disguise the true situation — I readily acknowledge that there is a problem and that it is a serious and deep-rooted one — but to try to keep it in perspective and to demonstrate that there is good news as well as bad. But of course I accept that a great deal still needs to be done to make headway against the area's economic and social problems. The Government will do and are doing all they can to help.

Rotherham and Mexborough travel-to-work area has development area status and thus attracts the highest levels of regional aid. It has received £16·3 million by way of regional development grant since 1979. Regional assistance has helped create over 3,000 jobs and safeguard over 1,900 existing ones. This assistance is now focused directly on job creation and is evidence of the Government's real concern to help the areas worst affected by unemployment.

I am well aware of the frustration and hardship that must be felt by unemployed people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency and I recognise the corrosive effect that high levels of unemployment can have upon the social fabric and the values of a community. They can knock the life out of it and destroy hope and self-respect. That is why we have a whole range of measures targeted at those particularly badly hit, both the young and the long-term unemployed.

The extension of the youth training scheme into a two-year vocational programme from April is a major step towards ensuring that every young person under 18 is undergoing high quality training in work or in full-time education. There are currently over 6,500 in training with YTS in the Rotherham and Doncaster areas, with a similar number of planned places for 1986-87. The aim of the new scheme is to provide better qualified entrants to the labour market and it is hoped all young people will leave YTS with a recongised vocational qualification or a credit towards one. This can only improve young people's employment prospects and will ensure that no young person under 18 need be unemployed.

The hon. Member referred to the Budget and he will recall that my right hon. Friend announced in his statement yesterday the establishment of the new workers scheme, which aims to assist job seekers under 21 by providing financial assistance for employers who are able to provide more jobs for young workers at rates of pay which reflect their relative inexperience. Over 70,000 young people are expected to be covered by the scheme nationally, at a cost of some £26 million. I am sure this will prove a useful measure to help make jobs available particularly to those youngsters who may have exhausted their YTS entitlement. The new scheme will, I hope, be of significant benefit to the hon. Gentleman's constituents.

The problems of the long-term unemployed have for some time been a major concern of the Government. The community programme, which is our major scheme to help the long-term unemployed, is to be expanded to 255,000 places nationally this year—almost double the level of a year ago. The number of places in the Rotherham area will be 5,000 by May 1986.

The national restart programme announced in the Budget statement means that the jobstart scheme, which provides a £20 per week allowance for six months for long-term unemployed people who find jobs paying less than £80 per week has now been made a national scheme. The long-term unemployed in the hon. Gentleman's consitituency will undoubtedly benefit. They will also benefit from in-depth interviews at jobcentres and the opportunity to take short restart courses to improve their chances of finding work.

The hon. Gentleman referred to training, which is indeed an essential requirement in helping the work force to adapt to changing economic conditions and become flexible in their skills and adaptable to new opportunities. It is not just training for shop floor jobs. People need training in management skills and in how to start up in business. Under the adult training strategy, which has a planned national expenditure of £260 million this year, we are helping almost 3,000 adults in the Sheffield and Rotherham areas this year through locally delivered programmes—an increase of no less than 86 per cent.

It is important that we do all we can to encourage people to be enterprising in finding work—not only looking for an employer but seriously considering the option of self-employment. The enterprise allowance scheme was set up to help those unemployed people wishing to start their own businesses by providing a weekly allowance in the difficult initial period. More than 1,700 are currently benefiting from the scheme in the Sheffield and Wakefield areas. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in his Budget statement, the number of places on the scheme will be increased to 100,000 nationally by April 1987—an increase of 20,000 on the current limit.

We are doing all we can to help small firms and those wishing to set up in business for the first time. We have announced a great many measures to reduce the burden of bureaucracy on small enterprises, with more proposals in the pipeline. We announced last November the provision of up to £2·5 million next year in support of local enterprise agencies. The Budget statement included a number of further measures to help small firms, including a reduction in corporation tax, the extension of the business expansion scheme and a new and upgraded small firms loan guarantee scheme lasting for three years with the premium halved from 5 to 2·5 per cent. At the local level, the Rotherham enterprise agency has helped 275 businesses start up since it was set up in 1983. Last year, it dealt with more than 1,000 inquiries. My Department's small firms service in south Yorkshire also dealt with almost 1,000 enquiries and about 100 new counselling cases since last April. There appears, therefore, to be a very healthy interest in setting up in business in this part of the world.

I hope that the House will recognise from all this that the Government are not in any way sitting by idly while hard-hit areas suffer from economic problems that they cannot deal with on their own. On the contrary, firm practical help is being given in the form of regional aid and employment and training measures. The hon. Gentleman must agree that a significant amount is being done to help the regeneration of economic activity in his constituency. The Government's commitment, together with the efforts of the people of the area will, I believe, lead to a much needed revival of their fortunes. It will not be easy, but I am certain that we are on the right road.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Workshops

1. Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has reached a decision on the prison department's recommendation that 57 prison workshops should be closed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Before the Secretary of State comes to a decision on the future of those prison workshops, will the Minister ensure that he bears in mind that their closure would lead to a substantial reduction in the quality of the prison regime? Incidentally, the Chief Inspector of Prisons has already decided that that quality is unacceptable for the majority of inmates. Furthermore, does the hon Gentleman accept that such closures would make a mockery of the prison department's stated aim of enabling prisoners to lead a good and useful life?

Mr. Mellor: Our aim is to give prison industries a firmer base so that they can provide a more efficient service and better value for money. We certainly do not want to destroy them. We recognise that their prime aim is to provide work for inmates. As the hon. Gentleman has said, purposeful work makes a contribution to the maintenance of good order and control in establishments. Our job is to try to arrest the decline in prison industries which has been experienced during the past 12 or 15 years, and that is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my hon. Friend aware that if there is to be any hope for rehabilitative prison sentencing, more work, not less, will have to be done in prisons? If we ensure that there is a proper and widespread system of prison work, we might be able to abolish the parole system and let people work their way out of prison.

Mr. Mellor: I am afraid that ambition is well short of realisation in the real world. Work, education and vocational and physical training are all key elements in our plans. However, last year the prison industries lost £25 million, which is a matter of concern to us and to the Public Accounts Committee. Plainly we must bear that in mind and put prison industries on a more efficient footing.

Mr. Beith: Is the Minister aware that the unused workshop facilities, which represent such a gap in the rehabilitative regime that is supposed to exist in our prisons, are made worse by such cuts in the overtime budget as will occur at Castington? Indeed, I expressed fears about that during a recent Adjournment debate.

Mr. Mellor: I know of the hon. Gentleman's concern, but he also knows that this Government have made more money available to prisons than any of their predecessors did. We have strengthened the prison service and are in the process of constructing prisons that are far more pleasant for prison officers to work in. Obviously, however, we cannot do everything at once, and we must keep a tight financial grip on things such as overtime.

Mr. Soley: Does the Minister not understand that his last answer will be greeted with contempt by just about everyone who has any knowledge of the prison system, and by all the staff in the prison service? Both they and the Minister know that the Government are undermining the prison workshop regime because of the problems of prison overcrowding. The Government should be dealing with the problems of overcrowding so that workshops and education can be a proper part of the prison regime, as the inspector wants them to be.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman has made a wild statement, which is not typical of him. It must have been his lunch. I do not think that he will find people saying anything like that. Our position, in trying to run the prison system, would have been made much easier if we had inherited a system from the Labour Government that was in a less than utterly ramshackle state.

Licensing Laws

2. Mr Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on changes in the licensing laws in England, following publication of the report of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on the effect of drinking patterns in Scotland of the Scottish licensing laws.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Since 4 February, when the report by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys was published, I have received 10 letters from hon. Members on behalf of constituents and 23 letters from members of the public expressing views on the permitted opening hours of licensed premises in England and Wales. Of the 33, 25 supported relaxations in the law and eight were opposed.

Mr. Knox: Does the report not show the benefits that have accrued to Scotland from the liberalisation of the licensing laws north of the border? Would not England similarly benefit from a liberalisation of its over-restrictive licensing laws? When does he intend to introduce legislation in this respect?

Mr. Hurd: I have not finished studying the Scottish report, but it disposes of some of the fears that were expressed about what would happen in Scotland. There are strong arguments for considering relaxation in England and Wales. The Government would like to be sure that they stood on firm ground before embarking on a relaxation of the law.

Mr. Nelson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that our drinking laws are not only out of date and in restraint of trade but are deeply patronising to the majority of people? Is it not high time that the law was changed, and will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) that the Government should introduce legislative proposals as soon as possible?.

Mr. Hurd: I have a lot of sympathy with my hon. Friend. I notice that there is support for the idea in an early-day motion. I recall that there was similar support for the Auld committee report on Sunday trading, but that has not proved to be an entirely uncontroversial subject.

Mr. Stokes: Will my right hon. Friend first come to a settlement about the Sunday trading controversy before needlessly upsetting many more people over the drinking law?

Mr. Hurd: I rather anticipated my hon. Friend in my last answer. However, I have a lot of sympathy with the case for changing the laws, and I hope that the solid ground that I mentioned will materialise sooner rather than later.

Identity Cards

3. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, having regard to his co-operation with other Governments in countering terrorism, he will give further consideration to the introduction of identity cards in the United Kingdom.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): The Government have no proposals to introduce identity cards in the United Kingdom.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Would the suggestion not be helpful against terrorists and immigration and social security cheats? Has not the House of Commons set a good example by issuing identity cards to hon. Members, and should we not follow the example of our European partners and of our Commonwealth partner, Australia, which recently introduced identity cards, with very little dissent in that freedom-loving country?

Mr. Shaw: I fully respect my hon. Friend's observations. He is well known for his interest in this issue. He will recall that the possibility of introducing identity cars to help in the fight against crime of all kinds, including terrorism, has been considered on a number of occasions and successive Governments have felt that such documents would not be of sufficient value to overcome the genuine antipathy that exists towards them in this country. As for our European partners, my hon. Friend will know that some countries, such as Ireland and Holland, do not have identity cards.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In co-operating with other Governments in combating terrorism, as it says in the question, does the Minister intend to take any action under section 10 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974, against those companies in the City of London which sell kidnap insurance policies and are financing the IRA——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's supplementary question must be linked with identity cards.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My question was in order——

Mr. Speaker: No, I will not take points of order. The hon. Gentleman must get his question in order. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory to put the next question.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gave the hon. Gentleman a good steer. The question concerns the introduction of identity cards in the United Kingdom in connection with terrorism. It has nothing to do with the City of London.

Motorway Speeding

4. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to seek to increase the number of prosecutions for motorway speeding offences.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The responsibility for enforcing speed limits on motorways and for deciding to prosecute rests with individual chief officers of police. The number of convictions has increased in recent years. Prevention, by highly visible deterrent patrols, is also an important part of police motorway practice.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Has my hon. Friend noticed, as he drives down the motorway, how often he is overtaken by buses and lorries greatly exceeding the speed limit? Is he aware that the tachograph, which is already fitted, can be used to provide reliable evidence of speeding and that that is already done on the continent? Will he bring in a similar system here; and, if not, why not?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will recall that my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), when Minister of State, Department of Transport, announced in November 1985 that that Department would be investigating the fitting of speed governors on coaches, limiting them to 70 mph.

Mr. Madel: As engines and braking have improved so much in cars, should the Government not raise the speed limit to 80 mph for cars for an experimental period? That would deal with part of the problem that my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) has just mentioned in relation to buses and lorries.

Mr. Shaw: I am not clear whether my hon. Friend's suggestion is entirely fair and reasonable on the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) in his original question relating to maintaining the speed limit and seeking to bring prosecutions to observe it.

Immigration

5. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on draft guidance concerning representations by hon. Members on immigration matters.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Davis Waddington): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) yesterday.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister now scrap the revised guidelines, as they remain deeply offensive and are seen to be deeply objectionable by many hon. Members and their constituents? When will the hon. and learned Gentleman apologise for the serious allegations that he made against Members of Parliament, and which remain unsubstantiated, of abusing the immigration laws? When will he stop all his bluff and bluster and concentrate on what he should be doing—dealing with the crisis at Heathrow by appointing more trained immigration officers and qualified interpreters and providing for visitors to Britain proper conditions in which to be welcomed?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman has had his shout and he will have an opportunity to shout again when there is a debate on the matter. I understand that a debate is to be arranged in the near future.

As a result of the consultation exercise that we carried out, I am satisfied that there is wide acceptance among hon. Members of the need to tighten up the system of representations by Members of Parliament. Although we have dropped the proposal about contacting the ports, the rest of the proposals remain and they will be extremely useful.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that for most hon. Members the right to go to Ministers is an important right which must be cherished and that the appropriate restraint in cases of this kind is usually self-restraint?

Mr. Waddington: There never has been any intention to take away from hon. Members the right to approach Ministers. There has been a certain amount of misunderstanding and some deliberate misconstruction of our proposals by Labour Members. We set out to give hon. Members a new facility to go to the ports and receive information about the reasons for a refusal direct from the immigration officer. It is nonsense to say that there is anything unconstitutional in that, because at present when a Member puts on a stop that does not interest the Minister one bit. The Minister's office is no more than a channel for communications and a place from where a message is relayed to the port.

Mr. Corbyn: In view of the continued attacks that the Minister of State makes on Members of Parliament for taking up immigration cases, will he please explain what a new immigrant family is supposed to do if their Member of Parliament has views that are so racist that he cannot be approached or refuses to take up any immigration cases?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman is being unfair to his colleagues. Again, he is raising a matter that he will be able to raise in the forthcoming debate.

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that, while it is important that the procedures should be fair and efficient, the interest of the country is overwhelmingly that immigration control should be firm and, in particular, that marriage should not be used in general as a means of entering the country?

Mr. Waddington: I agree entirely with the remarks made by my hon. Friend. He will notice that in the revised guidelines a passage has been added, because it became abundantly plain from the consultations that a large number of hon. Members wanted a specific mention of the problem which is caused as a result of people coming into Britain through temporary admission and then getting married.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Is the Minister aware that I am satisfied that the cases which I have referred to his Department — there have been quite a few — were handled with consideration and, indeed, in some instances, compassion? Will he assure the House that he will continue to allow Members to have access to his Department on behalf of constituents, while maintaining firm control of illegal immigration?

Mr. Waddington: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said. I assure hon. Members that my office will continue to deal with matters that they raise with consummate fairness and propriety. I repeat that hon. Members will be able to continue to raise immigration matters with the Minister.

Mr. Hayes: I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend on promising to review the immigration rules relating to child brides coming into Britain. However, does he accept that there is a major legal loophole in the Sexual Offences Act 1976? Will he consider carefully the legislation which will be coming before the House soon to prevent this outrage?

Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that it is part of the question.

Mr. Waddington: I think my hon. Friend realises that the matter that he has raised is of great importance, but it goes very wide of the question on the Order Paper.

Mr. Soames: I broadly welcome the guidance of my hon. and learned Friend on this matter. Will he, nevertheless, assure the House that he is satisfied that there are sufficient immigration officers to deal with the many difficult cases?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend has identified the problem. As a result of the number of representations having rocketed from only 1,000 in 1982 to 5,700 in 1985, far too many immigration officers are sitting in offices scribbling replies, which I have to sign and send to Members, instead of processing passengers who wish to obtain speedy entry into Britain. I am sure all hon. Members realise that, as a result of our dropping the port requirement, it becomes even more important that we should have firm time limits for making representations, so that cases can be dealt with speedily and efficiently.

Civil Defence

6. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to increase the local authority grant-aid for civil defence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My hon. Friend will have seen from the 1986-87 Supply Estimates presented to Parliament on Tuesday 18 March that it is proposed to increase the level of grant-aid from £11·9 million to £13·7 million in 1986-87.

Mr. Brown: Unfortunately, I have not yet seen those encouraging statistics. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues for that reply. Can my hon. Friend give any advice to those of us who have to face local authorities which might not be making sufficient use of those resources and which are not making proper provision for civil defence?

Mr. Shaw: The implementation of the Civil Defence Regulations 1983, now afoot throughout the country, is the most important prerequisite for making effective use of the civil defence grant to which I have referred. I trust that my hon. Friend will continue his sterling work of goading the recalcitrant local authorities to adopt a sensible approach to the security of their citizens.

Mr. Corbett: If the Minister is really interested in the security of citizens, when will he start making money available to enable local authorities to plan properly to cope with non-nuclear emergencies. At the moment little or no cash is available and there is a big hole in the safety provisions.

Mr. Shaw: I am delighted to receive that floral tribute from the hon. Gentleman. With the passage of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) we shall be able to make it clear that local authorities can indeed use grant aid for non-nuclear, peacetime emergencies. That does not in any way stop them from making proper provision for volunteers or planning for all emergencies now.

Mr. Neil Thorne: Will my hon. Friend do his best to continue to put pressure on the Treasury to agree to 100 per cent. funding for civil defence purposes? It is one of the main reasons why local authorities are so reluctant to be involved in this issue. There is no earthly reason why a suitable adjustment should not be made to the rate support grant which would mean that no more public expenditure would be involved.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will be aware that there is another question on the Order Paper that relates to this issue. I shall confine myself now to making it clear that the Treasury has approved increases in grant-aid available through the Home Office—£9·1 million two years ago, £11·9 million last year and £13·7 million this year. We mean what we say. We are giving civil defence a substantial increase in expenditure.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that money spent promoting so-called nuclear-free zones provides no civil defence cover before, during or after any nuclear or any other conflagration? Does he also agree that the £81,000 of taxpayers' and ratepayers' money devoted this year by the GLC to the promotion of nuclear-free zones would have been much better spent on civil defence throughout London?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is right. The GLC has spent just short of £500,000 on the GLAWARS study, which seems to suggest that a substantial part of the Government's policy earns the GLC's endorsement. It is ridiculous to offer anyone at any time nuclear-free zones as a form of protection.

Visiting Forces Act

7. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department at how many institutions in the United Kingdom there are personnel presently covered by the terms of the Visiting Forces Act.

Mr. Mellor: I understand that most of the personnel covered by the Act are members of United States forces stationed at eight main operational bases.

Mr. Ashdown: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. Why does the Home Office not collect information on the number of occasions on which the jurisdiction of British courts is dodged because visiting forces claim primary jurisdiction under the Visiting Forces Act 1952? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that foreign Governments collect such information? Is he further aware that the United States Government released the information that 420 members of the United States air force had infringed British law in relation to drug abuse and that 388 of them had been removed from the jurisdiction of the British courts? We have to rely on foreign Governments for information because the Home Office will not collect it.

Mr. Mellor: It has never seemed appropriate for us to collect information about an Act which has been on the statute book for more than 30 years and which, except for the hon. Gentleman's lonely crusade, has been generally accepted by most hon. Members as being good sense. The hon. Gentleman has given an extremely tendentious account of the arrangements. The arrangements cover who should have primary jurisdiction to deal with offences. If an offence is committed on a base and the only people involved are other service men, those forces deal with the offence in accordance with the rules of good order and discipline. If we object to the way in which they deal with the matter, we have a right under those arrangements to apply to have that jurisdiction waived. This is a way of determining who should deal with the issues. It is not a way by which the jurisdiction is "dodged", to use the hon. Gentleman's inapt expression.

Mr. Baldry: Is it not disappointing that certain hon. Gentlemen should use the Visiting Forces Act as a snide way of attacking our American allies? As one who has a United States air force base in his constituency, I remind my hon. Friend that most people believe that those service men are very good neighbours. We are grateful for the protection and assistance that they give our people.

Mr. Mellor: I quite agree with that.

Criminal Justice (White Paper)

8. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received following the publication of his recent White Paper on criminal justice.

Mr. Hurd: Very few so far, but I am glad that the White Paper has aroused considerable public interest and comment.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the public will be greatly reassured if powers are taken to arrange for effective guidance to be given to ensure that sentences for serious and violent crimes reflect the profound public concern about those crimes?

Mr. Hurd: There is public concern about sentencing. We carefully set out in the White Paper the various options. We preferred the option whereby guidance from the Court of Appeal should be published under statutory authority, which does not happen at the moment, and in a more accessible and single form. I think that that could provide substantial help in reassuring the public that occasional waywardness towards leniency in sentencing is corrected by those who should do that—the judiciary itself.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the extension of the maximum sentence of life imprisonment for carrying firearms, as suggested in the White Paper, would be dangerous because it would incite people who carry firearms to use them? Is that proposal not another example of the Government being more interested in the rhetoric rather than in the substance of fighting crime?

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir. I think that the hon. Gentleman has that quite wrong. We are talking about maximum sentences. If one offender uses a firearm and another merely carries one, it is open to the court to impose the greater sentence on the one who uses it.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my right hon. Friend look at the possibility of naming rape defendants once they are charged and also at the improper way in which rape victims tend to be named by some of the press? Both those issues cause great concern to the community at large as rape is such a shocking and detestable crime.

Mr. Hurd: As my hon. Friend knows, we are examining both those issues.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many people are bitterly disappointed that the White Paper offers so little in the way of help to the victims of crime, whose numbers have increased dramatically since the Government came into office? The derisory £136,000 now being offered to the 282 victim support schemes shows just how little the Government really care about the victims of crime. Will the Home Secretary now reconsider the decision to fund centrally local victim support schemes?

Mr. Hurd: One of the helpful things happening in this country is the increased interest in victims and the increased growth of victim support schemes. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we support the central and national associations for those schemes and they, in turn, give guidance to local schemes. This year, for the first time, we have a relatively modest sum for direct help to local schemes. The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong about the criminal justice White Paper. One of the main points in the White Paper is the increased pressure on courts to award compensation in suitable cases.

Mr. Forth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the public expect violent criminals to be put in prison for very long periods of time, if only to guarantee the safety of the public? Apart from the excellent prison building programme upon which the Government have now embarked, will my right hon. Friend undertake to look again at people who are now in prison and perhaps should not be, in order to ensure that those who should be in prison are guaranteed to be put there?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is quite right. Both policies must go on at the same time. We must always be looking for alternatives to custody for relatively minor offenders, some of whom now go to prison because the courts are not persuaded that there are valid alternatives. At the same time, we must ensure that serious offenders receive the prison sentences they deserve, not just because of the nature of their crime, but for the proper protection of the public.

Mr. Ryman: Will the right hon. Gentleman make it quite clear to those of his supporters who are obviously very ignorant about the machinery of justice that it is not for the Executive to express views about sentencing, but is a matter entirely for the judiciary? The right hon. Gentleman and the Executive should be careful not to infringe the discretion of the judiciary.

Mr. Hurd: I think it is perfectly reasonable that public concern about the occasional leniency of sentences should find expression in this House. In the White Paper, as the hon. Gentleman will see, we set out carefully the options for meeting this concern and I hope that he will think that the one we prefer, which I have already sketched, is the sensible one.

Mr. Spencer: If the judiciary does not pay attention to directions in the law reports or in textbooks on sentencing practice, why should it pay heed to any further publicity on sentencing? Will my right hon. Friend consider, as a further option, giving the Crown the right of appeal against over-lenient sentences, with the requirement that the offender must serve any increased sentence?

Mr. Hurd: That is one of the options in the White Paper. For the reason that I have given, I somewhat prefer the option that is set out at greater length, which is the one I described in an earlier answer.

Mr. Kaufman: What is the use of a White Paper which deals so substantially with sentencing criminals when one cannot sentence most criminals, as most of them are not caught? In view of the fact that the clear-up rate for crimes of violence has fallen by 5 per cent. under this Government, for burglary by 9 per cent., for theft by 12·5 per cent., for fraud by 19 per cent., for criminal damage by 23 per cent., and the overall clear-up rate for crime has now fallen to 35 per cent., when, instead of this complacent waffle about crime, will the Home Secretary take effective action to deal with this record crime wave?

Mr. Hurd: Throughout his comments the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be surprised and offended that the White Paper on criminal justice deals with criminal justice and not with police strengths. Almost every day I engage the right hon. Gentleman in one way or another on police strengths, police powers, crime prevention—to which I welcome the Labour party's belated conversion—and the different aspects of our strategy. The White Paper on criminal justice deals with criminal justice. When the Government introduce a Bill in the next Session, I am sure that the different elements that it contains will receive the support that they deserve from the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Hickmet: To pick up the point of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), inasmuch as the White Paper is designed to increase the powers of the courts in relation to sentencing policy, and inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman says that the courts cannot sentence those whom the police do not detect, what effect does my right hon. Friend think that the Labour party's policy of undermining confidence in the police and being anti-police, through their statements in this House and through the actions of the police committees, has had upon effective and efficient policing in this country and, consequently, upon the prosecution of offenders? Has not the Labour party undermined the authority of the police?

Mr. Hurd: Of course, and that is one reason why the Opposition make so much noise about it. — [Interruption.] They are at it again, Mr. Speaker. They know that they will not be taken seriously on this matter until they do something about Labour leaders, particularly those in London, who spend all their time undermining and sabotaging the efforts of the police.

Victims of Crime

10. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in his Department's regular statistics of crime details of the sex, age and ethnic origins and occupation of victims of crime.

Mr. Mellor: Unfortunately, we cannot do that because the requisite information is not available to all police forces that provide the data on which the regular statistics are based. But much relevant material drawn from the British crime survey is already published. An ad hoc survey of some of the information from those forces that record it was carried out in 1985, and the main results will be published by the Home Office during 1986.

Mr. Hardy: The Home Secretary was right a few moments ago when he commended the work of the victim support unit, especially at this time of absolutely astonishing and deplorable increases in crime of all kinds, but does the Minister accept that it might be useful if more were known about those who are particularly vulnerable to crime, not merely to assist in the prevention of crime, but to be of some help in determining how offenders are to be treated?

Mr. Mellor: The Government have taken forward the work in that area in a number of ways, most notably by means of the experimental reparation schemes and the increased support that they have given to the victim support movement. I have to remind the hon. Gentleman that no money was given to the victim support movement by previous Governments, although there was a crime level that more than justified a greater interest in victims than previous Governments showed.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: What is the point of knowing the ethnic origins of the victim? Does a Jew not bleed as much?

Mr. Mellor: I am sure that that must be one of the reasons why the information is not collected.

Young People (Violent Offences)

12. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young people aged under 21 years were cautioned for, and found guilty of, violent offences in 1979 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: Some 24,533 in 1979 and 26,891 in 1984.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If an adult under the age of 21 breaks into the home of an elderly couple and mercilessly and savagely beats them up, leading to hospitalisation, should the charge that is brought before the court be one of actual or grievous bodily harm, and should that person be allowed out on bail? Does the Minister wish to express a view on these matters?

Mr. Mellor: I should have to suppress any view, although I may well have a view, on the basis that the question of what charge is preferred is a matter for the independent prosecution authorities and that the decision as to bail is a matter for the courts. One of the purposes behind the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 is to grade offences according to the severity of the violence caused. One hopes that the charge matches the severity of the violence caused.

Mr. Favell: Should not the names of all young persons over the age of 14 who commit these appalling crimes of violence be published? Do they not deserve the derision of their neighbours?

Mr. Mellor: The general rule has always been that the names of young persons should not be so published, but I have of course taken note of my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Corbett: Will the Minister concentrate on the real problem, which is that since his Government came to power violent crime has increased by 40 per cent., while the clear-up rate has gone down by 5 per cent.? What does to do about dealing with violent crime to prevent more and more of our people—one person every nine seconds—becoming the victims of crime?

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman well knows that the rise in violent crime was just as steep—indeed, steeper—under the last Labour Government. What we have done is to strengthen the police so that more crimes are being cleared up, and to give the courts enhanced powers to deal with violent offenders. That is the appropriate way to go forward.

Civil Defence

13. Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Government intend to undertake a public recruitment campaign for civil defence volunteers.

16. Dr. Blackburn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government intend to increase the level of civil defence volunteer training and activity in the next 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Developments of this nature, while highly admirable, can be effective only in partnership with local authorities and if they are properly implementing the Civil Defence Regulations 1983. The Government give the highest priority to achieving this planned state of preparedness.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Is my hon. Friend aware that it is now some three years since the House started to get concerned at the Government's inability to put sufficient pressure upon those local authorities which are quite deliberately jeopardising their citizens? Is it not about time that the regulations were amended to put some teeth into them so that local authorities could be persuaded to start recruiting the many people who want to help in this sort of valuable work?

Mr. Shaw: I fully support my hon. Friend's statement. He will recall that last year my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary issued the instructions that the regulations be enacted, and local authorities were given until December 1985 to produce plans of their civil defence preparedness. The plans are now being thoroughly investigated, and I shall be reporting to the House the result of that in due course.

Dr. Blackburn: Will my right hon. Friend recommend to local authorities that the civil defence forces that we have are a valuable means of helping in peacetime catastrophes, and will he press this with the local authorities?

Mr. Shaw: Yes, Sir. Our present range of volunteers include 1,100 scientific advisers, 13,000 community volunteers and 1,750 experts in communications. All these have an important role to play, and many of them could play a useful role in an entirely peaceful emergency.

Crimes of Violence

14. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received from the general public in recent weeks regarding crimes of violence and muggings; and what general reply he has given.

Mr. Hurd: So far this year I have received 47 expressing concern about crimes of violence and mugging. The replies generally set out the powers granted by Parliament to the courts for dealing with violent crime and explain the Government's crime strategy as it relates to these offences.

Mr. Latham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that nothing could be more harmful to social harmony than the feeling among the frail and elderly that they are not safe on the streets or even in their homes? Will he ensure that the full resources of the state, both financially and in terms of information back-up, are given to the police to help them in their struggle against violence?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, Sir. I agree with my hon. Friend. One reason why we are introducing the new offence of disorderly conduct is precisely to protect the kind of people my hon. Friend is talking about against harassment and distress. It is worth recording that, although violent crime has continued to rise for many years now, that rise has somewhat slowed down, and 75 per cent. of all offences of violence against the person are cleared up.

Mr. Alton: When the Home Secretary is looking at the rise in violent crime, will he say whether any research has been done by his Department into the link between rising numbers of muggings and crimes of violence and the drugs trade? Will he say whether very many of the young people involved in these kinds of crimes are heroin addicts themselves?

Mr. Hurd: It is difficult to get statistics about this. The hon. Member is quite right about its importance. Undoubtedly there is growing anecdotal evidence that more and more of the kinds of crimes with which the question deals are prompted by a desire to finance drug-taking.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Home Secretary not appalled that under the Conservative Government crimes of violence have increased by 40 per cent.? This is what is worrying people throughout the country. Is it not true, as he said quite effectively in a press statement last week, that, however one looks at the facts and figures, the reality is bleak?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with that. What I disagree with is the implication in the hon. Gentleman's question that this started in 1979. It has been going on for 30 years now. The peak age for offending by males is 15, and by females it is 14. That brings out the whole question of the responsibility of parents and of teachers as well as of the courts.

Civil Defence

15. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government intend to implement 100 per cent. grant-aid outside rate support grant to local authorities for civil defence expenditure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Representations in support of extending the items eligible for 100 per cent. civil defence grant-aid are being actively considered and I will inform the House of the outcome.

Mr. Bowden: Does my hon. Friend agree that 90 per cent. of local authorities will fail to fulfil their civil defence requirements until there is 100 per cent. funding?

Mr. Shaw: I fully sympathise with my hon. Friend's view that, particularly on staff costs, a strong case is made for extending the 100 per cent. grant. However, my hon. Friend should understand that we must consider closely the implications of any such extension.

Crime Prevention (Community Programme)

17. Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what involvement his Department has in promoting crime prevention projects through the community programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In October last year my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced an initiative designed to link the MSC community programme firmly with crime prevention projects. Since then a team has been set up within the Home Office to support the development of such projects. An explanatory booklet, "Crime Prevention and the Community Programme", has been widely distributed to various statutory and voluntary bodies in England and Wales to assist prospective sponsors.

Mr. Couchman: Is my hon. Friend satisfied with progress on the projects which seek to curtail crime?

Mr. Shaw: I certainly would not say that we can be satisfied, but the increasing efforts made through the community programme and the substantial number of places that are being offered under it augur well for crime prevention in city centres.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I attended the memorial service for Mr. Palme in Westminster Abbey. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Penhaligon: As a result of the Budget a married man will, on his 72nd earned pound, pay 29p in tax, but someone fortunate enough to inherit £10 million from a rich parent will have the tax reduced from £3 million to nothing. What have the Government got against working?

The Prime Minister: I make no apology for this Government having reduced the confiscatory levels of taxation on those with considerable earnings and accumulated capital. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to join the Opposition Front Bench in going back to 83 per cent. on earned income and 98 per cent. on savings, will he let us know what Liberal party policy is?

Q2. Mr. Wilkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wilkinson: In view of the alarming increase in the incidence of violent crime, particularly by young people, can my right hon. Friend find time today to reconsider carefully the potential merits of the reintroduction of national service, especially as national service, in addition to the youth training scheme, could be an invaluable way of providing young people with the technical training and skills which they need in today's world?

The Prime Minister: I know my hon. Friend's views on this, but it would mean an enormous change in the whole of our defence policy, which is founded on professional armed services, and which has served the country well. Although I know that he would like to give many young people an opportunity of belonging to something like the armed services, I do not think I can promise him anything on this so far as I can see in the future. We prefer to rely on the armed services youth training scheme to give some people the opportunity.

Mr. Kinnock: The Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly said on Tuesday:

"given the very substantial increase in the oil companies' margins, there is clearly no need for the pump price of petrol to go up at all. Indeed, it ought to fall further." — [Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 180.]

In view of the refusal of the major oil companies to follow that view, will the Prime Minister give an undertaking now that if the oil companies do not cut the price of a gallon of petrol by the 12p which they could well afford, she will take away their gains in a windfall tax on profits?

The Prime Minister: I think that the right hon. Gentleman is a little premature. I support wholly what the Chancellor said. Indeed, we said virtually as much in the House before the Budget. If the majors do not hold down their prices, they will stand to lose out to the independents, who are purchasing and selling at cheaper prices. Therefore, they would not gain. I think that the announcement in which they said that they would put up their prices has already done them a great deal of harm.

Mr. Kinnock: At the rate of £14 million a week in extra profit, which the oil majors will make if they do not cut their prices, they will be laughing all the way to the bank. Why does the Prime Minister not use the power that she has instead of offering what is now only a pious sentiment and expressing a hope in competition, which will probably not be realised?

The Prime Minister: I think that it will take place. I think that people are shrewd enough to go to the independents, which are charging far less for petrol. I find it amazing that people will choose to go to those who charge higher prices when they can go to the independents, which, I have no doubt, will offer considerable competition.

Q3. Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Leigh: In the course of her busy day, has the Prime Minister had an opportunity to read Bernard Shaw's "The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism", and in particular, the phrase:

"money is made for us to get what we want, instead of what other people think we ought to want."

Is not the theme of this Budget that tax cuts will enable the British people to get what they want, rather than what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) thinks they ought to want?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend, and that is why we are making a point of reducing personal income tax. Had we left the national insurance surcharge —introduced and then raised by a Labour Government —where it was, personal income tax could already be down to 25p in the pound on the basic rate.

Q4. Mr. Cartwright asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cartwright: Has the Prime Minister had time to note the admission by the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government yesterday that sulphur pollution from British power stations is damaging Norwegian lakes? In the light of that admission, will the Government now ensure that all coal-fired power stations, particularly the five new ones announced yesterday, will be so designed as to cut sulphur emissions?

The Prime Minister: Obviously we shall try to design new power stations so that there are even greater improvements than those which we have achieved on sulphur emission. This Government's record on reducing pollution is very good indeed.

Mr. Rhodes James: Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to the deliberate physical assaults upon and intimidation of Professor John Vincent of Bristol university, who is an eminent and deeply respected historian? His lectures have been disrupted, his teaching prevented, his family afflicted, simply because he writes occasional articles for a paper owned by Mr. Rupert Murdoch. What has happened to free speech that we had —and for which we went through two world wars—and why is the Leader of the Opposition so silent about these outrages?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that such assaults are intolerable and should never occur in a free country. They should be condemned by everyone on both sides of this House.

Q5. Mr. Garrett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Garrett: I appreciate that the Prime Minister has a busy schedule and that she will not be able to attend the launch next week at Swan Hunters on Tyneside of HMS Sheffield. This ship replaces one sunk in the Falklands. Could she make arrangements to attend the launch on 8 April, the following week, of her sister ship, HMS Coventry? She will see, on both occasions, that both ships have gone down the slipway on time, and both have been secured as the result of hard, competitive bargaining with the Ministry of Defence. Is the right hon. Lady aware that, now that those ships are nearing completion, there will be a gap, and it is important that, on a free competitive basis, further orders be given to fill this gap in the work load, or there will be redundancies?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman and the work force of Swan Hunters on producing these ships on time. I recognise that further orders have to be placed on a competitive basis. I know the one about which he is concerned, and I stress that the order has to be done on a competitive basis.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend will know that last week the Select Committee on the Environment published a report on the disposal of nuclear waste. Does she agree that before any special development order is laid before the House authorising exploratory work to be carried out at Fulbeck airfield, time should be given for the fullest debate and consideration of the report, and that the special development order should be deferred until such time?

The Prime Minister: I am aware that my hon. Friend has a particular interest in one of the sites, Fulbeck, which I also happen to know. I shall pass on the message to my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal, and I understand that he will want a full debate on these matters.

Dr. Owen: In view of the need to increase industrial competitiveness, why did the Government not use the money that they had given away in a penny off the standard rate of income tax to cut national insurance contributions by 10 per cent., which would also have had a substantially greater impact on unemployment?

The Prime Minister: Because, having already abolished the national insurance surcharge — the right hon. Gentleman was a member of the Government that put it on and increased it—it was felt that those in industry should also have some incentive. I shall be interested to see whether the right hon. Gentleman votes against the reduction.

Mr. Churchill: Has my right hon. Friend noticed the much greater alacrity with which oil companies have put up their prices, compared to the way they bring them down in line with worldwide prices? If the oil majors persist in refusing to heed the words of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and other Ministers, will my right hon. Friend consider referral to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

The Prime Minister: I shall pass that message on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. We should wait a little to see whether the oil majors take the advice of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, which was clearly given. If they do not, they will not get as much business. Therefore, they will have less profit than they would otherwise receive.

Q6. Ms. Richardson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Richardson: As all women in a certain age group have to spend about £2 or £3 a month on sanitary products, when many of them are in low-paid jobs or on supplementary benefit, and as they have not had one penny of help out of the Budget, will the Prime Minister ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take the earliest opportunity to remove VAT from sanitary products?

The Prime Minister: No. I believe that this is a matter that has come up every year on the Budget for many years under all Governments. I am afraid that I shall have to disappoint the hon. Lady.

Q7. Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pawsey: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern that is felt in some quarters about the introduction of the GCSE examination? Can she confirm that the examination is on target and that some adequate resources have been put into the system to ensure that teachers will be adequately trained in the new examination when it is introduced later this year?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend implies, I am aware that there is a great deal of concern about the timing of the new examination. I also know that considerable resources are being put into the programme—about £10 million for teacher training, and about £20 million for special equipment and textbooks. Although there is concern about the timing, I know of no proposal to postpone the introduction of this examination.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Has the Prime Minister seen the recent Harris Poll finding, showing that a huge 91 per cent. of the electorate want Members of Parliament to be given a free vote on Sunday trading? Would it not be totally outrageous for her Government to try to steamroll the Shops Bill through, in the light of that finding?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the Bill has come from another place, and I think he must leave whipping until the Bill is going through this House.

Q8. Mr. Favell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 20 March.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Favell: What does my right hon. Friend think would be the effect on the Treasury of suddenly losing £5 billion of revenue if, God forbid, we ever had another Labour Government—or an alliance one, come to that?

The Prime Minister: It would not be long before this country went to the International Monetary Fund again, and we must see that that never happens and that the possibility of a Labour Government does not happen.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Does the Prime Minister recall that before the election she was making scathing references to the enormous salaries of the City slickers? She was also referring to the tax imposed on the low-paid £140-a-week nurse. Does she concede that, as a result of the Budget, the City slicker on a salary of over £100,000 is getting more than £30 a week back in income tax while the £140-a-week nurse is getting 30 bob, and, if she lives in nursing accommodation and is threatened with eviction, she will be even worse off?

The Prime Minister: But according to what I understood from the hon. Gentleman's own Front Bench yesterday, his party will not vote against the reduction of basic rate income tax.

Mr. Hickmet: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During questions to Home Office Ministers the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) accused some Members of being racists. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw that remark, especially as it is particularly offensive coming from a Member who has entertained the IRA in this Palace.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear a remark of that kind, but I am sure that the whole House would agree that we do not want comments of that sort levelled across the Chamber, if it was said.

Business of the House

3.33 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 24 MARCH—Conclusion of the debate on the Budget statement.

Consideration of the Lords amendment to the Museum of London Bill.

Motions on the Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) Order and the Coal Industry (Limit on Payments in respect of Redundant Mineworkers) Order.

TUESDAY 25 MARCH—Third Reading of the Gas Bill —(2nd Allotted Day).

Motion for the Easter Adjournment

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Local Government Bill.

WEDNESDAY 26 MARCH—There will be a debate on Members' Representations on immigration cases on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 27 MARCH—The House will meet at 9.30 am, take questions until 10.30 am and adjourn at 3.30 pm until Tuesday 8 April.

The House may also be asked to consider other business as necessary.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Does he recall that he has given repeated undertakings that when a conclusion to the negotiations about British Leyland is reached

"it will be for the House to debate and decide upon the result of those negotiations." — [Official Report, 20 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 480.]?

No such debate is listed for debate next week. In view of the strong reports of the exchanges between the parties involved in the BL business, there is now widespread concern about the possibility that the House will be denied the opportunity which the right hon. Gentleman has been promising. Can he allay that justifiable anxiety by giving an undertaking now that there will be no conclusive settlement of purchase by anyone or by any organisation unless and until the House has debated and decided upon the course of events?

Could the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Government will accept the Lords amendments to the Local Government Bill, and will he give us an undertaking that no subsequent legislation will be introduced to frustrate the effect of those amendments?

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a foreign affairs debate to be held as soon as possible after the House returns following the Easter recess? I have asked for a statement on the Government's attitude to President Reagan's readiness to contemplate the use of military force against Nicaragua and to finance the terrorist Contra rebels. The House should have an opportunity to debate that issue as well as the many other matters of pressing interest.

Mr. Biffen: In respect of British Leyland, the undertakings that I gave on 20 February still stand, but I understand why the right hon. Gentleman raises that point, since no debate on British Leyland has been announced for next week. Clearly, if it were necessary to change the business to provide for such a debate, it would be a matter for discussion through the usual channels. In any event, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will make a statement to the House before the House rises for the Easter recess.

On the question of the treatment of Lords amendments to the Local Government Bill, it would be apropriate for the Minister in charge of the Bill to make known Government policy in due course.

On the question of a foreign affairs debate, I take account of what the right hon. Gentleman says. Perhaps we can consider that through the usual channels.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Has my right hon. Friend's attention been drawn to early-day motion 595 in the names of responsible Opposition Members and some Conservative Members congratulating Spain on its wise decision to remain within the NATO Alliance?

[That this House congratulates the Spanish people on their massive re-affirmation of membership of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.]

Has he further noticed an amendment entirely to the contrary tabled by the loony Left? In those circumstances, would it not be useful to have a debate so that we may clarify precisely where the Opposition stand on the important matter of the NATO Alliance?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a pertinent point. When we have the foreign affairs debate, which I hope cannot be too long delayed, it will be an opportunity for hon. Members in all parts of the House to assert their commitment to NATO and to a NATO which depends on nuclear weapons.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Having heard the request of the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) that the debate on the special development orders on the NIREX sites should be deferred until the Environment Select Committee report has been discussed, will the Leader of the House give an assurance that that will be done?

Will there be a debate on the Sunday trading Bill in the first week after we return, and will the right hon. Gentleman's right hon. and hon. Friends be given a free vote?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has asked me about a free vote so often that, if I were less generous, I would judge that he was a slow learner. That is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary. I take note of his concern that the Second Reading debate is held reasonably soon after our return. We shall have to see what progress we make.

On the hon. Gentleman's first point, the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) are of great seriousness, and I shall take account of them when judging the timing of the debates on that topic.

Sir Frederic Bennett (Torbay): As it now seems that we shall have a foreign affairs debate, of which we have comparatively few, will my right hon. Friend ensure that it is broadly drawn because we do not want it to develop merely into a discussion of matters regarding one small country in Central America, or, with due respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), even the Spanish adhesion to NATO? We should also like to discuss the question of continuing Soviet aggression and massacre in Afghanistan, and continuing Soviet-guided oppression in Poland.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my right hon. Friend echoes what has long been the tradition in foreign affairs debates —they are drawn and tabled in such a way as to enable the widest possible discussion.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Is the Leader of the House aware that yesterday the Government announced some £45 million of expenditure at Waterloo station to accommodate the terminus for the Channel fixed link? Is he further aware that, of 30 questions that I put to the Secretary of State for Transport on the matter, more than 20 were simply referred back to British Rail and a consultation document that does not answer them? Will he encourage his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make a statement to the House on how the money will be used so that both local communities and commuters in the southern region can see what congestion is likely to result at Waterloo from its being the exclusive terminus for the link?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the whole House will sympathise with the hon. Gentleman over his misfortune about trying to table questions effectively. He raises a point of substance and I will draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the last 12 months there have been several indications of the impending publication of the Government's proposals about family courts? Those indications have not been fulfilled. In view of suggestions that we are to see something before Easter, may we look forward to a statement next week about the publication of these proposals?

Mr. Biffen: I am unable to answer my hon. Friend, but I will take up his point with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Will the Leader of the House ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement about the British Steel Corporation's tubes division strike in my constituency and also in the constituency of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith)? Will he make representations to the chairman and the chairman-elect of the British Steel Corporation to get both sides to the negotiating table as quickly as possible in an effort to resolve this disastrous dispute? It is disastrous not only for the men but for the country.

Mr. Biffen: I can probably best help the hon. Gentleman by getting in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): My right hon. Friend said that there would be a statement on British Leyland before the Easter recess. That statement will have ramifications in different parts of the country, and, in view of that, may I ask that the debate on the statement should not take place until after Easter? That will give us time to consult locally with the management and the workforce. We do not want a rush job on this because it has many important investment and employment ramifications.

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says and I understand the judgment which prompts him to make that request. I have said that the matter will be discussed through the usual channels, and I must stand by that.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that there is great interest among all hon. Members about the impending voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry about advertising and sports sponsorship? Has he noticed that the last written question today, question 172, calls for an answer on this subject? That is a wholly unsatisfactory way of informing the House about a matter of major interest. Will he make sure that next week the Minister makes a statement to the House that can be questioned by hon. Members on both sides of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I will draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend. He could chance his arm with an Adjournment debate on this topic.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Rather than worrying about three line Whips — because a 30 line Whip would not induce me to vote for the Shops Bill — will my right hon. Friend spend his time at Easter considering whether we need to proceed with this regrettable measure?

Mr. Biffen: I am looking forward to eight days during which the topic will be erased from my memory. I know that it will still be here when I return.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Has the attention of the Leader of the House been drawn to early-day motions 630 and 631, which were tabled late last evening and which are headed by all the names of the Opposition Members of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill?

[That the Order [16th December] relating to the nomination of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill be discharged.]

[That it be an instruction to the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill that it do not report the Bill to the House until: (a) it has received written and oral evidence on the conclusions of Mr. David Calcutt Q.C. on matters referred to him by the Secretary of State for Defence, as announced on 29th October 1985 and (b) it has received any oral evidence which the honourable Member for Newry and Armagh may wish to give and received oral evidence from the Ministry of Defence on the contents of their memoranda submitted to it on the rôle of the Ulster Defence Regiment insofar as it relates to the provisions of the Armed Forces Bill.]

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that almost without precedent a gag has been put upon members of the Select Committee about receiving and hearing oral evidence from the Ministry of Defence, from hon. Members and from members of the public? Is he further aware that a guillotine motion on the Select Committee's proceedings was moved by the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of State for the Armed Forces who was serving on that Bill, and that there has been a clear abuse and a tyrannical use of Government power by the man who tried to gag Clive Ponting? He is trying to do it to Members of Parliament on that same Select Committee. Will the Leader of the House instruct his friends on that Committee not to proceed with the business of the Committee until we have discussed both these early-day motions?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that there are conventions which inhibit my role concerning what happens in Select Committees. In any case, the House will be able to debate the issues raised in the Select Committee when the Armed Forces Bill is reported to the House.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Although my right hon. Friend has no direct responsibility for the French National Assembly's problems of cohabitation with President Mitterrand, can he confirm that certain difficulties arise from the current situation in France that have created a virtual hiccup in progress on the Bill on the Channel tunnel? In view of the constitutional problems in France, will my right hon. Friend give the House his assurance that no attempt will be made to introduce or vote on the Bill in this House until the French have sorted out their domestic problems?

Mr. Biffen: I hate to tangle with my hon. Friend, particularly on this topic, but his enthusiasm over the French having got themselves into a fearful mess because of their change of Government might be a little premature. However, I take note of his remarks, and realise that the House will wish to return to the issue after the Easter recess.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): As the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill would not permit me to give oral evidence in relation to behaviour and discipline in the UDR, will the leader of the House arrange for a debate on that issue if only to circumvent such censorship and to protect the right of free speech of hon. Members elected to the House?

Mr. Biffen: I certainly do not accept the hon. Gentleman's description of the behaviour of my colleagues in Committee upstairs. However, if he wishes to pursue the matter, he should consider raising it during the debate on the Easter Adjournment motion or on one of the Adjournment debates immediately before the recess.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Has my right hon. Friend seen the directive agreed yesterday by the Commission in Brussels which is designed to restrict the percentage of non-Common Market programmes shown on British television? In view of the importance of that in undermining the independence and authority of the BBC and the Independent Broadcasting Authority, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that a Minister makes a statement next week saying whether the Government support that plan? Also, could the Single European Act be forced on Britain by a majority decision of the member states?

Mr. Biffen: I am beginning to realise how lack-lustre my life is, as I do not have the opportunity to pay such close attention as my hon. Friend obviously does to the European Commission's affairs. However, I shall study his point, and be in touch.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Given the rise in the number of reported cases of rape, will the Leader of the House find time next week to debate the need for the proper funding of rape crisis centres, the fact that the Home Office should run a campaign to educate women to be able to protect themselves better, the proper retraining of police forces and the creation of special units to train those dealing with sex crimes?

Mr. Biffen: I accept at once the importance of that point, but I think that the hon. Lady will agree that there are several Adjournment debates next week when it would be most appropriate to raise it.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Following the tragic and untimely death of my constituent, the boxer, Steve Watt, will my right hon. Friend encourage the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), to hold discussions with the medical profession on improving protection against serious injury to boxers?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has raised a point of real and tragic seriousness, and I shall certainly draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Minister to it.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Given the Government's welcome decision to drop their vindictive campaign against trade unionists at GCHQ, will the Leader of the House arrange for an early debate on the individual's right to belong to a trade union in a free society?

Mr. Biffen: I am always anxious to try to provide occasions for the hon. Gentleman to say thank you, but this time it might not be possible quite yet because of all the other demands on Government time.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): May we have a clear statement soon on the Government's attitude towards flexible licensing hours, lest inaction causes unnecessary disappointment to brewery workers, workers in the tourist industry and Conservative supporters who believe that their party is against unnecessary nannying?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is wrestling with one major aspect of liberalisation and perhaps we should let him get that out of the way before considering other matters.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the Leader of the House accept that next Wednesday's debate on the motion for the Adjournment of the House cannot possibly deal with the basic iniquity of separating families and will, in any event, come too late for some families? I think, for example, of the Vengadasamys in my constituency, where the father has been forced to return to Malaysia, leaving his wife and five children behind, and of Mr. Lakhatrariya, who is being forced out even though his wife is extremely unwell and they have a doctor's report. Is there to be no consideration of basic legislation to prevent the separation of families, which would never be countenanced in other countries that we criticise?

Mr. Biffen: I am not clear from what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said whether the cases he has quoted were in respect of illegal immigrants. The hon. and learned Gentleman ought to take advantage of next Wednesday's debate—for all its limitations—to make his point, which, I believe, is in favour of more liberal immigration laws.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Will my right hon. Friend accept that it is the fairly clear view of the House that we should not be asked to debate special development orders on nuclear waste until we have been given the opportunity to debate the Select Committee's report? That being so, it may be some time before we debate the special development orders. In such circumstances, will my right hon. Friend make early arrangements for a debate on the subject of compensation, as my constituents are suffering financial loss as a result of the announcement made by NIREX that Fulbeck is a possible site for the disposal of nuclear waste?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) put his point more shrewdly and skilfully than my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend is asking me to be more specific than I can reasonably undertake to be at the Dispatch Box. I must disappoint him, and that saddens me no end.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House draw the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to early-day motion 619?

[That this House is alarmed at the recent revelation of activity by the Contras against the democratically elected government of Nicaragua; is appalled that on 25th January 1985 in Waslala, Zelaya, a group of civilian travellers and children were ambushed on their way to meet President Ortega; is horrified that on 29th June 1984, Paco Sivilla, a teacher from Brownback, was hunted by a group of Contras and his ears, tongue and private parts cut off before he was brutally murdered; is shocked that in July 1984 Adám Flores, a 70-year-old man, was murdered by a force of 70 Contras; further believes that these are a few examples of the most appalling murders by Contra forces gainst the people of Nicaragua; believes that President Reagan's attempts to send a further $100 million in aid to the Contras can only continue the war and result in further murders of the Nicaraguan people; and accordingly demands that Her Majesty's Government put all possible pressure on President Reagan to cease all support for the Contras and respect the territorial integrity and peaceful wishes of the people of Nicaragua.]

It concerns the Contras' violence against the people of Nicaragua.

Will the right hon. Gentleman further arrange for his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to make a statement to the House about what efforts the Government have made to stop the sending of further aid to the Contras which can only lead to more murders and violations of human rights by the Contras forces backed by the United States? Does he accept that that is an urgent and important matter in the quest for world peace?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's description of the conflict which now unhappily divides Nicaragua. I will try to arrange as soon as I reasonably can a debate on foreign affairs in which the hon. Gentleman's point can be made.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Does my right hon. Friend recall the assurances given by Her Majesty's Government about budget discipline in the EC following the Fontainebleau meeting? Is he aware that we are almost bound to get a large supplementary budget out of the EC this year demanding more money? Will he assure the House that, if that happens, we will be given the fullest possible opportunity to debate the matter and that we have a range of options to consider and not just a "take it or leave it" from the Government?

Mr. Biffen: I will certainly bear in mind my hon. Friend's point should that situation arise when I make my propositions about how the matter should be handled.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Would it be possible to have a sensible answer today from the Leader of the House about the colliery review procedure? Is he aware that this procedure has now fallen wholly into disrepute as many of the coal mining unions are contemplating refusal to participate in it? Is he also aware that the National Coal Board made its decision in respect of the Bates colliery closure in the face of the evidence of the recommendation made by the independent colliery review body? Is he further aware that, had NACODS had the courage and guts to help the coal miners at Bates colliery, the coal mining industry would have suffered enormously by a slowing down of production.

Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that nobody believes a word that the Secretary of State for Energy says about pit closures and therefore it is no use the Leader of the House giving me his customory, supercilious answer that he will refer the matter to the Secretary of State for Energy as no one believes a word the Secretary of State says?

Mr. Biffen: I seem to have spent most of today either listening to the hon. Gentleman or reading about him. I am afraid that I cannot add anything to what I said at this time last week, and I am sorry that such a sentiment is so unsatisfactory to him.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Will right hon. Friend turn his attention to some of the takeover battles that are going on in the City? Is he aware that a new and sinister trend has started which involves squalid and vicious attempts to discredit chairmen and directors? Does he agree that such tactics are completely unethical and bring shame on a great institution? May we discuss that here?

Mr. Biffen: I understand very well why my hon. Friend feels compelled to raise that point and it is appropriate that I should draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to his comments.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on sentencing policy so that the House can take account of the strong feelings throughout Britain, particularly in London, on rape and the calls of many members of the public for life sentences for convicted rapists, the naming of convicted rapists, and for life to mean life in particularly nasty cases?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's point will cause concern within the Chamber and deep public anxiety. I shall refer his remarks to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, although I must say that, given the pressure on Government time from now on as we have to deal with the Finance Bill and Report stages of other legislation, I cannot promise that there will be an opportunity for an early debate in Government time.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): May I remind my right hon. Friend that the proposals of NIREX in selecting four sites for the disposal of low and intermediate level nuclear waste have caused great concern in the constituencies involved, one of which is in South Humberside, adjacent to my constituency? May I also remind my right hon. Friend that the Select Committee's report on the disposal of nuclear waste undermines many of the proposals of NIREX and that it would be unsatisfactory if we were to debate the special development order giving powers to survey in the various areas concerned before the Select Committee's report has been debated because if the recommendations were accepted the NIREX proposals would be left high and dry?

Mr. Biffen: I gave a fairly generous reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and I cannot go further than that. I know only too well how important this is to a number of my hon. Friends and they argue their constituency cases properly, legitimately and vigorously.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): With regard to Leyland, and in my case particularly Land Rover, will my right hon. Friend accept from me that some of us have found it the tiniest bit hard this afternoon to reconcile his remarks about next week's business with what we have been told in the past about a decision before Easter and a debate before a decision? That having been said, will he accept from me that we would sincerely rather have the right decision after Easter than a wrong or hurried one before Easter?

Mr. Biffen: This is a topic on which I am best advised to say that I note what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the registration and licensing of nursing homes and residential care homes? Is he aware that, under the Registered Homes Act 1984, 4,509 homes were registered in 1983 but that in 1985 the number had shot up by 45 per cent. to 6,443? I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that that growth industry is a matter for concern, and more adequate and professional staff should be appointed. Can something be done to arrange a debate to protect the elderly, who are being put into those homes at the expense of the Department of Health and Social Security?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that aspect of the development in our welfare services which is proceeding at such speed. As he will appreciate, the Department of Health and Social Security is top for questions next Tuesday, and I suspect that he will also take an interest in the matter when it comes to the Adjournment debates.

Easter Adjournment

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about the Easter Adjournment debates. I remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Thursday 27 March up to nine Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm by Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the results made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Orders of the Day

WAYS AND MEANS

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [18 March].

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That it is expedient to amend the law with respect to the national Debt and public revenue and to make further provision in connection with finance; but this Resolution does not extend to the making of any amendment with respect to value added tax so as to provide—

(a) for zero-rating or exempting any supply;

(b) for refunding any amount of tax;

(c) for varying the rate of that tax otherwise than in relation to all supplies and importations; or

(d) for any relief other than relief applying to goods of whatever description or services of whatever description.—[Mr. Lawson.]

Budget Resolutions and Economic Situation

Relevant documents: European Community Document No. 9792/85, Annual Economic Report 1985-86 and the unnumbered document, Annual Economic Report 1985-86 (final version as adopted by the Council).

3.59 pm

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I always believe, in my simple way, that it is possible to get some agreement on objectives on both sides of the House. I hope that there is broad agreement, certainly in the county, that the main aim of the Budget has to be to maintain the present excellent performance of the economy in such a way as to speed up the number of new jobs which will be created. [Interruption.] It is no good Opposition Members deriding that statement of aim and description of the economy. One of the most notable aspects of the Budget statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was the extremely good outlook that he was able to describe to the House and the country.

We face the best economic outlook that most people of today's working generation have ever faced in their lifetime. We expect high growth, low inflation, falling oil prices and stable exchange rates at levels at which we can be competitive. Yesterday interest rates fell. I do not know of the experience of my hon. Friends or of Opposition Members, but most of the people I have met over the past few years in the manufacturing industries have told me that those are the conditions that we must try to create. All these things explain why employment has been rising faster in the United Kingdom than in the rest of the European Community. First, as a general proposition, the Chancellor has created the conditions for jobs. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that and on his Budget measures. In my opinion, if my right hon. Friend had not used the slogan "Budget for jobs" last year, he could have used it forcefully for this Budget.

When people first react to a Budget, they immediately take on board the tax changes as they affect day-to-day life —a penny off the basic rate of income tax, 11p on a packet of cigarettes, nothing on beer, and so on. It will take a little more time for people to appreciate the complete extent of the employment measures in this Budget. They are extensive and they are ambitious. But, quite predictably, the principal complaint of all the Opposition parties is that they do not appear to cost enough to the taxpayer.

Most of our critics tend to pluck large figures of public expenditure out of the air and then claim that thousands of new jobs would be created if this spending went in certain directions. I have to say that, having considered most of the rival propositions which have been put forward over the past few months, the connection between the cash and the jobs is usually highly debatable.

In the Budget we have programmes which will be less expensive to the taxpayer than those urged upon us, but they will be more effective. We now have the opportunity to consider these measures in greater detail. First, we have measures designed to produce more new businesses and new jobs. The enterprise allowance scheme has been highly successful in helping unemployed people to set themselves up in business. Very many unemployed people — surprising numbers — would like to have a go at working self-employed in a business of their own. We offer support of £40 each week for a year and business advice for many who do so. My right hon. Friend announced in the Budget that we are now nearly doubling the size of this programme. Now we will be helping no fewer than 2,000 unemployed people each week to start working for themselves.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): The Minister is seeking to proclaim the cost-effectiveness of expenditure on this scheme as compared with other schemes. Does he agree with his Department's figures that, for every 100 jobs created under this scheme, only 50 real jobs are created because they are replacing 50 other jobs — jobs which already exist? If the Minister had spent the money on the community programme, there would have been 93 new jobs created for every 100 jobs.

Mr. Clarke: We have studied carefully the cost per job created in each scheme, as we have for all the schemes that I shall outline. I shall come later to the expansion of the community programme.

All these schemes which we are expanding compare extremely favourably in cost per job terms with any of the rival propositions urged upon us. There is some deadweight in all of them — some displacement, some small businesses which do not succeed — but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the enterprise allowance scheme has been highly successful. The vast majority of the new businesses thrive and many will provide fresh employment as they plan to take on employees within a year or two of starting up. I am not comparing this with the community programme; we are expanding that as well. I compare it with the propositions contained in the rival budget of the alliance, many of dubious quality and a high cost per job.

I assume that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) will support the enterprise allowance scheme. The fact that we shall help 2,000 unemployed people each week is welcome.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Although I welcome strongly the expansion of the scheme, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in some cases the taxation liability arising from being paid the enterprise allowance can be larger than the enterprise allowance? Will he look at this aspect in reforming the scheme?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for drawing my attention to that. I think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in the Budget ending, and certainly has the intention of ending, that tax anomaly. It is a valid point, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has agreed to put it right in the Finance Bill.

We are dealing with the existing measures which will be expanded and we are introducing a new version of the small firms loan guarantee scheme, which will last for three years. Over the past seven months since I have been in the Department, I have repeatedly met business men whose enterprises are beginning to thrive and expand and who have impressed upon me how this scheme was essential to give them the working capital they need to start. The main snag with the old scheme was that loans were expensive with extra high interest being paid. We are halving the premium on new borrowing to 2·5 per cent. This will make the scheme even more successful and attractive to small businesses which need capital to expand.

The Opposition can never decide what their attitude should be to the EAS, the small firms loan guarantee scheme, to small firms, self-employment and personal enterprise. I have to tell them that small firms and self-employment are among the major sectors for employment growth worldwide and that we have a long way to go before we catch up with other countries. The Labour and trades union movement's apparent obsession with "smoke stack" industries is yet another example of their determination to put the clock back. The Government are determined to help those who wish to work for themselves or to set up small businesses — not least because they have to make an important contribution to the continuing growth in employment in Britain.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): We fully support all programmes which increase economic activity and increase jobs. There is no doubt about that. It would come a little bit stronger from the Minister for Employment if he recognised that many Labour authorities, through their enterprise and economic units, have created many small businesses and they are often much more effective than the Government. The Government and, in particular, the Chancellor have denied £8 million to the GLC to do that type of work.

Mr. Clarke: I shall look forward to receiving the support for small business schemes which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has promised. It is certainly true that the Labour and trades union movements are not in the forefront of initiating policies which seek to expand self-employment or small business in any way.

The hon. Member refers to the activity of local authorities with regard to small business support and enterprise. When such support is well directed and carefully thought out, the Government are quite prepared to support it. I recognise that some councils do a reasonable job. However, the effectiveness of councils' actions varies considerably up and down the country. In my opinion, there are certainly a large number of local authorities which ought to pay greater attention to keeping down the rate burden on businesses in their areas than they do in attempting to get into the enterprise policy area.

I certainly query the cost per job effectiveness of many of the things done by local councils. I shall probably have the support of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East when I state that the schemes I have described are cost effective and well directed. I have dealt only with expanding the existing successful programmes. We are also introducing two new programmes. One is for young people entering employment for the first time. We have called it the new workers scheme.

The new workers scheme will provide a direct financial incentive for employers to recruit 18 to 20-year-olds by paying them a subsidy of £15 a week for 12 months. We have seen a steady fall in the rate of unemployment of young people under 18 over the past three years. We are anxious that employers should be able to offer inexperienced young people over 18 the jobs at the start of their career ladder that many need to start their working lives. We expect that no fewer than 70,000 young people will benefit from the scheme in its first year at a cost of some £25 million.

This scheme will build on the two-year YTS which is being launched in two weeks' time and which will provide quality training leading to recognised qualifications for 16 and 17-year-old school leavers. I hope — I repeat the sentiment with which I began—that we can all agree on the value of giving school leavers a better start in the world and better job prospects through YTS. I believe that the great majority of sensible people in industry are positively enthusiastic about our new scheme, which will be a permanent feature of training for work.

However, I noticed that, only last week, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East described the youth training scheme as a "skivvy" scheme. As I have said before, that was a ludicrously irresponsible way for a member of the shadow Cabinet to dismiss a new system of youth training supported by employers, trade unionists, the CBI and the TUC. The hon. Gentleman's view of the YTS is not shared by young people. We have carried out surveys to ascertain what young people think of the scheme. More than 1 million young people have entered the YTS since 1983. Our surveys show that 80 per cent. say that their training was worth while. Two thirds of YTS trainees get jobs immediately or move straight on to further education or other forms of training.

What the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East says is not just irresponsible or politically damaging to his party, although I believe it is certainly that — it is certainly damaging his credibility in the industrial world —but is positively damaging to the interests of the more gullible young people who are influenced by what he says. Calling YTS a "skivvy" scheme or "slave labour", or whatever the current cant phrase of the Labour Left maybe, has only one effect — to make some young people suspicious of YTS, to put them off joining it and, therefore, to make them miss out on an important chance of improving their job prospects. That is what the hon. Gentleman and the more Left-wing of his colleagues in the Labour party are doing and the sooner they realise it, the better.

Mr. Prescott: I am glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has got that off his chest. I said at the press conference I attended that many of the schemes under YTS are cheap, exploitive and skivvy schemes. [Interruption.] Another Minister asked me for evidence and I sent him parcels and papers — all the details. He left before saying whether he thought that I was right about private agencies. Many people are concerned about this matter. The Paymaster General has talked about industry's record. Its record in putting money into training is deplorable, as the Manpower Services Commission has shown in the piddling amount of money it put into training compared with our competitors.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's second point was a good, hearty and virulent attack on something about which I was not speaking. I referred to his remarks about the two-year YTS and YTS. On the hon. Gentleman's first point, he knows perfectly well that we are describing the introduction of a two-year scheme which will provide for training provided by approved training agencies. Of course, in the early days, the training was less than satisfactory and, no doubt, there are still some cases in which we have not improved that position. Everyone in the CBI, the TUC and the MSC has striven to eliminate that unsatisfactory training. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East knows that the press conferences he gives turn into virulent attacks on YTS which deter young people who might otherwise take up this opportunity in April.

I shall at least give the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East credit for one thing: when he attacks YTS, or aspects of it, he seems to understand what he is attacking. He follows and studies his subject. Yesterday, I could not help noticing that the leader of the Liberal party, in introducing his ten-minute Bill, said:

> "I accept that the YTS is improving, but the process is painfully slow and it needs speeding up."—[Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 302.]

I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was seriously suggesting that the Liberal party could introduce a new, improved form of YTS before 1 April this year. I do not know whether he has tried telling employers, unions and managing agents, who, in my experience, are working flat out for the success of the new scheme, that progress is "painfully slow". The way in which the right hon. Gentleman introduced the Bill showed the pathetic irrelevance of the Liberal party to employment and training.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I do not seek to intervene on behalf of the Liberal party. I should like to put to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the question I put to him before on the second year of YTS. Why does he not sort out properly the matter of the extra burden imposed by the present arrangements for the second year on local authorities, especially those that have given such great assistance in making the schemes work? Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be very encouraging if he said that the whole of the extra cost would be borne by central Government and that local authorities, especially in areas of the highest unemployment, would not have to bear that extra burden.

Mr. Clarke: I have had a lengthy exchange on this matter before with the right hon. Gentleman. I am sure that he went back to his constituency and checked up on our exchanges. We have no shortage generally of the two-year places we require, which are provided by employers in the public sector and in the private sector who accept that, in the second year, they must pick up part of the burden. This reflects the fact that, in that second year, the trainees are undoubtedly giving added value to the employer. Local authorities are offering second-year places.

The local authorities that claim they are getting into most difficulty are those that are bowing to pressure from their branch of the National and Local Government Officers Association to top up the allowance payable to YTS trainees. That is a totally self-imposed burden chosen by local authorities and not one to which the Government could agree to divert funds from the mainstream of their training policies. I cannot understand why the local authority of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has difficulties which other local authorities in equally hard-pressed areas do not have if it is paying the YTS allowance at the level accepted in the programmes generally.

Mr. Foot: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has got it wrong again. The same demand is faced by all the local authorities in our area — not just my local authority. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman look at the matter afresh and ascertain whether the whole of the extra cost in the second year can be borne by central Government rather than by the local authorities?

Mr. Clarke: I shall look again to ascertain whether all local authorities in south Wales are agreeing to NALGO's demands that they top up the YTS allowance to an unnecessary level. If that is not happening, I cannot understand why local authorities generally in the right hon. Gentleman's area cannot participate in the two-year YTS on the same basis as many other local authorities throughout the United Kingdom. I do not accept that this is a general problem which we are failing to tackle. I believe that, if local authorities, as private sector employment and voluntary bodies, continue to participate, we shall find that the two-year YTS is a desirable and permanent addition to the training and preparation for work of young people.

I began by describing the new workers scheme which will follow on from the two-year YTS. It is an extremely valuable addition to everything we are doing to continue to reduce unemployment among young people.

Our second new programme is a package of measures designed to help the long-term unemployed which we call our restart programme. Ever since we began to work together last autumn, my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and I have become increasingly convinced that it is our duty to help those people who are in danger of completely falling out of the world of work. After a year or more of unemployment, despair and disillusion can set in in the mind of an unemployed person. Perversely, employers are reluctant to take on people who have no recent record of work to show that they can hold down a job and cope with the disciplines and pace of work. I have found in my contacts with my opposite numbers in the European Council of Ministers that the problem of long-term unemployment is an emerging problem in all our economies and is obviously one of the most important problems we should tackle.

Our plans, which we have carefully drawn up, are concerned with the social consequences of unemployment and the dignity of those seeking work as well as the creation of jobs. That approach underlines our ambitious plans to help the long-term unemployed. We have deliberately chosen to make a high priority of the 1·3 million people who have been registered as out of work for more than a year. We must not allow them to be left out of the better job market that economic recovery is producing.

We propose a person-to-person approach on an individual basis to each and every man and woman in the United Kingdom unemployed for more than a year.

Mr. Prescott: Tea and sympathy.

Mr. Clarke: It is ridiculous for the hon. Gentleman, before he has addressed himself to the details, to react in his typically aggressive way to the idea that we are turning our attention to the individual problems of more than 1 million people. If the hon. Gentleman will refrain from uttering his slogans for a minute and will follow the details, I shall challenge him to criticise our approach or to say in what way he would build on it. I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman would scrap it, abandon it or seek to oppose it in any way.

Mr. Prescott: I do not oppose it.

Mr. Clarke: I have never before faced an hon. Member across the Dispatch Box who barracks so persistently on something which he then says he will not oppose.

Mr. Prescott: Anything which gives help or advice to the unemployed we will welcome. What the unemployed want after the advice is the jobs. There are 20 unemployed for every one vacancy the Government offer. All the right hon. and learned Gentleman can be offering is tea and sympathy, not a job.

Mr. Clarke: That is not true. If the hon. Gentleman will listen he will discover what we are talking about and what he is barracking.

He agrees with anything that offers individual support for the long-term unemployed. That involves a substantial effort when we are talking about 1·3 million people. Every one of those long-term unemployed will be invited, in the first place, to a discussion with an adviser in a jobcentre, who will consider the personal position and needs of each one. The discussion will determine which of a menu—for lack of a better phrase—of opportunities, some new and some already established, is most suitable for the person being helped. As I have already said, it is a massive undertaking, in organisational terms alone, to address ourselves to the individual position of well over 1 million people and offer them individual help. It amounts to a revolution in our approach to long-term unemployment.

Let me describe the process and see whether I can get more agreement not to oppose from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. The jobcentres will take the initiative in calling in the long-term unemployed, every single one of them, by March of next year. We are recruiting 2,000 extra staff—an increase of nearly 25 per cent. on the staff in the jobcentres—to be able to offer the help I have described. Beyond the initial interview at the jobcentre, we are providing a whole range of courses and programmes designed to improve the chances of the long-term unemployed finding work.

In the first place, we are increasing the chances of their finding work by expanding the community programme to a total of 255,000 places by the end of this year. That will mean that in a full year the community programme will be able to provide jobs for some 300,000 people.

Secondly, we are greatly extending the network of job clubs, which have a very impressive record in helping the long-term unemployed back into work. I do not think that the shadow Chancellor, who is not here today, altogether understands that. The shadow Chancellor said yesterday that job clubs were places where, as he understood it,

"young people come together and discuss why it is that they are out of work."—[Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 307.]

That is absolute rubbish, and if that is his understanding, he should study the concept of job clubs more closely. Job clubs are places where long-term unemployed people of all ages come together for a minimum number of hours each week to be helped by a member of our staff in a sustained effort of job application, seeking every suitable advertised vacancy in the locality.

What was wrong with the figures of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is that he talked only about vacancies in jobcentres, which are going up. As we all know, only a small proportion are ever notified to jobcentres in the first place. The job clubs actually help the people who participate to pursue not only jobcentre vacancies but all those advertised in the local newspapers. People are given the support of a member of staff in chasing all those jobs.

Job clubs are one of the most successful measures we have adopted. Contrary to what the shadow Chancellor appeared to assert, our records so far show that nearly two thirds of job club members have found work. If the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East or any other Opposition Member visits a job club he will find spectacular individual examples of people who have been out of work for some time who have been placed in jobs by this method.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is strange that in many areas employers are looking for people to work for them but cannot get the people they want with the right skills? Does he also agree that job clubs will be a great help in giving people advice as to what skills are needed in the market place and where they can go to be trained in those skills?

Mr. Clarke: That is the point of the initiative we are taking to provide individual advice for the long-term unemployed. I am working through what I have described as the menu of opportunities we offer. When some people discuss their individual situation it is found that they require training and that if they acquired some skills which were within their grasp they would be much more employable. Others are already equipped to find work but they are helped by a job club to find it.

Some people will be able to obtain help from other schemes we are extending, such as the new restart courses, which help people to brush up their job-finding skills. Many of the long-term unemployed are not good at presenting themselves and employers have something of a prejudice against the long-term unemployed, who they believe will not satisfactorily hold down a job.

Finally, over and above that, we are making a £20 a week job start allowance available nationally so as to provide a direct financial incentive to the long-term unemployed person to return to work, even if he has to take a lower paid job to get started again.

We have carefully tried out that package of measures. The programme we now call the restart programme was previously tried out in nine totally different towns as diverse as Crawley and Dundee. We have had no time to do a full academic study of the results because we are acting urgently and we want to crack on with tackling the problem. However, since we started our pilot schemes, we have noticed that while unemployment fell nationally in January — a bad month — by only 0·1 per cent., unemployment in our restart trial areas fell by 1·1 per cent. We have been carrying out much more detailed and sophisticated monitoring and what we have seen so far has given us confidence to go national in the restart programme.

I know what the Labour party's reaction is. It is wholly predictable, as it has been throughout the debate. It will say "That cannot be good enough; it does not cost enough." Anything in a Socialist programme has to cost a large amount of taxpayers' money. Even our moderate critics tend, as I said at the beginning of my speech, to talk of billions of pounds of public expenditure whenever they talk of unemployment in order to give more credibility to their proposals.

If I address the only coherent alternative to what we are putting forward, I suppose the most fashionable ingredient in every instant wonder cure for unemployment being peddled at the moment is increased spending on infrastructure. I have no intention of being totally hostile to spending on infrastructure when I am a member of Government who are already spending greatly increased amounts on the infrastructure. I played a part in restoring the trunk road programme and the hospital building programme, which had both been savaged by our Lib-Lab predecessors. New hospital building in particular had been axed by a third in 1976 by the people who are now converted to the wonders of infrastructure spending. Sweeping speeches about going further and thereby solving unemployment have to be examined with scepticism and care.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has followed me in some of the things I have done in Government and Opposition. He and I have faced each other on other issues and he knows as well as I do, and should remember from personal experience, that on transport and health when we need to spend money, we spend it. Since 1979 we have increased capital spending in real terms, over and above inflation, on motorways and trunk roads by almost one quarter. Spending on motorway and trunk road repairs has increased by 100 per cent. in real terms since 1979. I am working through the list of items that have appeared in the speeches of Labour Members. I have not noticed that they have omitted roads. The alliance always mentions roads, as does the Labour party. We have spent 16 per cent. more in real terms on hospitals since 1979.

The problem that arises in those areas and that makes such a nonsense of the Opposition's sweeping assertions is often one of delays to projects rather than unwillingness to spend money to meet real needs. It typically takes 10 years to build a road, from its planning stage, and 15 years for a hospital. Personally, I trust that my successors at the Department of Health and Social Security are tackling that with the same vigour as I was trying to, because those lead times would be regarded as ludicrous in any private sector schemes. However, the delays are caused by public inquiries and bureaucracy. They are more of an enemy to the infrastructure in those areas than tight money or lack of financing. That is relevant to our debate. Those problems have to be borne in mind. That is why claims to boost infrastructure spending are often impracticable as well as unnecessary.

The real problem is that modern construction methods are capital intensive, not labour intensive. Person-to-person service industries are the labour intensive activities in a modern economy, not public works. Capital programmes that are perfectly desirable in themselves to cut out transport costs and improve our environment are fairly useless when looked at as special measures to assist the unemployed.

Arguments are advanced about all the unemployed building workers. The Opposition are being converted. At one time they listed sewers. This is the daftest example of all to give when seeking to suggest that increased spending on the infrastructure will produce more jobs. The Opposition are now talking only about housing. That, at least, has narrowed the scope. Modern tunnelling methods mean that the number of men who are required to build sewers is tiny. It is good to build sewers to prevent holes appearing in roads but, as a special measure in itself, it is not a good way of trying to put the unemployed back to work. Even the favourite arguments about all the unemployed building workers — those who might be employed in housing—are hard to sustain in many parts of the country. This has relevance even to those who say that housing is the main method of boosting employment. I have read a recent report of the Federation of Master Builders. It is headed "Work goes begging as firms struggle to get craftsmen."

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way in a moment. The hon. Gentleman's alternative budget will rely heavily upon sudden boosts to infrastructure spending to create jobs.

Mr. Wrigglesworth rose——

Mr. Clarke: Let the hon. Gentleman listen to this quotation from the magazine Building of 7 March 1986 and then I shall give way. It is based on a report of the Federation of Master Builders. It says:

"Small and medium-sized firms affiliated to the Federation of Master Builders are reporting labour shortages throughout the country. Some companies are turning down work because of the unfilled vacancies, which are blamed mainly on poor training. A survey carried out by the Federation of Master Builders shows that 39 per cent. of the 528 member firms who responded are suffering skills shortages even in areas of high unemployment. London is worst hit with 53 per cent. of firms short of manpower."

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

Mr. Clarke: I trust that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) will make a speech during the course of the Budget debate. He has tried to intervene in every Budget speech that I have listened to so far.

Mr. Straw: What are the skillcentres doing?

Mr. Clarke: Before the hon. Gentleman makes his speech, he ought to consider the fact that the number of people who are being trained in skillcentres has greatly increased during the last 12 months. Let me continue my quotation, and then I shall give way either to the hon. Member for Blackburn or to the hon. Member for Stockton, South, if either of those Members is prepared to stand up. The following quotation is also relevant. It says:

"In addition, 14 per cent. of firms reporting labour shortages could not find general operatives, despite the high number of labourers registered as unemployed. The overwhelming majority, some 74 per cent. have been unable to fill job vacancies for six months or more, according to the report, with 60 per cent. being 'limited in the workload they could take on as a consequence'. Many firms wanted to employ direct labour but found that the growth of the black economy and the number of self-employed tradesmen prevented 34 per cent. of firms from doing so."

Relevant lessons are to be drawn from that. I agree with the quotation given by the federation's national director, Bill Hilton, at the end of the report. He said:

"The report's findings prove that we have to do far more to encourage carpenters, bricklayers and other skills into the industry. There are lessons for the Government and the industry."

But there is also a lesson for the Opposition that is relevant to this debate. When they put forward alternative budgets they claim that increased, instant spending will increase the number of jobs. However, those who are seeking workers cannot find labour. Most of the claims in the alternative budgets of the Labour, Liberal and Social Democratic parties that millions of pounds of new building work would take thousands of building workers off the dole are not sustainable.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: It is remarkable that the organisation upon which the Paymaster General relies for this report also spends a considerable amount of time pressing the alliance and others to increase expenditure in the very areas that he has decried. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that our budget proposals both for last year and this year do not rely entirely, as he seeks to suggest, upon massively increased spending on capital projects? They include a spread of proposals, including education and training in particular, to ensure that the skill shortages in my area, about which many complaints are made, do not exist in the future.

Mr. Clarke: I shall try to refer to as many ingredients as possible in the alleged alternative budget, but I am now dealing with the Government's Budget. If the hon. Gentleman says that the Federation of Master Builders has lobbied his party for increased spending on the building, I can believe it. He has been in politics long enough to know that most of those who come along to lobby do so because they want the amount of building to be increased in their area. My point is that the experiene of the Federation of Master Builders is that they are turning away work because they cannot recruit labour, including unskilled labour. Therefore, we have to address that problem before that ingredient of the hon. Gentleman's policies, which he says would increase jobs, can be sustained.

Mr. Bob Edwards (Wolverhampton, South-East): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way in a minute. After I have dealt with training, I shall listen to what the hon. Gentleman has to say.

Of course there is a training problem. That is why we are putting so much effort into training. Recently I visited the new training complex of the Construction Industry Training Board at Bircham Newton. The CITB is the major agency for providing youth training scheme places. It has provided 18,000 training places for young people, and next year it will be taking full advantage of the Government's new programme of two-year training. No doubt the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East will continue to try to put young people off taking advantage of those training schemes by attacking them as "skivvy" schemes.

Mr. Prescott: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is introducing a great deal of confusion into the debate. The Government have abolished 16 of the 23 industrial training boards. The Construction Industry Training Board is one of the few that remains. In that sense, there is control by industry, employers and unions over the introduction of a proper degree of training into the youth training scheme. I fully endorse and accept that point, but that is not the experience in the majority of youth training schemes.

Mr. Clarke: I repeat what I said earlier—that we are concentrating upon improving the quality of the training that is provided in the youth training schemes. Mistakes were no doubt made during the early days of the YTS. Everybody is now concentrating upon providing good quality, two-year training from 1 April next. Substantial changes are being made. From 1 April, those who provide places will have to be approved training agencies. However, that does not appear to be leading to any abatement of the hon. Gentleman's attacks upon the scheme. I believe that it should. The way in which he attacks the scheme is clearly designed to put off young people. He is playing up to the audience behind him, which he knows contains—[HON. MEMBERS: "Not so much of an audience."] No. We keep returning to the same point.

We are told that that infrastructure spending is the main alternative. When one looks at the alliance alternatives, one finds that substantial reliance is placed on the community programme. I looked carefully at the alliance's alternative budget to try to find out where the large number of jobs that they claimed would be created could be found. I found that those which had any credibility were boosted significantly by taking the target that we had announced before the budget of 230,000 places and calmly doubling it to 460,000. I take that imitation as a compliment. The alliance has slipped into its policy a calm invitation to increase the successful community programme that this Government have already launched. We have been expanding it flat out, to the limits of what is practicable.

We have to improve the quality of the work that is being provided in the community programme. It has to be of real quality for those who are engaged in the community programme so that at the end of 12 months they can demonstrate that they have done a worthwhile job that involves real work disciplines. It also has to be of value to the community as a whole. That is why we are devising schemes of crime prevention by putting in locks and similar equipment for elderly people and of energy conservation by insulating the homes of elderly people. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is preparing a programme of schemes relating to the environment, as is my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to help farming in rural areas. This will involve over 250,000 people at any one time in schemes of real quality.

To put together an alternative budget, all the alliance can do is pluck a figure out of the air and claim that it can double the whole programme to a little less than 500,000 people, and I have to say that we would be back to counting lamp posts if we tried to expand to that degree and at that level. It may make a good speech, but it does not make any more credible a policy for unemployment, any more than does asserting that infrastructure spending of one kind or another—even on housing, which the Opposition appear to accept is the only one worth arguing—can make a substantial contribution to the number of jobs that it is claimed will be achieved if these alternative policies are implemented.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): The other day I was talking to a bricklayer who was working near my home. He has come from Glasgow to work in the south because he cannot get employment in his trade in Glasgow. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has given these bland assurances that building employers cannot get skilled workers, but is there not something wrong with the structure? Is it a fact that skilled building workers cannot get work in the north and come to the south in search of it? Is that what is going on and, if so, to what extent is it going on?

Mr. Clarke: I find that astonishing, first, because, when one visits Glasgow, one sees an extensive amount of rebuilding going on, particularly in east Glasgow. Secondly, according to the claims of the Federation of Master Builders, in the north, which in its submission includes the whole of Scotland and a bit of northern England as well, 20 per cent. of firms were reporting shortages of labour while in London 53 per cent. of employers were reporting difficulty in finding labour. If a bricklayer is skilled and produces work of quality, he ought to be able to find a job. That is why we concentrate so much on building up the amount of training that is given to bricklayers.

I have spent some time setting out our employment propositions in the programme we put together, which was announced in the Budget of my right hon. Friend. I think that the full extent of it has not yet been appreciated, but it will be as we start to tackle the problems of the long-term unemployed and the need for training throughout the country.

I will not spend much more time on the policies of the Opposition because I think that, on the whole, they exist in speeches rather than in reality.

We heard yesterday from the shadow Chancellor that he is no longer into big spending. He is indignant about the Chief Secretary's attacks on his £24 billion programme, which the shadow Chancellor combines with a clear commitment not to raise the basic rate of income tax and an apparent determination——

Mr. Prescott: He withdrew it last night.

Mr. Clarke: No, he did not. The shadow Chancellor is indignantly trying to refute the £24 billion. My right hon. Friend's answer was quite clear. He said that he had looked at the figures and was prepared to reduce one and increase another on what the Labour party keeps saying. The shadow Chancellor combines this with a commitment, that I have heard him make twice, that he will not raise the basic rate of income tax and an apparent determination not to oppose our 1p reduction in the basic rate.

If the shadow Chancellor and his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench seek to assert that

[Mr. Clarke]

£24 billion is not the case, I cannot help thinking, as I did yesterday, that I hope they have had a word with the shadow spokesmen on social services, on education and on health who have been going round the country showering promises like confetti—[Interruption.] It is interesting to note that the shadow Chancellor will apparently say no to all those proposals that have been made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and others of his hon. Friends.

As the Opposition clearly do not like what I am describing of their programme, let me give my understanding of what the scaled-down programme amounts to. The shadow Chancellor has now come down from the giddy heights of £24 billion towards the lower foothills of £6 billion or £7 billion. Half of what he describes as a "drive to create jobs" came from a straightforward addition to what he previously said regarding the recent Select Committee report. He added that £3·3 billion would produce 750,000 jobs as a result of adopting the Select Committee report. As shadow Chancellor, he ought to know that the gross cost of the Select Committee's proposals is at least £6 billion. The one-year jobs in the building industry and the one-year jobs in the Health Service proposed by the Select Committee merely repeat and do not add to the shadow Chancellor's other proposals, as he implied in his speech yesterday. He has taken on a new commitment to a £40 per week subsidy to the employer for every long-term unemployed person taken on, without any ceiling on the pay of that person. I can only say that that would displace thousands of people from their jobs if it were adopted as a general proposition.

I do not know—no doubt another spokesman will explain to the House—whether the shadow Chancellor is now taking on hook, line and sinker the Select Committee proposals, as appeared likely, only a few weeks after they came out without any further examination. The fact that he seems to have done so is a surprise to me. Alternatively, does his throw-away line yesterday suggest that, until the Select Committee came along with its report, he was desperately short of any employment policy? There must be a purpose in measures to help the unemployed, and that is what is plainly lacking in the right hon. Gentleman's plans.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I suspect that the Government also are desperately short of an employment policy, and I would be pleased if they took on board the Select Committee's report. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman guarantee to use his influence to ensure that there is a proper debate in the House on the report of the Select Committee?

Mr. Clarke: If the "drive to create jobs" now comprises the main part of the Opposition's policy, no doubt there will be rather more frequent opportunities to debate that.

It has been suggested that I should leave the Opposition to speak for their own policies. I therefore look forward to hearing the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East describe his party's commitments to reducing unemployment after he finishes what will no doubt be his inevitable denigration of the measures that I have announced.

I will be fair to the hon. Gentleman. He can sometimes be a very reponsible politician. Not for him the reckless protestations of the shadow Chancellor, who a few weeks ago exhorted all local authorities to get their plans ready for an orgy of capital spending in the event of a Labour Government getting back. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East spoke to a fringe meeting on 7 February at the Labour local government conference at Norwich, where he was candid and frank, as he often is. I have made inquiries of those responsible, and I am assured that the Municipal Journal of 7 February 1986 reported him accurately. It certainly looks authentic, and it was his usual forthright stuff to Labour Councillors. I will quote verbatim that report. It refers to him as the Labour spokesman on regional affairs, which is probably a reflection on the hon. Gentleman's spokesmanship on employment. It said:

> "'Central Government cannot be indifferent to the way you spend your money' he told delegates. 'And we must start spelling out exactly what we are going to do instead of simply issuing slogans to win power.' He turned to Neil Kinnock. 'How did we get this promise of one million jobs? Who worked on the programme? Promises such as these simply label us with targets we cannot achieve and expose our credibility'."

That is good forthright stuff, and in a moment I will allow the hon. Gentleman to start spelling out his programme. The time has come for the hon. Gentleman to start trying to do something about the tattered credibility of the Labour party. I do not envy him his task in answering a Budget which is based on an excellent economic outlook and which contains extremely worthwhile tax changes and most significant and ambitious employment measures aimed in particular at the young and the long-term unemployed. Neither I nor most of the public believe that he can improve on it. I shall follow with care every word he says as he tries to prove that 1 million new jobs could be created by the proposals he and the shadow Chancellor have been putting out.

4.50 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The Paymaster General spoke for a long time, but not one extra job will come out of the policy about which he talked. It is caring capitalism, the people's capitalism offering tea and sympathy instead of jobs. The argument of my right hon. and hon. Friends is not against giving counsel and offering schemes to small businesses and big businesses. We want jobs from wherever they may come. We have no ideological obsession whether jobs come from the private or the public sector or about what advice we give. We fully support local authorities, particularly Labour authorities and the metropolitan county councils which are being abolished, which have done much to produce jobs by using both public and private money. Hon. Members should not be in any doubt about our endorsement of any economic activity which creates jobs.

In regard to the quotation made by the Paymaster General at the end of his speech, the fact that the Municipal Journal got the wrong title for me calls into question the accuracy of the report. I do not deny that I said it is not good enough simply to repeat a slogan about 1 million jobs and hope that people will believe it; we are obliged to spell out precisely where the jobs will come from and the consequential effects on inflation, on the balance of payments and on borrowing. We must face the facts straight. If we do not, the electorate will not believe us. We do not need lectures, such as the Paymaster General's speech, about what we should do.

Central Government have taken it upon themselves to say that the reduction in unemployment is a central feature of Labour party policy. In the first two years of a Labour Government we would look to local authorities to play a major part in the public expenditure role. But we cannot be indifferent to how local authorities spend the money if we want to get the maximum number of jobs. That is a central point for anyone who wishes to work with local authorities in achieving the objective of 1 million jobs.

We shall spell out in detail where the jobs will come from. Yesterday my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the shadow Chancellor, started to identify the areas in which jobs would be created. More work is being done on the policies. The programme will be published in detail within 12 months in time for the next election. The Government can tell us then why they will not spend money on those areas. It is not just Labour Members who say that the Government could use public expenditure to create jobs; many of the Paymaster General's hon. Friends have been saying that for some time.

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman was in the Tory Reform Group that is precisely what he used to say. I assume that he is still a member of that group, which gave the following advice to the Chancellor:

"We believe that any extra resources should be used to cut unemployment by spending on direct job creation through essential public investment and measures such as we discuss below."

On the front of the document is the name of the Paymaster General.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Not as an author.

Mr. Prescott: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may not be an author, but I notice that every one of the authors comes from the Conservative party research department. If the Paymaster General wants not to endorse the document, but just to sponsor it, then, to avoid embarrassment with his hon. Friends, he should withdraw his name from the endorsement of that policy. I shall give him the opportunity now to disown it.

Mr. Clarke: As the hon. Gentleman has just denounced the accuracy of the Municipal Journal and then repeated just about every word he was reported as having said, he should cease taking what appear to be good points from the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who first discovered this pamphlet. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the front page, he will see a list of patrons of the Tory Reform Group, which includes the deputy Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) and other people. It is plain that we are not the authors of the document. I am proud to be a patron of the Tory Reform Group, but I do not agree with each and every word that it publishes, nor does every other member of the group.

Mr. Prescott: The Paymaster General has earned his title as one who deals more in tea and sympathy than in hard, concrete facts about what he is prepared to do for jobs. I accept that he does not endorse the policy of using public expenditure as a way of creating employment. We accept that that is not his view, or the view of the Government.

When the Paymaster General talked about local authority enterprise and community schemes, he was asked about training schemes run by local authorities. Local authorities are in doubt about maintaining good quality training under the youth training scheme because they are in difficulty through rate capping in financing schemes on a two-year basis. When the Government talk about local authorities using public expenditure to create jobs, they should remember that local authorities have been penalised by the loss of £16 billion of rate support grant, which in itself has created much unemployment.

On local authority financing we see in the Red Book that a further £2 billion burden is to be placed on ratepayers by the Government's financial proposals. That will undoubtedly cause further problems for local authority employment units and development bodies which have been creating jobs by using public and private capital, taking advice and introducing enterprise schemes.

I do not oppose business schemes, community schemes, YTS and counselling as a contribution to overcoming difficulties. My main charge against the Paymaster General is that he is misleading people because there is no prospect of his providing them with jobs. I accept that the long-term unemployed need advice and that they can get a good deal of help. I visit many jobcentres, job clubs, and so on, and talk to the people. I am not embarrassed about admitting that. I welcome the help that is being given to the long-term unemployed, but the main question we ask is whether the Government can provide them with jobs.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Given that we all share the hon. Gentleman's views on YTS and hope that local authorities will participate in it in future, may I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he agrees that the financial pressure on local authorities is often as much of their own making as of anyone else's? Does he agree that it would be more appropriate for local authorities to spend money on YTS rather than on nuclear-free zones or on give-away newspapers and propaganda? Does he agree that that would be a better priority?

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Gentleman is establishing a reputation for asking questions which are totally irrelevant to the point before the House. When local authorities have lost £16 billion from their rate support grant — a phenomenal amount of money — it is more relevant to point that out not just to Labour councils but to Tory councils, which have also been heavily penalised. We must remember that the loss of that money has affected training and employment. The Government are determined to pursue that policy, which is designed to create more unemployment, not jobs, although the Paymaster General says that he is concerned about job creation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If the hon. Gentleman takes as long as I did to make a speech, it will be because he has given way as often as I did. He said a moment ago that he was not opposed to counselling and that he supported job clubs. Does he recall listening with me yesterday to the shadow Chancellor saying that "the scheme for identifying the long-term unemployed and giving them counselling and help is not only deeply patronising to the long-term unemployed, but demonstrates a deep ignorance of the problem"?

The hon. Gentleman described job clubs as places

"where, as I understand it, young people come together and discuss why it is that they are out of work." — [Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 306-7.]

Would the hon. Gentleman confirm that, 24 hours later, he refuted both those statements?

Mr. Prescott: The Paymaster General has a reputation for being considerably sharper than that small point shows. He was put into that job to give it a liberal face and to put sharpness into it. He is not doing very well at the moment.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook and I have discussed our experiences when we visited jobcentres. We do not enter into criticism without getting some assessment and feedback. The job club scheme implies counselling the unemployed on how to get a job because many do not know how to write or to present themselves properly. That is an insult to many unemployed, who have previously been unemployed under a Labour Government when unemployment was 1·2 million. Two million more of these workers were then in work. They do not need any advice on how to get a job. They just want to get a job. That is what my right hon. Friend was concerned about when he made that point.

This Budget debate shows the kind of different reactions that we have seen in the press. I was looking at some of the quotes and newspaper reactions to the Budget. The Daily Mail says that "the Chancellor made a tasty Budget out of the scraps."

The Daily Express referred to a

"a Budget for a brave future."

The Daily Telegraph said it was "ingenious". I do not read The Times and The Sun, and nor should anyone else. The intellectual paper, The Guardian—I rather like this quote—said:

"All the basic problems that Mr. Lawson has inherited remain to haunt future administrations — appalling infrastructure, desperate housing conditions, low manufacturing investments, a withering technological base, a growing army of disenfranchised poor and unemployed. Yesterday's performance, for all its clever shifts and bright notions, did not even begin to address that grim and growing legacy."

When the Chancellor was faced with that quote on the "Today" programme, he said that it was "typical Guardian rubbish", or words to that effect. It was pointed out that the Financial Times editorial was similar.

There are two different views about this Budget. This is the first time that any Government have clearly rejected the idea of doing anything about reducing mass unemployment. It is the first time that they have given any sign that unemployment is not an electoral liability. They feel that it is far better to operate on tax than on the level of unemployment, and they are morally indifferent as to what is going to be the level of unemployment at the next election. That is one heck of a kick in the teeth for the unemployed.

Another reaction is that it is clearly a money Budget. Anyone who has any doubt has only to see the reaction of Conservative Back Benchers. Whenever money was being doled out, there were cheers and the waving of Order Papers, and suggestions that we cheer. There was not one murmur when we whizzed through the special employment package. Nobody knew that it had been done. I almost shouted, "Where is the beef?"

There was then a press conference the next day for the three-pronged attack by Lord Young—that amateur in the other place — and the Paymaster General to announce their new approach to unemployment. It clearly is a money Budget. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook pointed out that the rich will pay less, and the rest will pay more. It is true. That is precisely what came out of that Budget. He showed that a family on £5,000 a year gets 26 pence a week back. A family on £50,000 a year gets £3.30 a week back, which is even proportionately higher in relation to the income that they earn. When one considers that those earning £50,000 a year actually have received £1 billion in tax since 1979, and are still getting it fed down their throats, that is highly offensive to the 3 million or 4 million unemployed. The money that was given in stamp duty and other capital transfer stamps is twice as much as the amount of money that Lord Young persuaded the Chancellor to give towards these tea and sympathy measures that the Paymaster General has been talking about.

I think the one condemnation of this Budget is that it seems that the Government are prepared to borrow. I did not see anyone protest when my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition made the point that this Government have borrowed more than the Labour Government in their five years. We are actually borrowing to pay tax, but apparently it is evil to borrow to put people back into work. That is what this Budget is telling us. It is significant that this Budget does not mention anything about solving unemployment as an objective policy.

I looked back on some of the speeches that had been made in previous Budget debates, and I should like to remind the House of what was said. We have had six or seven years of this Government's policies, and we can now assume that they have had a chance to work in some form.

In the first Budget of March 1980 there were 1·3 million unemployed. The Chancellor at that time said:

"These are realistic policies, to which there is no alternative."—[Official Report, 26 March 1980, Vol. 981, c. 1489.]

By March 1981, and the next Budget, unemployment went up by 957,000 to 2·3 million. The Chancellor stated:

"Unemployment may be slowing down."—[Official Report, 10 March 1981, Vol. 1000, c. 757.]

Then in November 1981, we had the first fiddle which reduced the unemployment figures by 37,000. That made no difference. Unemployment, by the next Budget in March 1982, had gone up by nearly 500,000 to 2·8 million. The Chancellor then stated:

"I have a Budget for industry, and so it is a Budget for jobs."—[Official Report, 9 March 1982; Vol. 19, c. 727.]

We got the second fiddle in October 1982, which took a further 190,000 off the figures. By March 1983 unemployment went up by 351,000 to 3·1 million, and the Chancellor said:

"It is a Budget for recovery."—[Official Report, 15 March 1983; Vol. 39, c. 157.]

By April 1983 we had entered into another further fiddle —160,000 taken off our unemployed figures.

By March 1984—the Budget that was known as the "Budget for jobs" — unemployment had fallen by 29,000. The curious thing about that was that the only time unemployment fell in this country was in the period between the end of one Parliament and the election of another, because the Government pumped a bit of money into the economy and told local authorities, "Go out and spend, quick." They said, "Spend on housing" — no problems with skilled labour.

We then had a new Chancellor, and he said that the Government would assist in the creation of jobs. Well, they got into creating in the "Budget for jobs," and we find in March 1985 that unemployment had gone up by 125,000. By February 1986 it had gone up another 114,000, and the Chancellor told us yesterday of a further substantial range of measures to help the unemployed. I do not think that those are many of the sort of things that the Paymaster General talked about, unless it is the tea and sympathy jobs—not jobs.

As Lord Young said in an interview last night, the purpose of these measures is to show that the Government have not forgotten the long-term unemployed. They have not; they have invited them for a cup of tea and a chat. But the long-term unemployed cannot get jobs. There are no jobs in any of these proposals. The only jobs in these proposals are the 2,000 jobcentre workers who are going to interview the unemployed, and I welcome that. At least it is an increase in jobs. It is also an increase in bureaucracy in the Civil Service, which this Government have spent an awful lot of time proudly reducing.

The record shows the latest little bit of a fiddle. The Paymaster General exclaimed with great indignation when we called it a fiddle, although he knows it to be a fiddle. When he adds the self-employed to these figures—a method that has not been used in Europe—by June he will be able to show that the percentage of unemployed, such as the figure of 14·1 per cent. in January, is reduced to something like 12·9 per cent. We shall see a remarkable turn around in the June figures due to the Government's fiddling—loading up the total amount of people in work and reducing the number of unemployed by using different calculations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We made one change simply to correct an error, and I am pleased to hear that the hon. Gentleman is not attacking that. As to the rate of unemployment, does he agree that what we mean by that is a comparison between the number of those out of work and seeking work and the total numbers of the work force? Is he still on to the argument that the self-employed should not count as part of the work force? Does he not think that people working on their own account are in work?

Mr. Prescott: No, we cannot ignore the self-employed. However, this is the eighteenth change of the figures, and they are all designed to do one thing—reduce the figures of unemployed. The Paymaster General should stick with me and think it through. If he adds the self-employed to the total employed labour force and divides it by the same set of unemployed figures, he will get a different, reduced percentage.

Mr. Clarke: More accurate.

Mr. Prescott: I am all for having accurate statistics, and I am not in doubt about them. When I was asked on television whether I would change the system, I said that I would look at the evidence and make a judgment. I can understand that the self-employed should be included. However, my judgment is that the Government spend all their time looking for ways to reduce the unemployed figures by fiddling them down.

Let us get a comparison with full-time equivalents, because the Government's only claim is based on part-time jobs, which form two thirds of the increase in jobs. The Bank of England and the Library have done the calculations with full-time figures. Unfortunately, when I asked the Paymaster General for an answer on this, he said that the Department could not deal with the problem because there was too much detail. If he has the statistics from the Library, why does he not get his computers working?

If the Paymaster General takes full-time equivalents now compared with 1979, which is a matter of record, he will find that full-time equivalents have gone down to about 2·1 million. The Bank of England looked at this assessment and averaged what the increase in full-time equivalents has been, on that basis, from 1983 to 1985. The figure is about 24,000, as I think the Paymaster General is aware. That is about 12,000 a year on the balance of full-time equivalents. I asked the Library how long it would take us to reach the level of full-time equivalents of 1979 on the rate of increase that the Government have proudly put forward. The answer was 1,875 years.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman cannot make his attacks on fiddling the figures and then start using an ingenuity that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) would envy. Since 1983, the last election, over 700,000 people have gone into new employment. The hon. Gentleman is talking it all down, not least of all by leaving out all the self-employed again. There is a huge growth in self-employment, and the hon. Gentleman is betraying what I have already said is the prejudice of the Labour movement by leaving the self-employed out of the calculation.

Mr. Prescott: I shall not pursue too far the point about the self-employed.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is ducking the point.

Mr. Prescott: I am not ducking it, because I have not looked at it. The assessment made of the self-employed in the labour force surveys operates in a different way from when the Labour Administration were in power. If we asked that question, we should probably want to consider that possibility. I am not worried about that. However, if the Government want to compare their record on unemployment with that of the Labour Government, the records should at least be compared on the same basis so that we can get a fair judgment of where the Government's policies have been more successful. As I recall, the poster that the Government used in the 1979 election showed queues of people and said "Labour isn't working." Unemployment has gone up by 2·5 million since then, we have not heard a murmur from the Government, and the Budget is not doing anything to help.

The Government are also trying to manipulate the situation. They are trying to put a gloss on caring capitalism. Lord Young was appointed to his job to improve the image. We know how he does that. He gets out a calculator and fiddles the figures down, an then hires a PR agency for £1·5 million to tell us how daring the Government are and what they are doing to help the long-term unemployed. He is using the taxpayers' money for Tory propaganda about the Government's policy, which is what they do not want local authorities to do.

That is not acceptable, and the electorate are rumbling the Government. Why are we worried whether the figure is 3·2 million, 3·4 million, 4 million or 4·2 million? The reality is that the trend is inevitably up. The figure is expressed in millions of people unemployed.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is on safe ground in asserting that the present trend in unemployment is up. He is drawing comparisions by going back to 1979. All our critics do that, but they take in the worst period of the recession, which was from 1979 to 1981. We have now had four or five years of sustained growth in the economy and we are rapidly creating new jobs. To go back to 1979 is to exaggerate the analogy. The hon. Gentleman cannot assert, on the basis of what I admit are somewhat perplexing figures over the past few months, that we are on a rising trend of unemployment. He has no basis for asserting that.

Mr. Prescott: Does the Paymaster General spend any time looking at the figures? I can give him two from his Department. Unemployment in March 1984 was 3·1 million. Will he accept that proposition? They are figures from his Department, so I assure him that they come from a good source. In February 1986, the figure had gone up to 3·382 million. I am not a clever kid on figures, but that is an increase of nearly 250,000 people on the unemployment list.

Through the post I received a document from the Paymaster General's Department. It says at the top:

"Restricted to Ministers for Question Time."

It is about the latest unemployment figures, and the Minister's civil servants have advised:

"Unemployment is 3·2 million. If asked, that is the smallest increase since November 1985."

That is good propaganda, but it goes on to say:

"The total is the highest recorded since seasonally adjusted figures started in 1948."

I did not hear that from the Dispatch Box in the last Employment Question Time. The document is full of good stuff which I shall use on other occasions.

Unemployment is higher now than it was in the 1930s, but in the 1930s it continued to go up for only four years at a run. I hope that the Minister will not deny those figures. In the 1980s, under this Government, unemployment figures have gone up every year for six years. My charge is not that the Government have made a mess of it, but that it is a deliberate act of the Government to maintain unemployment as part of their policy. There has never been any doubt about that. I shall not again weary the House with the figures for OECD countries and what happened under previous Tory and Labour Administrations, but the evidence is clear. It may be that people have been shaken out, as the Prime Minister suggested, but undoubtedly Government policy had a greater effect than any world recession on the nature of unemployment in the British economy. To that extent, the Budget, by giving money in tax cuts, confirmed that the Government were not prepared to give it for jobs.

We are always hearing arguments about how many jobs can be bought for £1 billion of borrowing. It is generally agreed that fewer jobs are obtained by taking 1p off tax than by putting the money into public infrastructure. Indeed—I am sure that the Minister will agree—more people can be taken off the unemployment register by producing cheapie schemes, such as the youth training scheme, community programmes, and so on. In fact, one of the conditions of going on those programmes is that a person is registered as unemployed. It is to get people off the unemployment register that those schemes are provided. What the Government chose to do in the Budget was to go for tax cuts and a lot of cheapie schemes, because that, basically, is what they boil down to.

I must make clear again my attitude to community programmes, YTS, and other such schemes. There is definitely a role for them in order to bring about a full employment economy. We are not going to produce 4 million jobs on a 40-hour week basis. Those days are gone. We have got to find all sorts of ways in which we can give the opportunity to all in our society to make a useful contribution. Community programmes are clearly one such way, and they are here to stay, as is the YTS. My attacks on these programmes relate to the Government's using them simply to manipulate the unemployment figures and to avoid doing anything themselves about providing jobs.

The Minister says that he does not agree with the Tory reform package. I can only say that I wish that he had shown more consideration to the report of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). The Select Committee on Employment is made up of hon. Members from both sides of the House. That report was rubbished in a press release within an hour of its coming off the press. Any hon. Member who cares to refer to the evidence will see the following:

"We released it at 11 o'clock, we then had a Press conference at 12 o'clock and one of the journalists who came along at 12 o'clock had in his pocket what he called a Department of Employment Press release which pretty comprehensively savaged and denounced the whole report."

That is the sort of attention that the Paymaster General gives to the serious attempt of hon. Members on both sides of the House to do something about unemployment.

My main objection to the Government's policy—this enterprise culture, this desire to give incentives and to vamp up profits—is that I believe it to have failed. The Government seem to believe that if people are given incentives and companies are given more profits, what the Chancellor calls the engine of growth will get going—the engine of capitalism, reinvestment and the provision of jobs.

If we look at the proportion of net domestic product that went to profits between 1979 and 1984 we find that it increased from 9·1 per cent. to 14·9 per cent.—a 6 per cent. increase, which is equivalent to £14 billion. What did they do with that £14 billion? They did not put it into investment. We have heard throughout these debates that investment has been lower in manufacturing.

When I was doing research for this speech, one thing that really struck me was something that the Prime Minister said when she was Leader of the Opposition. Talking about manufacturing industry, she said:

"On the economic side, we have to break through the prosperity barrier in manufacturing industry." — [Official Report, 28 March 1979; Vol. 965, c. 468.]

The right hon. Lady not only broke through barriers, but she smashed down manufacturing industry, with investment, output and trade deficit all worse than in 1979.

When we look at what happened to the £14 billion, we see that it did not go into investment, training or research and development. As the previous Tory Prime Minister found out, despite all the incentives, money was not put into investment or jobs. It was put into property in New York, it was put into investment abroad, so that, as the Chancellor says, we can live in the future, when we have not got oil money, on all the money coming back from those investments. But it is at the cost of the collapse of our manufacturing industry and the loss of the jobs associated with it.

When I hear talk in this debate about training, I must say that industry has no room to criticise what the Government do about training. It was this Government who got rid of 16 of the 23 industrial training boards. It was this Government who got rid of the levies. The one thing that is claimed to be a success—YTS—is one of the industrial training boards that survived — the construction training board.

We are told from the Dispatch Box that we are short of all kinds of skills. Not only were the industrial training boards closed, but the Government closed the skillcentres, as the Minister said, because they deal with the traditional skills such as plastering, bricklaying, and other such jobs. That is what the Government have done about training.

When representatives of industry say that they are short of skilled workers, I ask them how much they take from their pockets to put towards training. They pay very little. It is scandalous how little they are doing about training. Most of industry is using the YTS to finance its apprenticeship programmes in the early stages; it does not even pay for its apprenticeship schemes.

I have an advertisement here which I find most insulting. It reads:

"Here comes Spikey Dodds. Watch out Japan."

There is no doubt about what Japan does for its youngsters in education, making resources available, planning five-year training programmes and ensuring the acquisition of qualifications. Anybody who thinks that Spikey Dodds, after a two-year YTS scheme, is going to threaten Japan, Germany or America must be living in cloud-cuckoo-land. We are kidding ourselves if we believe that that is training for our youngsters, and we cannot maintain an industrialised economy without the skills necessary for a developed economy.

Even under the training boards we did not do enough training, but to dismantle them was criminal. The Government used the defence that with the training boards manpower got more places. Yes — they put the instructors on bikes to cycle round the factories. We do not do enough by way of training, and it is at the cost of our contribution to the industrialisation of the economy of this country. We see the kind of public relations stuff coming out from Saatchi and Saatchi. They do all right on it, but it is another example of tea and sympathy. It does not address itself to the real problem.

I therefore want to know where all the money went. A lot of it undoubtedly went abroad. That is the reason why we talk about a national investment bank. But an awful lot went in increased dividends, which went up 68 per cent. between 1981 and 1984 in real terms. In 1984 top salaries went up by 16 per cent. and incentives by 184 per cent. All this can be seen in the top salaries review. Real profits went up by 45 per cent. between 1981 and 1982 and real pay by 2 per cent.

Many of those top salaries and increased dividends go to people who work in the Confederation of British Industry, and we hear Sir Terence Beckett talking about nowt for nowt, as if somehow we are all being treated the same in the distribution of resources either by the tax handout by the Government or by the distribution of dividends and shares. People realise that they are treated differently. The richer one is, the richer one gets; the poorer one is, the poorer one gets. Poverty abounds and continues to increase in this country.

That is what really annoys me about the Government's policy. Most of these policies and schemes are designed to produce low-paid part-time jobs. If anybody has any doubt about that, it is only necessary to go into a jobcentre. I go into jobcentres all the time. I find jobs advertised that are illegal, and I take the cards off the board. I find jobs offered at 30 per cent. of the takings, which is illegal according to wage councils rates.

There is one distinct difference in the jobcentres compared with the time when the Labour party was in office. There are fewer jobs but bigger cards. This is to make the jobs look more impressive. But the main jobs are community programme jobs. They are part-time, and, even with the increase in the rate which the Minister talked about, the rate in the community programme is not brought up to the real rate, which should be about £75 a week. It is still below the proper rate, and the people on these community programmes are going to be counselled to go into part-time low-paid jobs. The Government have an interest in that. It means that two people come off the dole queue instead of one. This is what the tea and sympathy and the counselling are all about. It is to get people into the community scheme jobs. That is what all these job subsidy schemes are for—to force down the wage rate and get people to work for less. The Government believe that this creates more jobs, but it only creates more part-time employment and leads to more self-employed.

I am not necessarily saying that those measures do not have a role to play, but more must be done. I can give the House a good example from my industry—shipping. I was a seaman for 10 years. I shall leave aside the question of paintings and bottles of wine. I am glad to hear that such abuses are to be stopped. Indeed, we said that that would happen. Capital finds a way of making its money. The Government say that they will extend the business expansion scheme to shipping. I am worried about shipping because we have lost about 700 ships since the Government came to power, and thousands of seamen have been thrown on the dole. The Government say that they will get shipping where it is cheapest, but with the Falkland islands campaign they went running around for ships.

I understand that the Government will encourage the BES for coastal shipping only. But the Secretary of State for Transport is dismantling cabotage—the only area in which Britain's shipping enjoys 60 per cent. of its United Kingdom cargoes. We have not yet done to our coastal trade what we have done to our deep sea fleets. The Government are stepping in with a charity scheme, while they are wholly dismantling all the jobs and the fleets in coastal shipping. But we are arguing against their proposals, relying as they do on the market system and on giving tea and sympathy. Many of the community programme schemes offer low pay, low skills, and few hours. Anyone can see through those schemes. It was hoped that 30 per cent. of the places would be full-time jobs, but the figure has dropped to 16 per cent. The Government's policy is to create part-time, low-paid, poverty jobs, and the MSC is their agent in doing that. That is why people resist MSC schemes and think that they are skivvy schemes.

It is not only the Labour party which talks about alternatives. I am sure that we shall hear much more about them. Indeed, we have heard about them before from the Conservative Benches, the Trades Union Congress, the Confederation of British Industry and the wets. They all say that public expenditue can be used to create more jobs, that local authority enterprise boards can be vamped and put in reverse to create more jobs.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook pointed out how 1 million jobs could come in two years. We have said how much that will cost, and the areas where they will come, but the Government criticise us for not having worked out how we shall find bricklayers and joiners. The Paymaster General made great play of housing. Obviously, we want to use the £6 billion in local authority capital receipts from the sale of council houses. We know that 500,000 building workers are on the dole and that there is a need for houses. Is that not a sensible way to get people back to work? The Paymaster General is responsible for doing something about the unemployed, but he tells us that the skills are not available. He tells us that, having dismantled the skill training centres and the industrial training boards.

I wish to put a simple proposition to the Paymaster General. I think that the debate has been helpful to him to get to know the facts. In 1978-79, 280,000 houses were built, but in 1985 only 190,000 were built. Where did we get the skills so many years ago to run such a big building programme? Where did they go? The skills must still be there. They may have gone into the black economy. I have no doubt that there is a good deal of that going on in that industry. [Interruption.] I am adding the two together. I know that the Government do not like to do that. They talk only about the private sector. I shall let the Paymaster General into a secret. There is a brickie who works on both private and public houses, and his skills are needed for both.

If we had the skills for that programme in 1979, why do we not have them now? Of course we have them. They may be used in the black economy for a few bob in the pocket. We are looking at that aspect carefully. I would not mind financing a programme with those people. However, I had better leave it at that. People in the black economy are avoiding their obligations to pay national insurance and taxes, as they should and as they do on community programmes.

The Paymaster General does not need to worry or to rely on smears about a £25 billion programme. I see that the Chief Secretary has left the Chamber. My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) challenged him last night. She said:

"The Chief Secretary claims that the Labour party proposes to spend £235 million on teachers," and £871 millon on building and equipment. The Chief Secretary admitted that that claim did not come from the Labour party, or even Labour party documents. The Chief Secretary replied:

"Could I say quite simply to the hon. Lady that I am happy indeed to get the record right . . . I want to establish . . . precisely what pledges the Opposition are putting forward. I shall be very happy to tick them off from the £24 billion."—[Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 374.]

The right hon. Gentleman accepted that they were not Labour party figures. It was a big slur by the Government, and propaganda about a programme which was not part of Labour's policy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman stopped that quote at a convenient point. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said that he would be happy to tick the pledges off, and that if the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who was in the Chamber,

"would like to write to me telling me what pledges I have got wrong, I will do the costing accurately."—[Official Report, 19 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 374.]

We have costed the Labour party programme at that figure, and we are waiting for the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, or someone, to write to us saying on which promises the Labour party will renege to get its present public spending commitments down to the figure that it is now talking about.

Mr. Prescott: Even if the logic is correct, why did the Government not write and ask in the first place? If the Government were concerned, all they had to do was ask.

The Minister's answer makes the position clear. He is new to the job of Employment spokesman. He was brought in with a new image. I accept that Lord Young has a completely different style. He not only fiddles the figures, but fiddles television and radio interviews to ensure that he does not appear to defend his policies. He is gutless and has no courage to defend his policies, so we must make do with the number two—the Paymaster General.

The Budget is an offence and a kick in the teeth to the unemployed. All it is offering is more tea and sympathy in various sorts of schemes designed to reduce wage levels, and to create more part-time work to fiddle the employment figures. There is an alternative and Labour is presenting it. The issue of getting people back to work will be proven with the return of a Labour Government.

Mr. Peter Rees (Dover): The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has made a long and vigorous speech. I hope that he will not think me discourteous if I do not follow every point that he made because many of them did not appear to relate closely to the Budget. They may be more appropriate in a more general debate on employment, or on a debate about merchant shipping, about which he knows I am concerned.

I rather warmed to the hon. Gentleman when he opened his speech by saying with becoming candour that he would produce clear, precise and carefully-costed proposals for reducing unemployment and dealing with that problem. Despite the 55 minutes that elapsed, I still remain—this may be a reflection on my capacity for absorbing his oratory — entirely unclear about the Labour party's precise proposals.

I heard and read with care the words of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), and saw his proposals. I did not notice whether they were endorsed by the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he was wise not to. Or does the hon. Gentleman endorse them?

Mr. Prescott: Yes.

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman does endorse them. The proposals amount to £1 billion on infrastructure for capital programmes, and an increase in public-sector employment, costing a further £1 billion. I commend the right hon. Gentleman for his modesty and self-restraint. He then went on, perhaps a little less modestly and with a little less self-restraint, to endorse completely, perhaps not entirely understanding the figures, the recommendations of the all-party Select Committee. That would take him up into the £8 billion region.

I sense a certain unease on the Opposition Benches about the levels of public expenditure to which they may or may not have committed themselves. I noted the uncharacteristically sharp words of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), who is beating a retreat at this moment, and who promises my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary hard times in Committee.

We in the House and people outside are entitled to have carefully costed proposals from the Labour party. It may be that the Labour party is resiling rapidly from the figure of £24 billion, but I will not go into the details of that. [Interruption.] I have a warm regard for the contributions from the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) with whom I had delightful and often constructive debates last year in Standing Committee. Perhaps in due course he will throw a little bit of light on these matters. I know that the temptation in opposition is always to commit oneself to a little bit more than one can fulfil, but the country and the House are entitled to know in more detail what the proposals are, what they will cost, and how they will be funded.

I should like now to turn to what should be the subject matter of the debate, the Budget proposals. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East made a vigorous and voluminous speech, but my confidence in his grasp of the Budget proposals was a little shaken when I heard him say that the stamp duty reductions would be more than the figure devoted to employment measures. Let us look at both. The stamp duty reductions in the year 1986-87 are self cancelling. Page four of the Red Book says that there will be a reduction in the rate which will cost £70 million and there will be an extension of the base which will yield £70 million.

The changes in capital transfer tax, or, as we must now call it, the inheritance tax, will involve a remission of tax of £35 million. If the hon. Gentleman had cast his eye a little bit further down he would have seen that the total gross expenditure on employment measures will cost £195 million. The hon. Gentleman has possibly not done his homework in this field with quite the assiduity that he showed in other areas. If there is tea and sympathy on the Government side of the House, there is a great deal of tea and great deal of sloganising on the Opposition side, but not many practical measures.

I should now like to look at some of the measures which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor so wisely commended to the House. I congratulate the Chancellor because he constructed some rather attractive bricks with only a little straw. I am sure the House understands the constraints under which he was operating. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that, notwithstanding the constraints, there was an opportunity for a great economic breakout. Alas, his suggestions gave me the impression that he had not the remotest idea of how to achieve an economic breakout.

I hope there is common ground on the fact that the lowering of oil prices, if maintained, should feed through over the years to assist in creating a yet more buoyant and vigorous industry and should yield increasing amounts of corporation tax to the Exchequer. It was an irony, and perhaps a difficulty, for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that concurrently with the Budget speech there was an important OPEC meeting, the conclusion of which is perhaps a little bit difficult to divine at the present time. The lowering of oil prices should assist in reducing further the rate of inflation. My right hon. Friend was right to defer the major reforms upon which all my hon. and right hon. Friends have set their hearts.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend explain why the lowering of oil prices will necessarily reduce the rate of inflation? It will reduce some costs, but if inflation comes from an increase in the money supply, will the reduction not be balanced by increases in other costs?

Mr. Rees: I do not take such a theoretical view as my hon. Friend. Fuel and energy costs bulk large not only in domestic but also in industrial budgets, and I hope that they will be reflected in the figures I have cited. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook talked about the "essential triviality" of my right hon. Friend's Budget. Has he really grasped the philosophic thrust that has characterised not only this Budget but other Conservative Budgets? It is right for my right hon. Friend and his predecessor to take credit for perhaps the longest period of sustained growth over the past 10 or even 20 years, and that has been coupled with a steady downward trend in inflation. That emphasises the underlying soundness of the economy and of Government financial policy.

It cannot be the enfeebled economy that the Opposition would have us believe it is. We have time to survive the miners' strike and the uncertainties of the oil market. Casting my mind forward to the future, I hope that against this background my right hon. Friend will share his thinking with the House about when it would be appropriate for us to join the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. This may not be the appropriate moment or the appropriate debate in which to ask about that.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): It is as good a time as any.

Mr. Rees: I think that my hon. Friend has reached the same conclusion as I have. This is a decision that we cannot shirk for ever. I will be persuaded by the able advocacy of my right hon. Friend when he winds up on Monday or by the advocacy of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary when he winds up tonight. I leave them diffidently with the thought that perhaps the time will come—if not this week or this month then perhaps this summer—for some movement on this delicate front. I am sure that the advantages of such a movement are clear to the House.

I should like to revert to more immediate concerns. It was made clear by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that the essential theme of the Budget and the long-term theme of the Conservative party is the encouragement of a property owning democracy. We have moved a little further away from the cry of three acres and a cow. It is now a house, a transportable pension scheme and, it is hoped, a modest stake in the equity market. That is the background of this Budget. We could have a significant debate on the philosophic divide between hon. Members on the Government side and hon. Members in the Opposition. I hope that hon. Gentlemen who feel able to contribute to such a debate will explain to us their real objections to the Budget and will not repeat the prejudices which I am sure the hon. Member for Sedgefield does not share. Perhaps he could explain the objections of thinking members of his party.

I used to think that the Labour party would like us all to be tenants of local authorities and employees of the state and, ultimately, pensioners of the state. I am sure I have misconstrued its thinking, but we are left a little bit in the dark. We are reminded constantly by the Opposition that we are possibly within a year or a year and a half, and certainly not more than two years, of a general election. The Labour party owes us its thinking on that and on other subjects. I hope I shall be forgiven for dealing in generalities, but our policies will create not only social and industrial stability, but will generate and sustain the increased economic activity which alone can create sound and long lasting jobs.

If one looks at the speech by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, one sees that it is once again a question of padding the public sector payroll. The thinking of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, who has abandoned the House—I have no doubt for good reasons—was to treat the local authorities as the engines for creating employment. The clear inference was that the payroll of the local authorities should be padded. Is that a constructive suggestion in the second half of the 20th century?

I now come to the measures which I find especially attractive and skilful in the Budget. Bearing in mind the limited resources that my right hon. Friend had to deploy, I commend the business expansion scheme and its permanent extension. I had something to do with its early initiation and I recognise that it needed to be refined and improved. I am sure that my hon. and right hon. Friends will be open minded in considering whether it needs to be expanded as well as redefined. The principle has now been accepted and the scheme is recognised as a useful and appropriate way of mobilising capital for developing businesses. That is a healthy development.

I well understand the pressure on my Treasury colleagues, and why the profit sharing proposals could not be deployed now. However, I await them, as they are developed, in keen anticipation. Over the years we have had share incentive schemes. I know that the alliance is particularly attracted to such schemes, and I hope that it will find common ground with the Government in approving of profit sharing proposals. No doubt the Labour party, with its hard-line approach to such matters, will attempt to rubbish them, but all moderate and thinking people will recognise the advantages to be derived from some new thinking in this area.

I turn to the personal equity plan. I have always nourished some interest in the Loi Monory. Of course, it will not be reproduced exactly in a British context; indeed, we know that circumstances in France were slightly different. Nevertheless, I welcome the Loi Lawson. I certainly do not underestimate the contribution that it can make.

I have no reservation about the part played by pension funds and insurance companies in our social and economic life. But it is important to encourage people to hold a direct personal stake in the shares of British companies. Buying shares, for example, in companies that are household names will lead people to understand their position, and the real economic prospects. Such an understanding has been lacking until now.

I shall now consider the provisions relating to capital transfer tax. I remember the sharp debates that we had over the winter Finance Bill introduced by the last Labour Administration. I always thought that it was an ill-judged price to pay for the support of the extreme Left wing of the Labour party for other measures that had to be carried through. But that is an abiding feature of Labour Governments. They have to pay a price to their Left wing. In those days, the Treasury Bench, if pressed, would probably have said that it was of limited concern to it whether or not there was an extension of capital transfer tax, but that such and such had to be done to satisfy the —to coin a phrase from the then Chancellor of the Exchequer—"tiny Chinese minds" of the Left wing of the Labour party.

We rightly committed ourselves to drawing the teeth of capital transfer tax, and I believe that we have fully honoured that commitment. The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) made a characteristically elegant contribution yesterday. I was rather charmed by his military metaphors, as I had not heard them from his lips before. However, in his absence, I should like to commend him on that new turn in his eloquence. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that we should try to establish a stable regime. I believe that stability can be achieved using the measures that the Government have in mind. There are always points of significant detail to consider, and we may have to consider rates from time to time, but we now have a structure which will not always be attractive to those families who will have to meet this impost but which could provide us with some common ground. I hope that the alliance will confirm my feelings on that point.

We were right to give priority to tax thresholds during the past few years. Moreover, I warm to the statement of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that there is room to advance on both fronts. It must be recognised that the starting point for income tax, coupled with national insurance payments, is now as high as, if not higher than, that in any other country in western Europe. Indeed, as my right hon. Friend so appropriately and gracefully emphasised yesterday, we should consider the middle band of taxpayers and reflect on how far their position has been advanced over the years. We should contemplate whether a little more could be done for them.

At the risk of striking a rather heterodox pose and perhaps disavowing some of the things that I have said in the past, I should point out that the time may come, particularly when the Inland Revenue has computerised its activities, to consider returning to a variety of intermediate rate bands. I fully realise the breathtaking nature of that proposal. I have argued vigorously against a single intermediate rate band because it concentrates the advantages too narrowly. However, I am no longer in a position to master the technicalities of my proposal, and am not even in a position to cost it. I recognise that it might be rather expensive, but I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will give it some thought.

It is appropriate to point out that so far no Opposition Front-Bench spokesman has made any reference to the staggering and imaginative reliefs that have been devised for charities not only in this Budget but in previous ones. I have read all the speeches of Opposition spokesmen, although I hope that I have not read them too fast. Indeed, we have not even had tea and sympathy for charities from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. That tells us a little about the Opposition's approach to hardship and poverty. It is an institutionalised Socialist approach. I see that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East is stirring uneasily and I hope that he will give the lie to that.

Mr. Prescott: It is all in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock).

Mr. Rees: I am delighted to hear that, and I am willing to withdraw my remarks. I candidly admit that I did not take the speech of the Leader of the Opposition seriously enough, and I shall make an exception in the case of the right hon. Gentleman. However, I shall give way if the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East wishes to intervene in response to my remarks.

We have had an imaginative Budget. We shall, of course, look for more substantial moves next year, but this Budget can be taken as an earnest of things to come. More importantly, it demonstrates the continuing vitality and original thinking of both the Treasury and the Government. One is bound to contrast that with the thinking of the Labour party, with its muddle over its public expenditure plans, which is perhaps symptomatic of the difficulties that it finds itself in. The rather harsh exchanges that were heard between my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and Opposition Members show that the Opposition are a little uneasy about the paucity of careful thought on their Benches. But we would like to know what their public expenditure plans are, and what programmes they would boost and what programmes they would trim.

Mr. Prescott: They are coming.

Mr. Rees: Well, we have been waiting a very long time. The Labour party has been in opposition since 1979, and there may be another general election sooner rather than later. The Labour party owes it to the country to spell out in detail — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East may have spoken about it, but then his speech was bereft of any thinking on this subject.

At present the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has said only that all the higher rate reliefs would be clawed back and that there would be an investment income surcharge. He put the simple proposition that the higher earners had been uniquely benefited. I remind him and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East that they were uniquely disadvantaged during the years of Labour rule. It cannot be a maxim that this country's unity must be bought by income tax rates of 98 and 83 per cent.

We have been told that this is a divisive Budget. I have heard nothing from the Opposition Benches to suggest that their fiscal plans will achieve harmony, let alone any economic vitality. The Opposition's fiscal plan is a step back to the 1970s and the sterile slogans of class warfare which are utterly irrelevant to the latter part of the 20th century and which have been decisively rejected at the last two general elections.

The electorate will recognise where there has been constructive and imaginative thinking. It will recognise this Budget as evidence of that thinking, and I shall support my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget proposals with real pleasure in the Division Lobby on Monday.

6.1 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I am pleased to follow the right hon. and learned Member for Dover (Mr. Rees) because I would like to begin my speech by covering those points of the Budget where I am happy to agree with the Government's actions and to say that, in some respects, we shall be pleased to support the Government on those proposals in the Finance Bill and in later stages.

Not all the points relate to the Finance Bill but I will mention some points that are important. First, there has been a substantial change in the Government's attitude towards the international and national finance markets. The reason why the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) got it wrong about interest rates the other week when he forecast that they would rise——

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): The alliance got it wrong too.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: No, we did not make that forecast. In fact, we made the opposite forecast because some alliance hon. Members were aware of what was happening in the City at that time. What happened then was something which should have happened previously and which I am pleased that the Government have done. They have intervened through the Bank of England in the financial markets in order to steer interest rates in a way that they were not prepared to do previously.

In his Budget speech, the Chancellor paid some compliments to the efforts made by the United States Administration — by the Secretary of State and the chairman of the Federal Reserve bank — through their intervention in world markets and by way of the Plaza agreement. That agreement has benefited this country and the whole international financial system. I welcome the change of view that intervention by Governments in these markets is beneficial and I hope that the Government will continue to pursue that policy.

I am pleased also to welcome the Government's announced intention to examine the possibility of giving tax relief for profit sharing and I join the right hon. and learned Member for Dover on that point. The House will not be surprised to hear that the alliance has some pride of authorship in supporting that suggestion. The suggestion is only tentative at this stage but, like the right hon. and learned Gentleman, we shall follow with great interest what the Government are doing and if they can come up with a scheme that will help to encourage profit-sharing to become a much greater part of the remuneration of staff at all levels in enterprises, we shall in principle give that scheme our support.

Similarly, we support in principle the Government's proposals for tax relief and other benefits for people buying shares for the personal equity plan. However, having looked at some of the details, I am not as impressed with the scheme as I was by its original principle. I fear that the benefits that are offered and the scale of the scheme are very limited and I do not think that it will be Loi Lawson. The scheme has a lot further to go before it achieves what France and other countries have done to encourage people to buy a substantial number of shares. It has our support in principle, but in practice we will have to study the details in the Finance Bill before we decide our attitude on the matter.

I am pleased to support the Government's proposals on charities, which are comprehensive, both for the expenditure made by charities and the contributions made to them. The proposals will be widely welcomed inside and outside the House.

I also welcome the publication of the Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation. The proposals to separate the taxation of man and wife are welcome. I have made similar proposals in previous Finance Bills and this idea has had increasing support across the political spectrum. However, I do not think that the alliance will be able to support the proposals for the transferability of allowances contained in the Green Paper. Obviously a great deal more study must take place before we can strike our attitudes on the detailed proposals. However, it is good to have the proposals in their present form, as they allow public debate to take place before the computerisation of the revenue takes place in 1990 and we can all come up with proposals for consideration.

I would like to make the following appeal to the Government. I hope that they will consider in a way that they were regrettably not prepared to consider in relation to pensions the possibilities of seeking some agreement between the parties on the direction and shape of the proposed taxation system. There are some areas on that issue where we might be able to get agreement across the Floor of the House. It may benefit the Revenue, the Government and, most importantly, the country if we can have some stability in the organisation of the tax system rather than having constant changes with changes of Government. I would suggest that the Government have consultations across the parties to see whether a measure of agreement can be reached on the proposals.

Those are the areas of the Budget for which I commend the Government. However, my commendations must end on the shape of the Budget strategy. The Chancellor's sums depend on a very rosy view of international and national activity in the economy over the forthcoming year. His projection of a 5·5 per cent. growth in world trade compared with 3 per cent. this year generated by falling oil prices may be correct. Whether British exporters can share in that expansion depends crucially upon the effects of unit labour costs and whether those costs will undermine the possibility of firms taking up some of the demand from overseas that will undoubtedly come as a result of the fall in the price of oil.

The Chancellor's PSBR and other targets crucially depend on how much progress we can make in the direction of unit labour costs. The Chancellor has not paid sufficient attention to the impact in the longer term that the fall in the price of oil and the rise in unit labour costs will have on our balance of payments. Our current account will very soon come under increasing pressure as the revenues from the sale of oil overseas decline and as our unit labour costs make industry less competitive. In future, that will be a major constraint on the economy for any Government to face. I would like the Minister to pay attention to the forecasts and respond to that clear threat for the future.

The principal criticism that I and my colleagues make of this Budget is that its priorities are wrong. The expenditure upon which the Chancellor has embarked as a result of his fiscal adjustment—the cut in taxes—is the wrong thing to do at present. The Budget has done nothing to use the Chancellor's fiscal freedom to encourage and increase jobs in the most cost-effective way and it has done very little to help the competitiveness of British industry.

There has been a great debate, which we have witnessed again today, about the costing of the Labour party's proposals. I would like to say a few words about public expenditure as I think that the Government's actions have been valuable in exposing the hollow nature of the Labour party's proposals and in drawing attention to the grave problems of public expenditure which this Government and any Opposition party with any sense would recognise are constantly being faced today, in this country and elsewhere.

Not many people acknowledge that public expenditure has increased under the Government. The financial deficit shows an increase to £12·2 billion. There have been substantial increases in public expenditure in some programmes. They are not the programmes that I and my colleagues would like to see expanded. The defence budget has been massively increased, as indeed has the employment benefit and social security benefit programmes. They have been one of the major reasons why public expenditure has increased.

But any Government today will have major problems in containing the growth of public expenditure. The Government's analysis of Labour's promises has drawn attention to the way in which parties in opposition can too easily make great promises to all sorts of pressure groups and end up in the position of the Labour party. We recognised that a long time ago and I hope that the Economic Secretary will accept that. We did not just pull figures out of the sky in the way that the Labour party has. We sought, as well as we could, to test our budget proposals not only on one economic model but on two. There are grave problems for any Opposition party doing that without the resources of all the Government Departments behind it. We published all the figures and consequences of that and decided upon the public sector borrowing requirement that we were prepared to accept could be borne.

I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that we were making a serious attempt to put forward a credible policy. Certainly that has been widely acknowledged in parts of the press that are not sympathetic to our cause and in other areas of the public press. We have clearly stated the consequences of our programmes for inflation, the PSBR, the exchange rate and interest rates in forthcoming years.

We have heard a lot of figures from the Labour Front Bench about what the Labour party will spend on this and that. But we have heard little about what the interest rate, the exchange rate or the PSBR will be in two years' time under Labour's programme. In fact, we have heard nothing at all.

The right hon. and learned Member for Dover and the Minister cannot have heard the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook on the radio this morning. I almost had a crash listening to him in my car on the "Jimmy Young" programme. The £3·5 billion that he has gladly given out to the pensioners, the long-term unemployed and all the others who have been promised great increases in benefit he took away this morning. We were told that that money would come from the top 5 per cent.—those who earn £25,000 and more. But this morning the right hon. Gentleman said when pressed that he had always felt that people who earned about £25,000 had been taxed much too heavily and that he had nothing against people earning £25,000 and above. He then went on to say that there would be no increase in income tax for those people. Where he thinks he will get £3·5 billion from to increase pensions and all the other benefits if he does not increase income tax on people earning above £25,000, I do not know. He will certainly not get that money from increases in capital taxes on those people and the others that he is proposing. The bulk of that £3·5 billion could come only from restoring the levels of taxation—which he then went on to condemn—that had been levied in the past upon such highly paid people.

That is typical of what we have heard month in and month out from Labour spokesmen. They have taken figures out of the air which, when added up, are meaningless. It is nothing more than a public relations exercise. It is irresponsible opposition. The Opposition are not prepared to test their figures on the London Business School computer, on the Treasury computer, on the National Institute economic model or anywhere else. We are told that we shall have the figures in a year's time but I bet that that deadline will slip because the Opposition are caught between the Left in their party, who want them to spend the money, and the figures—the consequences of the programme that they are putting forward. They cannot reconcile those two forces. That is why we shall never have any serious proposals from them.

I acknowledge that containing public expenditure is a major problem for any Administration. The Government have demonstrated the truth of that by the difficulties that they have had in reining back public expenditure, about which they have been enthusiastic. My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) pointed to that fact yesterday. Unless we are able to increase the competitiveness of British industry and to increase Britain's wealth we shall not be able to increase public expenditure in the way that all the pressure groups and I and my colleagues in the alliance want to do in the future. As the revenues from oil decline and as the contribution to the balance of payments from oil declines, it is crucial that manufacturing industry should be efficient and beat the competition from West Germany, Japan, America and other countries.

The only way in which we can improve the efficiency of manufacturing industry is by having a long-term plan. We put proposals in our budget statement for that for improved education and training and for cutting the employers' national insurance contribution. I shall not go through all the proposals that we made, but they hang together to get people back to work and to increase the competitiveness of British industry in order to increase the size of the cake from which to pay for social services, the Health Service and all the other things. That is vital and that is why our major criticism of the Budget is that the £1 billion or thereabouts that the Chancellor had available has been given away in a cut in income tax of 1p. That will do virtually nothing to get people back to work. A reasonable estimate is that it will create about 30,000 jobs over two years. It will do virtually nothing to help the competitiveness of British industry. If that money had been spent on research and development, which the Chancellor mentioned, industry would not have been on its own. All he was able to say was that the private sector will be allowed to increase its profits. Yes, it must have profits, and substantial profits, to reinvest, but cannot the Chancellor seek to direct that investment and to help industry by using the substantial amount of money that he has given to those who are in work to help industry and so to get some people off the dole queue, using that capacity to create the wealth that we need for the social services and the other things that we all want to see?

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I am listening carefully to what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Surely the way in which we shall be able to compete successfully in world markets is by producing higher quality goods. I hope that he will give us some idea of how he will put forward policies which will enable us to produce goods of a quality and kind which will compete successfully in world markets.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: We shall have to spend a great deal more on research and development in industry. We shall have to spend a great deal more on obtaining a highly skilled, highly educated work force that is innovative and can produce the best in design and one that has all the talents to create that wealth. We must not do what the Government have done much too much of—trying to have a low-paid, low-skill economy. That may be all right for developing countries, where there is cheap labour that can be used to undercut in many mass production industries. But, indeed, even in that sphere there is no future.

Although I am pointing out the importance of manufacturing industry, we shall not go back, as some Labour Members seem to think, to the position where tens of thousands of people are employed in factory after factory with smoke rising from the chimneys in the regions and other parts of Britain. We shall have a decreasing number of people working in manufacturing industry.

Manufacturing industry must remain productive and be the most effective means of creating wealth in the economy, upon which the service industries can be based. The City of London and many of our service industries, among the best in the world, would not exist were it not for the great manufacturing and trading power of our country in the past.

The manufacturing base was eroded dramatically during the period 1979 to 1981. The Government made many wrong decisions. We had a high exchange rate, high interest rates and manufacturing industry and other sectors were undermined by economic circumstances. It was not that they were inefficient but rather that they were undermined by such circumstances. At the same time there was the Clegg report and VAT was increased from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): The hon. Gentleman has accused the Government of making wrong decisions. Is he saying that the cut in the basic rate of income tax by 1p to 29p is a wrong decision? Is he opposed to that?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I am absolutely opposed to it. It is the wrong priority at this time. In the future I would love to see a 25p rate of income tax. A rate of income tax of 25p on a much bigger base in a wealthier country would raise more revenue than the rate of 30p or the proposed 29p. A rate of 25p is a marvellous aim. We will not achieve that unless we invest in the things we advocated in our budget proposals and our autumn statement.

There is consensus — it unfortunately does not encompass the Treasury Benches—among many right hon. and hon. Members on Conservative and Labour Benches. This consensus is shared by the British Institute of Management, the CBI, management in industry and the trade unions. It is most regrettable that the Government will not recognise this consensus and act upon it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has said before—so it will come as no surprise to hon. Members to hear it again—that many of the policies that the Government have implemented with regard to industrial relations over the past few years have been enormously beneficial. The increased productivity that has been achieved in the steel, mining and other industries is largely a result of the firm steps that the management and the Government have taken. It is right to acknowledge and welcome those achievements. However, much more needs to be done.

Where should that money go and what should we do with that money? The Paymaster General criticises us for wanting to spend some of the money on the community programme. I am sorry that he made that criticism. The community programme has made a great contribution to helping people who are suffering unemployment, as it has provided work for a substantial number of people. It is an immediate and cost-effective way of getting people back to work. That is why we suggested that the ceiling should be doubled and that more money should be directed to the programme. The programme is effective, both in terms of time and in terms of cost, in providing worthwhile jobs. We have also suggested a 10 per cent. cut in each of the bands of employers' national insurance contributions. That would help to make industry more confident—it would be able to increase its sales in overseas markets, increase profits and therefore invest more. The national insurance contribution is a tax on jobs. A cut of 10 per cent. in national insurance contributions—not the 1 per cent that we previously advocated and that is now advocated by the Labour party—would encourage firms to take on more labour. There is considerable evidence to substantiate that a percentage cut on each band would be a most effective way of achieving it. It would encourage firms to take on more highly skilled labour as well as benefiting people in the lower rate bands.

We would like to see more help given to the long-term unemployed. There is a high level of unemployment and something should be done immediately. The long-term unemployed should be on a long-term rate of supplementary benefit and family support and child benefit should be increased. Help should also be given to pensioners who are being hit hard by the current economic circumstances. We would also want to see a programme for skills.

As part of the mix of expenditure which we would like to see the Government embark upon, £2 billion should be spent on what is loosely called the infrastructure. The Paymaster General did a great disservice to the House by giving the impression that we are simply proposing highly capital-intensive investment. All we have said in our budget proposals is that it should include:

"tackling the major backlog of housing repairs and maintenance, and building and renovating houses to meet the substantial requirement for accommodation, renewing out-dated NHS hospitals; rebuilding dilapidated sewers and undertaking essential road construction schemes and repairs."

There is a tremendous amount of work in the public sector that needs to be done. Such work would not damage our current account because it is not import-intensive. It uses indigenous materials. Such work is labour-intensive. We have concentrated on house repairs, insulation and renovation. This work and the new start programmes are the most labour-intensive. We believe that mix of proposals would be the best way to help in the long term those who have been hardest hit in the shortterm.

I join with the right hon. and learned Member for Dover in regretting that the Chancellor had nothing to say about joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system. We have advocated this, not in a blind desire to go headlong into Europe, as some of our opponents have tried to suggest, but in the belief that this system would sustain confidence. It would provide discipline, would give greater stability, and would take out some of the peaks and troughs both in the interest rates and the exchange rates. It would be beneficial to British industry and to the community as a whole.

If we were to join the exchange rate mechanism it would allow the European monetary system to develop into a much more effective force within the international financial system. Britain's half-in, half-out position is preventing the development of the system. For these reasons I hope that, one weekend, the Chancellor—or perhaps the Prime Minister is the right person—will decide to join the exchange rate mechanism and on the following Monday an announcement to that effect will be made. Bearing in mind our present exchange rate with the basket of currencies, the position of the deutschmark and dollar, this is the most appropriate time for negotiations to take place. I hope that the Government will do something about it.

I come now to unit labour costs. In the last quarter of 1985 unit wage costs in the United Kingdom increased by 5 per cent. In Japan and West Germany there was a nil increase and in the United States they increased by 2 per cent. In recent years, unit labour costs in Britain have continued to increase consistently compared with the costs of our major competitors. That must stop. Unless it does, we shall not be able to compete with our major competitors, especially in West Germany, Japan and the United States, and the comparative decline in Britain will continue.

We must make tough decisions and face up to difficult circumstances if we are to stop that decline. The Government must be prepared to intervene, not only in the level of interest rates, as they are now rightly doing, but by having a pay strategy. Exhortations from the Dispatch Box and criticisms at CBI dinners of what is happening are not enough.

I hope that one of the proposals we advocated in our statement on the Budget and which the Government appear to have taken up will be developed—the proposal to give tax relief on profit sharing. We have advocated tax relief because there has been justifiable criticism of the old-style pay policies, which have sought to penalise firms and people for increasing pay levels above the norm. We have advocated that firms should enter into longer-term pay contracts, initially for two years and perhaps later for three years, instead of an annual pay round, and that firms should encompass within those contracts a much greater share of the profits. We have proposed giving financial benefits to firms that conclude such agreements.

I hope that the Government will be persuaded to move in that direction. We believe that that measure should be tried and that it could provide the key to moderating the type of pay settlements made recently which have been undermining our competitiveness, increasing our unit labour costs and thereby ensuring that unemployment is not reduced.

We are opposed to this Budget strategy because it concentrates on giving to those who already have—to those who have jobs, and to those who have incomes—rather than on investing in the long-term future of industry and on getting people back to work to create the wealth needed for all the social services and for the public expenditure that we and many others would like.

6.32 pm

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I was pleased to note the number of aspects of the Budget welcomed by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). One might have expected him to welcome the profit-sharing measures. He welcomed also the personal equity scheme and the Budget's approach to unit costs. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor stressed some of the points that were made by the hon. Gentleman, although not in the same way. The Government realise as strongly as the hon. Gentleman that the level of unit costs is one of the major factors that will make or break the long-term strategy for economic advance. Unless unit costs are held down, there will be considerable problems. Although I do not believe that the Government can do this on their own, I believe that a strong Government lead is essential.

I agree with the hon. Member for Stockton, South in only one aspect of his criticism of the Government. The Government will not be surprised to find that, as chairman of the Science and Technology Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly, I am sorry that more has not been done for research and development. Research and development provides one of the ways in which long-term jobs can be created for the future. I do not believe that total expenditure on research and development—whether by industry or by Government through their aid programmes and grants—is sufficient. I should have been much happier if M3—I think it is now known as "broad money"—had been increased by another £500 million to stimulate research and development in industry generally.

I think that it would be surly of me in a debate that should be mainly concerned with unemployment if, as the first Member from the west country to speak, I did not refer to some of the benefits that the Budget has provided for the west country. For many years, I have campaigned for those concerned that charities should receive a greater benefit from tax relief. I strongly welcome, as do many people in the west country who play a major role in charities, the fact that the Government have at last seen the wisdom of the arguments we have put to them.

I welcome also the higher VAT registration limit because of the impact it will have on small businesses in the west country. The threshold has been increased by more than might have been expected. That is obviously a good thing, although I should have liked a greater increase.

I welcome the proper indexation of income tax thresholds for the elderly and pensioners. That change was essential for my constituency and for many people living in the west country.

The abolition of the gift tax structure is of particular concern to small and medium-sized businesses which are owned by people fighting to be able to hand on their businesses to their children. I believe that that measure is more important than the media have said, especially for agriculture.

I welcome the personal equity plan. We in the west country want to see the property-owning democracy turned into an industry-owning democracy. I should be happier if at least part of that investment were allowed pre-tax rather than post-tax, because that would obviously provide greater stimulation.

Because of the type of industry and enterprise we have in the west counry, the small loans guarantee scheme is important. The area depends very much on farming and the capital allowance for agriculture buildings is, therefore, very important.

Those are many of the aspects in the Budget that will be of particular benefit to the west counry.

I have crossed swords more than once with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his former capacity as Secretary of State for Energy. I argued that Britain and the United States should have taken the lead in breaking the oligopolistic structure of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries to bring down oil prices throughout the world. Reduced oil prices are important in stimulating assistance to the economies of underdeveloped nations—for example, Ghana has to pay as much as 47 per cent. of its total foreign currency earnings just to buy the hydrocarbons needed to sustain transport and industry in that country. That will help world trade. Therefore, the decrease in those prices will have a much greater effect in world economic terms than the Chancellor has been willing to estimate. We are fortunate that this will assist in bringing down unit prices. This then has at last come about even if the Government have not been a leader.

I believe that the major aspect of economic policy surrounding the Government's approach is unemployment and the provision of more jobs for the unemployed. That is not just for the economic benefit of the nation. I go back in my political career to Bruce Griffiths and me tossing a coin way back in 1950 as to who should become the first chairman and the first secretary of the Bow group. I lost and, as the secretary, had to write the constitution. However, at no time in my political career or as part of my political philosophy could I ever stand by idly and believe that it can be accepted that 10, 12 or 15 per cent. of our people should be standing by idly, unused, unfulfilled and making no contribution to the economic strength of the nation. Equally, Conservative philosophy involves understanding not just the economic but the emotional effect that unemployment has on an individual.

I do not know how many of us in the House have experienced or known, as I have, the frustration and build-up of desperation which comes from pounding the pavements going to every potential employer in search of work. I do not know who has experienced the frustration in writing letter after letter to advertisers of jobs—and frequently to many who have not been advertising—and more often than not receiving no reply. The degradation that one experiences and the desperate anger that comes when one knows that one can contribute but no one can or will use your ability can turn to a deep bitterness against society and a loss of self-respect. That is a frustration which few who have not suffered it can really understand.

It is no good saying that that should not take place, that it is wrong to have those feelings or that it is nobody's fault. That does not overcome the anger or the bitterness. It is true that the Conservative Government have done more, spent more, and introduced more schemes than any other Government in the history of this country to overcome unemployment and they have done so in an extensive way. It is right that that should be so because our people deserve it and it is right that their demands should be met. I believe that people who are out of work have a right to demand to contribute to economic growth and that they be given the opportunity to make that contribution and be able to stand on their own feet and not have to rely on the social security benefits which the nation may provide.

[Sir Peter Emery]

Therefore, I want to take the time of the House to put forward what I believe might be an entirely new thought in trying to provide a new employment-linked investment scheme. If we accept that the reduction of employment is the Government's major policy objective, the Government must be searching for every way to ensure the creation of new jobs. Therefore, if any scheme could be put to them which would prove positively that new jobs could be created and that in so doing it would not even increase the PSBR or demand a further increase in supply expenditure, such a concept should be seriously considered. That is what I wish to outline to the House.

It is my experience that new investment decisions, when considered by boards of companies in manufacturing industry or elsewhere, which effect expansion rest on a whole variety of matters. However, after the acceptance by a board of proof that there is a market demand or a need for the product or expansion, certain factors come into play. Those factors are the political climate, the availability of labour, investment cost, return on investment, alterations to the liquidity position of the company and the whole structure of how that can be funded. Therefore, the basis of most of those decisions is the financial cost.

If the Government were able to provide some cash bonus to make that investment much more realistic, I believe that it would prove to be a major stimulus, to bring forward schemes which, at the moment, are planned but are held up for the right time or the right amount of money.

In order to encourage companies to invest in new manufacturing industry, I suggest that the Government should ask every company to register at the Department of Trade and Industry the new scheme and the number of jobs that would be created. The Government should provide that any company which registers with the Department of Trade and Industry — it would not have to — would receive an investment bonus, tax free, of £4,500—that figure could be higher or lower; the Government can alter it, because the scheme is flexible—for each job created after the new employee had been employed for 12 months. The company would have to show that the new employee had been taken off the unemployment register and had not previously been employed by the same company during the last three or six months, so that there would be no internal way to get round the scheme. The outcome of that would be to provide a cash bonus for all new investment which created new jobs. Cash is the type of bonus which stimulates medium and small businesses to introduce investment projects, and for the larger firms it would provide an interesting and new immediate cash return for their investment.

The major benefit of this scheme is that it need involve no overall cost to the Treasury. The present accepted cost for an unemployed person is between £5,200 and £5,500 per annum in benefits paid and in the loss of taxation. If the investment stimulated by the scheme was not to be made, the Exchequer would have to meet for a full year the cost of the man who is not employed. The beauty of the scheme is that no money would be paid in grant or bonus until the company could prove that it had employed staff who had worked for a period of 12 months. The saving to the Exchequer would, on whatever analysis one makes, be between £5,200 and £5,500 for each person who becomes employed. The scheme has great flexibility.

Without delaying the House for too long, I should like to give three examples. Taking a small firm with a small extension, perhaps creating eight new jobs, if one costs that out, as I have—I would be willing to provide a copy for anyone who is interested—it would be under £40,000. If that company realised that after it had employed eight persons for 12 months it would receive a cash bonus of about £36,000—that is, £4,500 multiplied by eight—can anyone think that there would not be a massive number of small firms which would be looking to expand their businesses? With a medium-sized firm, creating perhaps 80 jobs, a likely and acceptable total for expenditure would probably be about £600,000. At the rate that I have suggested, that would bring in, after 80 people had been employed for 12 months, a bonus of £360,000, which would meet approximately 47 per cent. of the total cost. Why not? The Government will have to spend that money if people are unemployed. Why not spend it in order to create jobs and get people back to work?

The flexibility of the scheme is that is could be for a limited period. In order not to overheat the economy, there could be a cut-off point after the first 300,000 jobs had been registered this year. Furthermore, different levels of bonus could be applied in different parts of the country. There could be a bonus of £4,500 in the north-east, the north-west, in Wales and in Scotland, a bonus of £3,000 in the midlands and a very small bonus in the south-east. And if we wanted to be sexist, different bonuses could be paid for jobs for men and jobs for women, or a bonus could be paid to those who have a family to support which is different from that which is paid to those who have no family to support. Massive flexibility is built into the application of the scheme.

There are two arguments against such a scheme. The first is that people would get round the regulations. The Treasury always puts up that argument. If, however, a company had to prove that it had employed people for 12 months, it would be up to that company to show to the Department of Trade and Industry that it should benefit from the scheme. If one or two firms got round the scheme, so what? It would not matter if 97 or 98 per cent. of the jobs that were created were genuine jobs.

Furthermore, it can be argued that part of this investment would not have to be paid for. Normal expansion would bring many jobs on to the market. The scheme is capable of dealing with that expansion. If 300,000 new jobs were created, while normal expansion created 60,000 new jobs, the amount of the bonus could be lowered to cover the 20 per cent. of firms to which an unnecessary bonus has to be paid. I shall not bore the House with the details, but I know that such a scheme could be worked out.

This is a new concept. It would cost no money and it would result in an incentive for industry to create long-term jobs, not just short-term jobs, that would be of major benefit to the country—in racing terms, no foal, no fee. The Government would have to pay nothing until the bonus was paid. It would have to pay the bonus only after the employer had proved that he had taken somebody off the unemployment register and provided him with work for a year.

Such a scheme would considerably help to create the incentive and the image of a caring Government who are determined to find jobs for those who are out of work. It would not go astray. Surely it is worth a try.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): We consider the Budget against the sombre background of ever rising unemployment. Despite last year's absurdly described "Budget for jobs", there have been six consecutive annual increases in the number of people out of work. The most worrying aspect is the remorseless increase within those totals of the number of long-term unemployed. They now number 1·4 million, 800,000 of whom have been without a job for more than two years, with all the misery, heartache and waste that that involves. There is no evidence from this pygmy of a Budget that the Government either care or have a clue about what to do about it. There must be a response that is commensurate with the size and scope of this tragedy.

As the House knows, the Select Committee on Employment has produced a well researched and costed programme to give a job guarantee to the long-term unemployed. The House awaits, but now with diminishing expectations, the Government's response, which again has been delayed. The report envisaged taking on 100,000 in the National Health Service and the social services, 300,000 in a building and renovation programme and 350,000 in private industry. This, with 250,000 on the community programme, would amount to 1 million jobs and constitute the guarantee. While awaiting the Government's response, it is to the community programme that I want to address my remarks.

The Minister knows that for the past three years I and the Select Committee have advocated an expansion of the community programme — indeed, an enhanced and improved community programme. This is a programme to help long-term unemployed adults to improve their prospects by providing them with temporary employment, either full-time or part-time, on work which otherwise would not be done but which would be of practical benefit to the community. I devoted an Adjournment debate to this topic. I have taken the initiative in expanding the programme in my constituency, so nobody can say that I am an opponent, or an ill-motivated critic. However, I am forced to take a critical view of the Government's parsimonious handling of the community programme. They are damaging and jeopardising the future of the programme by trying to cut costs. They are spoiling the ship for a ha'porth of tar. This is arousing great, and justified, criticism.

The truth is that the Government's motives are suspect. They are thought to be primarily concerned with seeking cosmetically to reduce the numbers on the unemployment register at the lowest possible cost. Each month, an additional 8,000 to 9,000 people leave the register and take up places on the community programme, thus exerting a downward pressure on the monthly headline figure of unemployment, which the Government will seek to exploit politically. But the present shaving of costs is devaluing the programme and increasingly restricting it to young, single people who are doing low-paid, part-time, insecure jobs. The Budget increase in the average wage from £63 to £67 is hopelessly inadequate. I shall refer to that in a moment.

Recently the Government changed the eligibility rules —probably unlawfully—so that only those who are able to claim unemployment benefit can get a place. As we know, many of the unemployed who are seeking work, especially married women, are unable to claim benefit. The purpose and consequence of this discrimination against women was the cosmetic one of increasing the number of people taken off the register and at the same time reducing the net cost of the programme, because the previous benefits of more of the participants could be deducted from the gross costs. As a result, the net cost of removing one person from the register fell from £2,200 in 1985 to £1,900 in 1986, a fall of nearly 14 per cent.

In addition to such jobs as painting and decorating and renovating community buildings, the community programme is now funding playgroups, latch-key schemes and visiting and day care schemes for the elderly and the disabled. This is to be welcomed but obviously there will be contradictions, tensions and discontinuities between the needs of these schemes and a community programme that has restrictive eligibility and wage and operating criteria and that consists mainly of young, single men. If the Government do not want the programme to be brought into disrepute, they must pay immediate attention to a number of deficiencies and remedy them. The operating cost of each community programme place has never been increased during the lifetime of the programme, despite the increase in inflation. To keep pace with inflation, the current figure of £440 per annum would need to be increased to £514, and this should be done.

Most important, the average wage should be increased. In three years the average wage was increased only once, by 5 per cent. to £63 and, in this Budget, to £67. This miserly movement is insultingly inadequate. It amounts to not much more than one third of the national average wage. The £67 is an average as some—for example, the supervisory staff—get more and others get less. These low rates impair the quality of the programme, for the wages in the community programme have to be the trade union rate for the job.

As these other normal rates increase each year with inflation, the number of hours that can be offered on any community programme project is constantly squeezed down as each agency struggles to keep within the £67 average. This inevitably means fewer hours for part timers and a falling proportion of full timers, both of which damage the programme. In the year to August 1984, nearly 30 per cent. of the 122,600 participants were full time. By July 1985, the proportion of the 175,000 workers on the community programme in the previous year had fallen to just over 17 per cent. The low wages and reduced hours mean that part-time community programme posts are financially attractive only to single people living at home.

Over the same period, the proportion of single people on the community programme increased from 66 per cent. to more than 78 per cent. Older people and those with families, often those longest unemployed, have been squeezed out. While the 18 to 25-year-olds constitute only 36 per cent. of the eligible client group, their participation in the programme increased from 56 per cent. to nearly 60 per cent. from August 1984 to July 1985.

As a result, it is now questionable to what extent the programme is really helping the growing ranks of the long-term unemployed. The average wage on the programme must be urgently increased to at least an average minimum of £75 a week. I estimate that the net cost of that would be less than £100 million per annum. If the Government are not willing to spend that, they are not serious about wishing to solve the problem.

The eligibility rules, which limit recruitment to those drawing benefit, thus discriminating against married women, reinforce the male bias of the programme: four out of five participants are men. These features not only are important for those who are excluded, but have implications for the quality of projects and of the work experience offered.

Another problem is training. At one time, 50,000 training places were to be offered on the community programme. Now, as a result of the decision to reduce the training linked-to-community programme budget by £15 million, only a few thousand training opportunities have been created, yet training, including on the job skills and day release education and training, would be an important part of any quality programme. Is it any wonder that it appears to many that the Government's main motive and priority is to remove people from the register and to massage the unemployment figures as cheaply and meretriciously as possible rather than improving the quality of the programme?

As the Minister knows, I have taken a great interest in, and given my support and encouragement to, the community programme, but this may no longer be possible. Unless extra resources are put into the programme, people like me will have to reconsider their attitude.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) has made a closely informed speech. He and I disagree on a number of matters, but I have a great deal of sympathy with what he says and does, if I may say so, in his capacity as Chairman of the Select Committee on Employment.

A number of criticisms can be made of the Budget, but one which cannot be made is that the Chancellor has inflamed the Labour party into opposition. While the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was making a very lively speech, he was supported at no time by more than seven Opposition Back Benchers, and usually fewer than that. The Chancellor can be pleased that there is so little opposition to him from the Opposition Benches. Although the attendance on Conservative Benches has not been overwhelming, it has been a good deal better than that on the Opposition Benches.

As everybody agrees, the Chancellor has produced an extremely ingenious Budget with a lot of good things in it. What he has done about the victims of Nazi persecution is good and right—so right that one wonders why it was not done many years ago, but I suppose that nobody thought of it. I thoroughly welcome that, just as I welcome what he has done about charities, which I think will be beneficial from every conceivable point of view. The same applies to his proposals on shares and profit sharing and matters relating to popular capitalism.

I have a less warm welcome for the 1 per cent. cut in income tax because I believe that that money could have been far better used. Moreover, the income tax cut looks a bit odd beside the £2 billion increase in rates which is apparently projected this year. No doubt some of that sum is due to the policies of authorities controlled by the Opposition parties, but a good deal of it is due to the policies of the Government.

Buckinghamshire is Conservative-controlled and has a very careful and economical county council, yet entirely because of the Government's actions it has had to impose a rate increase this year of no less than 30 per cent. together with a small cut in services. Therefore, I fear that the ratepayers of Buckinghamshire will not be greatly impressed by getting 1p off their income tax.

However, in my view, the chief objection to the cut in income tax is that it will produce fewer jobs than almost any other conceivable way of using that money. I greatly welcome the Chancellor's special measures for the unemployed, but, despite the strictures which my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment gave in a persuasive but, to me, not wholly convincing speech when he complained that people should judge the measures by the amount of money that they cost, no doubt other considerations should enter into one's judgment on these matters, but I still feel that a net cost of £100 million is a good deal less than excessive. It is inadequate particularly because the lower oil price will produce lower inflation, affording the opportunity therefore for greater growth. Unemployment should, I hope, begin at last to fall a little this year, but, in view of the level that it has now reached, that will not be enough.

The Government's economic policy has had a number of successes. The way in which the exchange rate has been managed in the last few weeks with the fall in oil prices has been very skilful and has shown some good decision making by the Chancellor and some adroit management by the Bank of England.

Whatever the other successes in the economic policy have been, undoubtedly there has not been a success in regard to unemployment. The Chancellor spoke on Tuesday of five years of solid growth. Unfortunately, there have also been five years of solid growth of unemployment.

A number of changes in the counting of unemployment have been made over the years, but if we use the current definition of wholly unemployed adults seasonally adjusted, unemployment was 2,144,000 in March 1981, it has grown every year since then, and it is now 3,210,000, a solid growth of just over 1 million. If one used the previous definition, one would find that the rise was even greater. The policy on unemployment, to put it mildly, has not worked, yet it has not been changed.

Even more remarkably, the rhetoric defending that policy has not changed either. We are still told constantly that the Government cannot create jobs and that the only way that unemployment can be reduced is by bringing down inflation, by increasing efficiency and by people pricing themselves into jobs. In his Budget speech on Tuesday, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said:

"The solution to the problem of unemployment—it is the only solution—requires progress on two key fronts. The first is a sustained improvement in the performance of business and industry, and thus of the economy as a whole. That is what every aspect of the Government's economic policy has been designed to assist, and it is already achieving impressive results. The second is a level of pay which enables workers to be priced into jobs instead of pricing them out of jobs, and which in particular ensures that British industry can hold its own against our major international competitors."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 171.]

On the first point, assuming that my right hon. Friend is right in saying that the Government's policy has already achieved "impressive results", it has to be said that those results have achieved nothing that is good in regard to unemployment. As to the Chancellor's second point, assuming that that too is correct, the pricing into jobs has not happened over the last seven years. One wonders what the Government or the Chancellor can do to ensure that it happens now. Just a mild exhortation has not been productive over the last seven years. One wonders why it should be productive now.

Therefore, considering the results of the policy and the rhetoric, it seems to me that there are only two possible conclusions. The first is that the policy is mistaken, and the alternative is that unemployment is a relatively unimportant matter and should not be allowed significantly to affect economic policy. Having listened to the extremely humane speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General this afternoon, I think that the first conclusion is right. He confirmed that the second alternative is the wrong conclusion, although perhaps he did not mean to confirm that the first conclusion is right.

There is no mystery about the reasons for the failure of the policy. On Tuesday the Chancellor rightly took pride in the growth of productivity. He pointed out that since 1979 productivity in manufacturing industry had increased by an average of 3·5 per cent. a year. The rise in productivity in the economy as a whole is naturally a little less, but I think that it rose by nearly 3 per cent. between 1981 and 1985, which is still substantial.

The Chancellor also said, as reported in column 166, that we could look back on five years of growth at about 3 per cent. a year. I may be wrong about this, but to judge from page 40 of the Red Book the Chancellor must be looking forward as well as back and including 1986 in that calculation, because, if 1986 is excluded, growth seems to have been at just over 2·5 per cent. a year. Moreover, if oil is excluded, as I think it has to be for these purposes since it employs very few people, growth has been about 2·25 per cent. a year. That is the explanation of the growth in unemployment. There has never been a five-year period with that rate of growth in which unemployment did not rise. Unless output rises as fast as productivity, which it should do this year, unemployment will continue to rise.

My right hon. Friend almost always bases his calculations on 1981. In doing so he misleads himself because between 1980 and 1981 employment increased by 1 million. If the growth rate is taken from 1979 instead of 1981, it is either 1·1 per cent. or 1·2 per cent. a year. That again is the cause of unemployment.

As I said, unemployment should fall a little this year with the growth in output of 3 per cent. but, according to the Chancellor's forecast in the Red Book, in the two subsequent years growth will be only 2·5 per cent., which means that on current policies there is unlikely to be much, if any, further fall in unemployment, on the Chancellor's own figures. So a change of policy is clearly necessary. We need more growth and more special employment measures to get unemployment down. It is sad that the Chancellor has not taken the opportunity to make that change.

Many proposals have been made over the years by a number of people, including myself. My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General talked about instant proposals. In fact, proposals have been made over a period of at least five years. So they are far from instant; if anything, they are extremely stale. The proposals have been there for some time, but unfortunatley nobody has paid much attention to them.

What is needed is a combination of measures, including increased expenditure on infrastructure. Again, my right hon. and learned Friend was scathing about that this afternoon; perhaps he should have a word with the Confederation of British Industry, which does not agree with him on it. I was not sure about the point which he was seeking to make about the shortage of skills. It seems to be a heavy condemnation of the Government's policy that, even with so much unemployment, there should be such a shortage of skills. Obviously there should be a combination of increased expenditure on infrastructure, a reduction in taxes on employment, and special meaures of the sort recommended by the Select Committee chaired by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East.

Such a strategy is needed not only because of the 3 million unemployed, although that is reason enough in itself, but because of the severe structural problems that the country faces. The Chancellor sought to make light of these problems and made rather a good flip comment about them in his Budget speech.

On a number of occasions my right hon. Friend has denigrated the House of Lords Select Committee, but there are at lest two answers to what he said. The first was given yesterday. There is all the difference in the world between a fall in the price of oil which helps almost everyone and a fall just in our oil revenues and our balance of payments which harms only us. The second answer, which is perhaps even more important, is that the problems of Britain's lack of competitiveness in manufacturing trade were evident long before we had any North sea oil. Therefore, the idea that they will disappear when North sea oil disappears is distinctly implausible. As the House of Lords Select Committee rightly said, the problem of the growing competitiveness of British industry will not solve itself.

I continue to believe that there is cause for serious concern about the future of British manufacturing industry and our competitiveness. Meanwhile, I regret that the Chancellor has not chosen the best way to make capitalism both popular and caring by reducing unemployment.

7.17 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Opening the debate today on behalf of the Opposition my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) quoted the views of various newspapers on the Budget. I want to quote from the editorial, not of a national newspaper, but of my local newspaper, the Bradford Telegraph and Argus. The editorial was headed "Whole lot of nothing":

> "Once again a Tory Chancellor has robbed the poor of an opportunity to climb out of the poverty trap in favour of paying the rich with his measures to encourage wider share ownership.
> While the Chancellor patched up his fiscal policies, he left the real core of the problem untouched. In failing to introduce any measures to cut the dole queues he is guilty of gross dereliction of duty.
>
> The decision to spend around £200 million increasing the number employed under the so-called Community Programme is little more than window dressing.
> What the low paid and the unemployed needed was some real help—or at least the prospect of some light at the end of the tunnel. Instead all Britain was offered was a cosmetic exercise. No amount of this sort of make-up can cover the malignant growth of unemployment.
> Certainly the Budget will do little to help Bradford and its problems. There were no measures to help regenerate the inner city areas and little to encourage a business community still reeling from the near 30 per cent. rate rise."

That was the authentic voice of the north, which is dominated by mass unemployment, poverty and deprivation. What is so tragic and sad about the Budget is that it was a Budget for the people who do not live in the north. It was a Budget of the haves against the have nots, of the comfortable against the uncomfortable, and of the south against the north.

The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) chided the Opposition for not being inflamed by this Budget, but I think that he let the cat out of the bag as to why there are so few people in the Chamber protesting against the Government. He has said that for five years he and others have been putting forward alternatives to this Government, but they have not been heeded. The problem is that we have a Government who are deaf, uncaring and locked into their own dogma, and are not in any way prepared to respond to constructive alternative policies which are posed in this Chamber or any other place.

The right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham and the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) are present. We have had a fleeting glimpse of the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym); and the right hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) was here a few moments ago. They are members of the Conservative party who have been defeated and who have been complete failures in persuading the Government to change course.

This Budget should have been about creating real jobs — the jobs to which the Prime Minister referred so much between 1976 and 1979. It should have been about combating poverty, which grips my constituency. One third of my constituents are on social security. More than 20 per cent. of them are unemployed, with the situation getting worse daily.

The Budget should have been about doing something positive to help manufacturing industry. The reality is that it does very little. At times, I read the Daily Telegraph, the house journal of the Conservative party, and yesterday, tucked away in its vast and often euphoric response to the Budget, was this little news item under the heading "Opportunities for Jobs Missed":

> "Builders said the Budget would push more people 'into the black economy', and that it had missed the chance to create permanent jobs in construction by putting the emphasis on cosmetic schemes for teenagers. The Building Employers Confederation said part time training schemes are helping to produce more people doing botched jobs for householders, offering lower charges because they evade paying value added tax. The Federation of Civil and Engineering Contractors also regretted that the Chancellor had 'not taken the option to create real jobs' by new investment in infrastructure projects. This was the cheapest real way of creating extra jobs."

The Paymaster General may choose to deride and sneer at that positive alternative proposal, but it remains the truth. I think that everybody, except the Government, recognises that money put into new buildings and into the renovation and improvement of old buildings is the best way to tackle one of the most urgent social problems facing this country — deprived slum areas and overcrowded housing — and will create a great many jobs quickly.

My own city at present has 9,000 people on the housing waiting list; 10,000 applications for home improvement grants have been rejected; 5,000 properties have been found to be structurally defective, and 5,000 more without water, inside toilets or bathrooms. That is the collective inheritance which we could tackle tomorrow with money and conviction if the Government had the political will to do it. The sad fact is that that will does not exist, and will not exist until the people of this country have pushed this Government into changing the direction of its policies.

More resources should be made available for housing, especially to local authorities. We need a relaxation of the limits on capital receipts—another way of unlocking a lot of money which could be put into housing. There is disappointment in my city that we were left off the list of eight cities to receive special help in tackling our inner city problems. I hope that the Economic Secretary will be able to say when Bradford will receive additional help to tackle our problems. We meet every criteria of the other cities that were given help, and we have the unique feature that our population is due to increase by 10 per cent. in the next 20 years.

The Budget does nothing for the poor. It is obscene that it took money away from the unemployed. It gave £9 a week extra to people on £50,000 a year, but the family on £4,000 a year were lucky if they saw an extra £1·60 a week. That is the scale of this Government's priorities. Those are their real feelings about the people of this country. They are happy to give still more to the rich and take it away from the poor, which, of course, is what they have been doing ever since they were elected in 1979. We know that the best way to help low-income families is to increase child benefit. Even the Conservative Women's Organisation wants to save the child benefit. It has joined with many other organisations in campaigning to persuade the Government to increase child benefit as the most effective way of combating low income family poverty.

However, the Government gave a miserly 10p increase in child benefit, at the same time as the insulting increase of 40p a week for pensioners. Cutting the basic tax rate and lifting personal allowances is the least effective way of combating poverty. The Government know this. Every organisation that is concerned with poverty knows it, and yet the Government continue along the same course.

I hope that the Government will come to see that what we need are not further cuts in basic taxation but substantial and sustained increases in child benefit as the best way of giving substantial extra amounts of money to low-income families, who will spend that money, and thereby stimulate the economy as a whole and local economies in particular.

The Budget has done nothing to help manufacturing industry. We were looking for a positive strategy that would assist manufacturing industry, particularly through lower interest rates and a low exchange rate.

My chamber of commerce has conducted continuing surveys of local companies, and every survey has shown that the two biggest constraints on business in Bradford over the past 24 months have been high interest rates and high exchange rates. This Budget has done very little to assist manufacturers in my city, and they have already said so in reports published in the Telegraph and Argus yesterday. Certainly it is not creating a situation whereby they can look with confidence to increased orders, still less to taking on more employees.

Bradford is a city suffering immense problems. It is a very proud city, and we are very independent, gritty people, who want to help ourselves, but we have reached a situation where we shall not be able to arrest the spiral of decline that faces our city unless there is Government intervention, substantial amounts of Government resources, and sustained Government assistance.

The biggest employer is the local council. We are now facing substantial cuts in the rate support grant, which has led in part to a substantial increase in rates of 30 per cent. The largest party on Bradford council is the Conservative group, which is supported by the Liberal-SDP alliance. We have seen also the cost of the measure abolishing the county councils. These factors have led to a 30 per cent. rate increase.

The second biggest employer is the university of Bradford. In 1981, the cuts in higher education resulted in a large number of redundancies, a reduction in students, and the closure of three university departments. They also took £6 million out of the local economy. Cuts over the next three years, estimated at 3 per cent. a year, will take further enormous amounts of money out of the local economy, as will the mere 2 per cent. increase in student grants. Increasing pensions and other benefits by less than the rate of inflation will mean yet more money going out of the local economy.

Last Friday, I attended the inauguration of Sir John Harvey-Jones, chairman of ICI, as the new chancellor of the university. The House will remember that about 18 months ago he was very vocal in challenging the Government's view that the expansion of the service industry would compensate for the loss of manufacturing industry, and last Friday he was critical of the Government's education policy, particularly in respect of higher education. A number of other speakers, including the vice-chancellor, were equally critical of the Government's approach.

It is a scandal that Bradford university will be closing its physics department. This university, together with Aston and Salford, faced enormous cuts in 1981. The Government tell us almost daily of their belief in support for technological advance. How can they reconcile those claims with cuts in higher education generally and massive cuts in particular in technological universities? It is lunacy.

West Yorkshire has the lowest wages of any urban area in the United Kingdom, but people still have the audacity to say that if only workers accepted lower wages they would price themselves into employment. How can that be true when, in an area of traditionally very low wages, we have well above the national average of unemployment? These are the economics of the madhouse. It is unbelieveable that the Government are daily trying to persuade all of us that if only people would accept low wages there would be more jobs and more job security. If that were true in Bradford, we would have some of the lowest levels of unemployment instead of some of the highest.

The impact of the social security review will be not only to reduce the incomes of the poorest—the pensioners, the disabled, the unemployed, the single-parent families and many others—but to take massive sums of money out of the local economy, reduce demand and exaggerate and intensify our problems. We want a reversal of those problems, so that we get more resources into the local economy, stimulate demand, the opportunities for jobs and the expansion of industry to produce more goods and services. We are trapped in a spiral decline. We have seen massive job losses in manufacturing industry, particularly textiles, but we are not seeing job opportunities in service industries to compensate for those job losses.

Our population is growing. We are not unduly optimistic about the prospects of attracting new industry into the city. A recently published major report said that the main hope must be to expand existing industries rather than attract new industries to greenfield sites.

We want support from the Government, and priorities that give the utmost support to inner cities, such as Bradford, which are facing enormous and grotesque problems. We do not want tea and sympathy, although Ministers visit us almost daily to give us that. We want action and money and resources to help us. We want to see jobs, housing and schools.

At the moment, teachers are delivering letters to the homes of 650 pupils at the Belle Vue school, in my constituency, saying:

> "We are seriously worried about lack of money in education. At this school we are desperately short of room and the heating in the winter is very poor."

Bradford probably had more publicity over the past two years about the controversy over the head teacher at Drummond middle school, Ray Honeyford, than we have had in any other comparable controversy. Many of the people who campaigned for that head teacher's right to free speech are not now campaigning to improve the fabric and conditions of schools, including the one involved, although I would welcome it if they did.

Most of the schools in my constituency were built when Queen Victoria was on the throne. They are falling down, leaking and in an appalling condition, and they are not fit places in which to try to give the best possible education to our children and the generations of children to come. We lack the resources to deal with the schools, environmental and infrastructure problems—the enormous problems of dereliction and trying to clear away old buildings.

The Chancellor spoke about Britain now being a property-owning democracy and said that he wanted it to become a share-owning democracy. As my quotation from the editorial of my local newspaper shows, such aspirations are as remote from the perspective of my constituents as if the Chancellor had been speaking from Mars. The thought that many of my constituents will be able to invest £200 a month is ludicrous, as were some of the other remarks in the Budget speech.

The Government have stolen millions upon millions of pounds from Bradford by cutting the money that they give to local authorities to support services. Overall, the cut is 17 per cent. The Government have stolen a great deal from Bradford pensioners, the unemployed, the disabled and single parents by a cut in benefits or by not increasing them by more than the increase in the cost of living. They have stolen money by not giving more in housing investment and something to deal with the structurally defective buildings and many other problems to which I have referred. The people of Bradford have no reason to thank the Chancellor for this Budget, and that is simply because it has done nothing for them.

7.37 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) called for lower interest and exchange rates, which he said were badly needed. As he has got both those things—interest rates have already fallen and will fall further and the exchange rate against the deutschmark has moved down dramatically, as it has against all other currencies except the dollar—I would have expected him to recognise those benefits, although he had many criticisms and strong feelings about the state of the city that he represents. In a way, that was a good example of how some of the Government's critics, who can always pick on particular points when things have not gone well, have got into a flywheel state, where the criticism spins on like some tired cassette without them recognising that we are moving into a new economic situation in which manufacturing is expanding, industrial relations are vastly improving and the potential for growth is great. We are achieving something that the Labour Goverment said could never be achieved—they failed to achieve it themselves—steady expansion with inflation low and falling.

I want to pick out at this late hour in the debate one particular aspect of the argument. Through all the criticisms of the Government's current policy there has run the view that tax cuts do not help the unemployed. Indeed, the whole of the speech by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was made as though these were two completely separate things. The same idea ran through the speech of the hon. Member for Bradford, West. I wish totally to repudiate that view. I do not rule out the case for more local government capital receipts being spent, and I wish that there had been more room for that in the Budget. But to argue that is the only way forward and to shut one's eyes to the immense power of tax cuts to wage war on unemployment and poverty is to be absolutely blind to what is happening in economies in the rest of the world and to what is happening in our economy as well. The more one looks at the world, the more obvious it is that there is a very detailed correlation between lower taxes and more jobs.

In the United States the number of jobs created in January was a staggering 565,000, of which 75 per cent. were in the service sector. In that economy jobs have been increasing at the rate of 355,000 a month since the middle of last year. There are other examples also, of which, of course, Japan is the classic one. Its total tax take is more than 10 per cent. below the tax take of the United Kingdom and its unemployment rate is 2·8 per cent.

The message seems to me to be one that can only be ignored by simply insisting that the facts of today's world economy do not exist.

Tax cuts do help jobs, in particular—this is the point I want to concentrate on—the kind of tax reductions which enlarge personal savings, encourage small enterprise and self-employment and, above all, extend personal ownership and pride in ownership. The motivations for enterprise and towards the social obligations that go with ownership are, above all, the forces that are going to help most to create a fully occupied society, which of course we have got to achieve and want to achieve. One proposition we hear is that this can be done by creating a million jobs through public works expenditure, and so on. Maybe there is some truth in the argument for capital spending, but to ignore the influence of tax cuts is to try to stand a chair on two legs, which of course will not succeed.

Ownership tax incentives are immensely valuable and powerful and help all communities, including the community about which the hon. Member for Bradford, West has just been speaking, to begin to create within themselves the seeds of business, enterprise, job opportunities and occupations which have been so sadly missing in so many of our rundown city areas.

That is why I welcome enormously the strong emphasis in this Budget on enlarging personal ownership of all kinds, and welcome in particular the personal equity plan scheme. I must confess to my right hon. and hon. Friends that when I first heard the Chancellor speaking about it I thought for one moment that we were really going for a scheme allowing every wage and salary earner to put, tax-free, £2,400 into a personal investment pool. That really would have been a Loi Monory and that is the kind of way we want to go. This is not a fantasy; other countries have done it, so that millions of workers can share in the wealth of the nation in which they work. Although we have not been able to go that far yet—and the PEP is an excellent first step—we must be quite clear that these objectives are obtainable in the future. I am very glad that the Budget contains that proposal.

I want to put a few further thoughts to my right hon. and hon. Friends about the next steps in this vital drive for wider ownership, which I believe should be the major social goal of a Conservative Government in the 1980s and 1990s, and I hope that is the way that my right hon. and hon. Friends are thinking.

First, we have to be clear about the different paths to wider ownership that need to be pursued, possibly together, because they are not necessarily alternatives.

There is the question of profit sharing, which the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), speaking for the SDP, mentioned. I know that his party is keen on such things. The Budget contains proposals, which I gather the Chancellor is now discussing with industry, for seeing whether profit-related payments can be built into the wage system. We are years behind other countries on this. Japan has a system under which one quarter of all wages is paid in bonus, and that bonus is discretionary, and in some cases it attracts tax privileges. I think in the next phase we should be looking towards a tax privilege, a tax incentive, being related to the bonus rather than just, as at present, to employee shares. At the moment, if employee shares are given, tax privileges arise. Income tax is not paid, nor is capital gains tax, if the shares are held a certain time. So it should be for the bonus idea. It certainly has an amazing effect in encouraging the taking on of new workers. Some very interesting ideas are now circulating, originating largely in America and Japan, on the power of the bonus system in wage settlements, in expanding employment, in encouraging the taking on of more people and, of course, in motivating the work force.

Secondly, there is the whole area of ideas related to wider ownership of shares. Here I really must take issue with the hon. Member for Bradford, West. It is not an idea just for the elite. That is really a very old-fashioned, quaint belief. We are talking about the potential for millions of families to have a stake in the country in which they live. It is very interesting that, when the British Telecom issue was organised, 26 per cent. of the adult population, I am told, made inquiries about buying shares. That means that 11 million people were interested in becoming owners as well as earners. I think that we should now aim, through our policies, at establishing at least that number of people who are familiar with the ownership of shares and equity in the industry of this country. I should like to see incentives not merely for those who are lucky enough to be employees in firms where shares are handed out, but for everybody, including public sector workers, to become shareholders in this nation.

We can do much better. Neighbouring economies have done much better and there are many more people involved in sharing the growing wealth which inevitably develops as industry becomes more capital-intensive and more based on knowledge and high technology.

Thirdly, there is the idea of citizen ownership, which Samuel Brittan has written about in the Financial Times very interestingly. This broadly means that shares should be distributed by the Government free or at a very low cost to millions of people. It is an idea that I have tried out in the past on some of my colleagues, but I did not get anywhere. That should certainly be considered, possibly based on the idea of bearer bonds.

In the 1960s and the mid-1970s we looked at a plan in British Columbia, Canada, where they had distributed shares in the major utilities to every citizen, and we saw how that worked. It did not bring immediate benefit to all the citizens of British Columbia, but it is an idea for involving people in a far better way than any kind of centralist Socialism and nationalisation, and all that outdated nonsense.

The fourth idea is one that my hon. Friends have pushed for very hard in recent years—to widen the ownership of small business. That is the living expression of ownership, and I am glad that so many measures have been pushed through to create this. I am also glad that the enterprise allowance has been reformed slightly. I did not like the way that it was working before, and I am delighted to hear that the tax anomaly is to be corrected.

We must now move further on this front. This is the area in which for two decades now some of us have been arguing that the major thrust is required to move away from the dead hand of collectivism and the nationalised compassion which has been bound up in the outdated welfare state. The areas in which we now need to make progress are the following.

First, we should go further towards substantial tax relief for every wage and salary earner for putting money aside for personal investment, not necessarily investment that is lost in the great institutions, but investment where there is a personal connection—investment ideally in small and rather localised business. A lot more could be done at local level to encourage the link between saving and new jobs and investment.

Secondly, we need to transform the input into our education system as far as business is concerned so that children really understand how enterprise works, how a capital-owning society operates and what the opportunities are for them in that kind of society. That is changing a bit, but there is still too much emphasis on the idea that somehow the jobs will be provided by somebody else or manufactured by the state, which really means that millions of people have to pay taxes to subsidise other people on low incomes.

Thirdly, we need to see a social dimension in this whole area, by which I mean far more encouragement of those who have capital and savings to fulfil their social obligations by doing voluntary work, helping charities, giving, caring and generally filling in the bits and pieces of a sensitive caring society that the welfare state has failed to do. That is why I am delighted at the measure in the Budget which directs people's attention towards charities, and which allows them to deduct from their payroll a small annual amount to give to voluntary work. That is a step in the right direction and part of the jigsaw—the new pattern for the future.

Fourthly, if we are to have more capital owners in a more flexible society with opportunities for small business job creation, part-time jobs and all the things that will grow—it is no use the Labour party saying that that is the wrong direction because that will be the pattern of the future — society will need to be supported by good public services. We are learning that many public services can be better organised on a privatised, decentralised basis. We thought that telephones, water systems and big public services could be run only centrally, but that turns out to be wrong. Nevertheless, the undelegated services that remain with the Government should be properly supported. If the railway system cannot be privatised, I should hate to see it run down. It should be better supported. Similarly, I should hate to see other basic services inadequately supported. The priorities should be clear. Earlier one hon. Member called for more expenditure on roads and hospitals. The roads programme is already enormous, and so is the hospital building programme, so I doubt whether extra capital spending is needed there. But more is needed in other areas, and I was sorry that there was not sufficient emphasis on that in the Budget.

We need not only the enterprise culture, of which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke, but an ownership culture. We are sorry to see a further steady expansion in the real economy. It is happening now, and it will continue in the coming year. However, it will tend to be concentrated on capital growth; and it is essential for the Conservative party to recognise the need for the benefits of that capital growth to be spread, not concentrated. Wealth must be spread. Inevitably we shall see this new kind of growth in expanding rewards for capital-intensive industry, not so much in factory jobs of the old-fashioned sort of the 1950s and 1960s.

The key social goal of Tory party policy in the 1990s should be to achieve mass ownership and to disperse power and wealth to the people. I hope that next year's Budget will take us a long way further down that road.

7.52 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I shall not follow the line of the right hon. Member Guildford (Mr. Howell); I shall pursue the line of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) in his opening speech. My hon. Friend showed clearly the Government's failure yet again to use the opportunity of the 1986 Budget to tackle the real problems facing us, and to take positive initiatives to get people back to work and to deal with the unacceptable unemployment position. Tory Members often fail to listen closely to what we in the Labour party say. My hon. Friend made it clear that the Labour party neither believed nor claimed that it could get 4 million people back to work in traditional industries, or that the measures that it would take to put money back into the economy would put everybody back to work in the lifetime of the next Labour Government. He made it clear that we would have to take many measures to distribute the work and wealth available.

There is one major difference between the two main political parties. The Labour party accepts that we shall never employ as many people as we did a few years ago in manufacturing industry and many other areas because of new technology, and that new technology must certainly be used in our industries if we are to compete in the market places of the world. The major difference is that we believe that we must ensure that the whole of society benefits from that change and that there is not an elite in work whose standard of living continues to grow while the standard of living of the unemployed, the retired, the sick and the disabled not only fails to maintain its present level, but ultimately starts to decline. If the Conservative party continues to pursue its present policies, we shall face that position in the not too distant future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), in a powerful speech, described how the Budget would affect the people of Bradford. The same case may be argued for constituency after constituency. The Budget has failed to tackle our problems, and once again is disastrous for the majority of people. I accept that this year the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not describe the Budget as a "Budget for jobs". Indeed, if Ministers were liable for prosecution under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 the Chancellor would have been the first of many to face legal action for his false representation of the 1985 Budget.

When the Chancellor presented this year's Budget, he said that the aim was to concentrate the benefits of his limited room for manoeuvre following the oil price collapse

"not on the rich but on the great majority of ordinary taxpayers."
—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol 94, c. 183.]

The Budget fails to live up to his comments. It is a Budget for those in work. It does not try to get people back to work. It does nothing to remove the barrier and widening rift that exists between the south and the north. Some places in the north may be prosperous, and some areas in inner London may be deprived, but on balance the north is deprived and the south is prosperous. It is time that we sought to eliminate and reduce that widening rift.

Today the Paymaster General referred to additional expenditure and described what the Government were doing regarding health. In my constituency ambulances cannot run people to hospital for outpatient treatment, because they are on a quota system, and once they have used their allocation of quota no ambulances are available. Even emergency ambulances are stretched to the limit. Two hospitals are proposed for closure. While I accept that Burnley general hospital is to have an extension, that extension gives the Government and the National Health Service an opportunity to use the old premises to ensure that those on waiting lists and those needing geriatric care are given the necessary care and attention.

The Paymaster General referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), and quoted him as having made promises all over the country at various meetings about what the Labour Government will do—and a Labour Government will be elected at the general election. Once again, the Paymaster General failed to listen carefully to what my hon. Friend and other Labour party Members have said. We were fortunate to have my hon. Friend speaking at a public meeting in Burnley recently. While he made the Labour party's priorities clear, he was careful to make it absolutely clear that, because of the mess that we shall inherit from this Government, we cannot make promises to do everything that we should like to do during the lifetime of one Labour Government. The Opposition recognise that five years will not be sufficient to repair all the damage done by this Government.

The move to assist charities is welcome, but the proposals about VAT could have gone further. However, that is a move in the right direction, and the provision to allow companies to make one-off payments is also an attractive feature. I hope we shall see companies responding to that and taking the opportunity to make donations to charities. Of course, that money will be in addition to the covenanting payments that companies are already able to make.

The capital transfer tax on lifetime gifts is to be abolished and replaced by an inheritance tax. Few people in my constituency will benefit from that. It is a totally wrong move, and one made to assist the wealthy. It is not acceptable. The Government should think again.

The Government should spend more money on housing and improving the infrastructure. The £935 million that they are using to reduce income tax over and above the rates fixed by indexation could have been used for those purposes and would have been a small step in the right direction. The Paymaster General said that not many people work on the construction of sewers. I accept that may be true, but he fails to recognise that the materials used to carry out that work are important. While the work on sewers may be minimal, it would put other people back to work making the materials.

The Paymaster General also said that the Federation of Master Builders was unable to recruit the type of labour that it required. He spoke about general labour, but especially skilled craftsmen. Some employers are unable to recruit the skilled workmen they need because of Government cuts in the last few years. We no longer have the apprentices getting the training that they require, and in a few years that will be a major problem.

Until financial pressures were put upon them, the direct labour organisations of local authorities were the biggest single organisations in the building industry that gave craftsmen training in joinery and plastering and other types of building trades. Direct labour organisations had a tremendous record of training craftsmen and tradesmen. The Paymaster General should not take at face value what the Federation of Master Builders has said. That information should be considered much more closely.

Just two weeks ago in the House of Commons representatives from the Confederation of British Industry in the north-west met Labour Members from the north-west and separately a number of Conservative Members of Parliament. The CBI was quite clear in saying what the priorities in the Budget should be. It said that at least £1 billion should be used to get people back to work. Its representatives did not believe that income tax should be a priority. They were quite clear that, if there were to be cuts in income tax, the adjustment should be to the threshold, not to the basic rate. The Government have failed to take the opportunity to do that and have chosen to reduce the basic rate by one penny at a cost of £935 million in 1986-87 over and above the statutory indexation.

The cut of a penny in income tax is nonsense. The Government should not have moved in that direction. The benefits for the ordinary working person as a result of that cut are minimal, and the money could be better used for house building and repairs. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West, I have people in my constituency who cannot get repair or improvement grants for their houses. Council houses are deteriorating, and there are many problems that this £935 million could have been used to solve. By spending it to solve those problems we could have got people back to work. If we had to have an income tax adjustment over and above indexation—I say "if" because that is not a priority—it should have been an adjustment to the threshold. That would have been of greater benefit to lower paid people.

The right hon. and learned Member for Dover (Mr. Rees) talked about graduated rates and different bands of income tax. Perhaps for the first part of taxable income we should have a lower rate, because that again would benefit lower paid people. However, that is not a priority. Perhaps we could think about it when more money is available because it is nonsense to adjust the basic rate to 29p rather than to have a lower intermediate rate. As a result of the Budget, the public sector borrowing requirement is set at £7 million, or 1·75 per cent. of gross domestic product. Bearing in mind the problems facing us, that figure is ridiculous.

Hon. Members on the Government side have said several times during the debate that the Labour party should lay the cost of its programme before the House. When the Conservative party faced the 1979 and 1983 elections it never said to the electorate that the country would end up with 3 million people out of work or that to control inflation it would cut public expenditure and hit most those who are deprived. Our poorest people are the ones that this Government have hurt most of all. They are the people living in the most deprived areas and they have suffered as a result of this Government's policies.

We will make our plans clear to the country before the next election, but the Conservatives should spell out exactly what they intend to do. I should like them to tell the people what they will do when they have disposed of all our publicly owned assets. British Telecom has already gone, and another of our assets is British Gas. By selling those assets the Government get an income for one year and use it either to benefit the taxpayers or for public expenditure. Once that money has been used, it has gone and cannot be used again.

One could go home this weekend and sell the gas cooker and the fridge and have a good weekend out, but the sale of those things would be regretted the following week. This Government will regret the disposal of our assets. It is not only the asset that goes but the income from it, and that income is lost not just for one year, but for year after year. On British Gas alone we are talking of a present benefit on profit of £1·5 billion each year. The Government will eliminate that asset and put it into private hands.

The Budget dealt with the extension of the pilot scheme for the long-term unemployed. Burnley was one of the enterprise areas. That extension is a welcome move, although the £40 a week the applicants receive is perhaps too small when related to the £1,000 that each applicant has to find. That will be a deterrent to some people entering the scheme. The scheme has certainly had considerable success in Burnley, but it will not solve the problem of unemployment. If the Government believe that it will, they are under an illusion. I believe that that figure should be increased from £40 a week, and that the period should be extended, because many people start to run into difficulties just at the time when the state scheme stops supporting them. The new workers scheme subsidy pays employers £15 a week for all 18 to 19-year-olds if they are paid a wage of up to £55 a week. The Government are again attempting to limit wage levels, and they have often said that low pay is better than no pay. It is significant that the Shops Bill, which is now being considered, contains a clause which removes some of the restrictions. Of course, I accept that the other place has made an important amendment to the Bill. Nevertheless, it is being introduced at the same time as the Wages Bill, which will also remove a lot of protection for the lower paid.

The Government have once again got their policies wrong. They have not faced the issues before us in 1986. They should make more money available to tackle the problems of housing, and the difficulties facing our hospitals as well as all the major problems that exist in areas such as those represented by my hon. Friends and myself. That would put people back to work. That is what the Government should be doing instead of giving handouts to the wealthy.

In 1979, the Conservative Government's first act was to reduce the top tax band from 83p to 60p. That is nonsense. The sands of time are running out for them. They should face the difficulties in Britain in 1986 and get people back to work instead of paying lip service to our problems.

8.11 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The crudity of the Budget analysis given by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) gives me some hope. I am no economist, but even I can probably do better. To my innocent mind, there is a considerable difference between selling my gas cooker, which means that I shall no longer have one, and the Government changing the ownership of the national gas network, which means that we can still enjoy gas.

Anything that I say about this Budget has to be set against a background of considerable admiration for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor for having dealt with a sudden, swingeing loss of £5·5 billion without rocking the stability of the economy. I do not believe that any other Chancellor could lay claim to such an amazing feat, and I admire him very much.

Debates on the Budget always seem to be an opportunity to lay out the ground for the next Budget. I have three points to raise. My first concerns skill shortages. My second concerns the difficult question of the mixture between private gain and public programmes, and my third involves small firms. However, as other hon. Members wish to speak, I shall be as brief as possible.

Skill shortages are already with us in, for example, electro-mechanical engineering, the teaching of maths and physics and in information technology skills. However, I must admit that the expansion of the information technology industry is limited more by a public lack of understanding than by any shortage of people capable of meeting those needs.

Who really cares about such shortages? The Butcher report is a sign that the Government are at least concerned to some degree. It is true that the Manpower Services Commission recently told the Employment Committee that it was doing its best to collect and assimilate information on skill shortages and to provide job training in areas of acute skill shortages, and of course the infant Open Tech is also being nurtured, but those are minor points. Today, I checked who was collecting information, and I was staggered to be told by the Engineering Employers Federation that that was not one of its concerns.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will consider the short-term palliative of greater mobility for skilled workers who cannot put their skills into practice because they cannot find anywhere to live. I realise that that is not the direct concern of the Department of Employment or of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, as it involves housing problems. However, I very much hope that the private rented sector will be re-emphasised, with proper safeguards against Rachman-like landlords. Those who sell their houses for £15,000 or £30,000 in order to move to areas with high employment find that they cannot afford to buy a house, and so return home disenchanted because they cannot take their families with them.

The Select Committee visited Alfred Marks and learnt that the price payable for work processing skills was so far in excess of that payable for simple typewriting skills that it paid Alfred Marks to install a training programme so that temps could learn how to use word processors. Of course, the pay-off time is short, as is the training time, so everyone can see the immediate benefit. Indeed, I am sure that there is no need for the Government to intervene in that area.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Is the hon. Gentleman not amazed that the Government should have introduced a new workers scheme in the Budget which gives such substantial subsidies to employers who employ young people without any strings being attached and without training being necessary? Those young people need not be trained throughout that period of employment.

Mr. Rowe: I am sympathetic to the Government as they are in a tremendous dilemma. If too many strings are attached to the provisions for young workers, employers just will not take them on. But I hope to argue that we should increase the incentive and, to some extent, the strings in order to make people accept responsibility for training. I wonder whether there is scope in some of the more difficult areas of training—where the pay-off is slower or the training is longer—for a tax benefit for upgrading skills. After all, we get tax benefits as individuals for upgrading our houses and for upgrading our pensions, so it is not entirely incongruous to try to work out a system of tax benefits for upgrading our skills, particularly in areas of skill shortages.

Furthermore, the means for much of that provision is at hand. I have spoken on this subject before, but I did not elicit any serious rejoinder. Nevertheless, I shall try again. Many people own home videos and so there is a great opportunity to use them for self improvement. The video tape is an extraordinary instrument, because it is expensive to make but incredibly cheap to copy. Moreover, it can be copied by transmission via the television set, and so can be copied anywhere. The Government should seriously consider establishing some means whereby a copyright-free training video programme could be introduced under the auspices of the Open University—which I know is of interest to the hon. Member for Huddersfield—or under the auspices of the Open Tech. That serious suggestion is worth taking up. It does not really matter whether people pirate those videos at home, but it is not on for teachers to pirate the copyright, and we should try to do something about that.

We need to know where our skills shortages are now and, as far as possible, where they are likely to be in future. That is a difficult but necessary task. We must urgently tackle the problem of those shortages because the upswing in the economy, which we are all confident will arrive, will be strangled by such shortages. We can identify them now and we ought to be dealing with them on a crash basis.

Private gain is a difficult and complex subject. Substitution of private sector jobs by public subsidy jobs is a real danger, especially with the huge programmes being implemented by the Manpower Services Commission. There is, however, scope for more participation — for example, in the community programme—by private employers. At present only 2 per cent. of community programme schemes have private sector participation. I know that the MSC and the CBI are examining that. We must be bold in this matter. If private firms fight shy of inner city sites because of the level of dereliction, why should we abuse the community programme by bringing those sites up to a standard at which they would be attractive enough to the private sector to take them on? We should not be afraid of helping private firms to prosper. Rather we should be afraid that by using public money to subsidise some private firms they are then able to destroy others. That is a difficult balance to strike, but I believe that it is a priority area and I hope that the Government will address themselves to it.

The Budget has been very helpful for small firms. I am delighted at the continuation of the loan guarantee scheme. I played a small part in its introduction. It was proposed in the face of considerable scepticism from the banks and others. It has played a major role in launching small firms and in educating the financial institutions about the importance of the small firms sector.

I welcome the continuation of the business expansion scheme on a permanent basis. However, I am sorry that there has not been a bold move on training for small firms. I still do not understand why the financial institutions, particularly the clearing banks, take so little interest in the training record of their debtors. They value the machinery, the property and the owner's home, but they do nothing to value the quality of the staff, which is the most expensive item.

My suggestions for personal tax relief for individuals could perhaps be paralleled by a tax relief for companies with a good training record. I am tired of financial institutions pleading that it is not their job to play any role in improving the quality of management in the businesses to which they lend money. If it is not their job, whose job is it? They have access to the firms and power over them. For them to say that they do not understand enough about the running of small businesses to help them is a dereliction of duty.

I shall take the Minister close to home. Small firms complain bitterly about their customers' slowness in paying bills. That has a direct effect on their ability to employ staff. I must tell the Government that the Government Departments are often as bad at that as anyone else. If codes of conduct or letters of encouragement do not improve the situation, should we not try penalties?

We have heard about vacant properties and unused land, but I remind the Government that the DOE survey shows that central Government have the largest number of longstanding vacant properties and still own a huge property bank. These matters are under the direct control of the Treasury as the establishment officer for the Civil Service. I hope that my right hon. Friend will do everything to ensure that the Treasury exercises that duty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The winding-up speeches are expected to begin at about 9.20 pm. At least six hon. Members still wish to speak, and I hope that speeches will be brief so that all those hon. Members can make their contributions before the Front Bench speeches begin.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I apologise for having missed the opening speeches, but I was delayed in Committee Room 12 dealing with that paltry, squalid little Bill that the Government introduced, the Wages Bill. It is aimed at those at the bottom of the wages ladder, and is more or less in line with the theme of the Budget proposals.

I shall follow the line adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) who spoke about our region, the northern region, which over the past eight years has suffered because of restructuring, unemployment and, now, the social problems that have been caused by many of the Government's policies. For example, the northern region has lost 230,000 jobs over the past eight years, which is 18 per cent., or almost one in five of employees. Some 34 per cent. of manufacturing jobs have been lost, which totals 146,000 jobs. That means that one in three of the work force employed in the manufacturing industry have lost their jobs. A total of 50 per cent. of construction jobs have been lost, and house building is down by 50 per cent. Public sector house building has been reduced by two thirds and road construction works are being delayed. However, there are thousands of construction workers on the dole. Ours is one of the only regions to have suffered a decline in service employment. In 1984 9,000 fewer people were employed in the service industries in the northern region than in 1977.

The Chancellor could have done something to alleviate the problems in the northern region with the £935 million that he has given in tax concessions. He could have made sure that tourism there was improved. In 1983 the value of tourism in the northern region was £250 million. The Chancellor could have made sure that the regional tourist boards were allocated a significant increase in resources for marketing and development.

Total unemployment in the northern region has moved from 8 per cent. to 19 per cent. Male unemployment rose from 10 per cent. to 23 per cent., and the percentage of long-term unemployed has doubled. Of that long-term unemployed in the northern region, 29 per cent. are youngsters under 25 years of age. In my constituency 43·1 per cent. of the unemployed have been out of work for more than a year. Those 3,585 men and women have experienced the humiliation and despair of repeatedly being rejected for a place among the work force. There are 40-year-olds in my constituency who can see no future as they will be unable to get another job during their working lifetimes. That is the situation in the northern region and in my constituency, yet very little, if anything, has been done for them in the Budget. The Chancellor could have done so much with the £935 million to assist regions and constituencies such as mine instead of knocking a penny off the basic rate of income tax.

The worst unemployment black spots are in the northern region. The five worst in England — South Tyneside, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Bishop Auckland and Sunderland — are in the northern region. South Tyneside is the worst unemployment black spot in Great Britain. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and I have repeatedly asked the Minister to redesignate South Tyneside, because of the high unemployment and the social problems, from a programmed authority to a partnership authority, but to no avail. There has been a 57 per cent. reduction in real terms in Government regional assistance to industry in the northern region, and average household incomes are the lowest in the United Kingdom.

The Budget has done nothing to help people in the northern region if one considers what the Chancellor has given in tax concessions. A married couple with a total income of £4,000 will be 67p a week better off, yet those with an income of £50,000 a year will be £8·79 a week better off. The Chancellor has made matters worse through his Budget.

The north-south divide is increasing every month under this Government. There are 23 redundancies per thousand in the northern region, whereas in the south-east there are only five for every thousand. In the south-east the unemployment rates in 1985 were 10 per cent., and in the northern region they were nearly double that at 19 per cent. The percentage of those who became unemployed between April and July was 6·5 per cent. for the northern region and in the south-east 3·9 per cent. The change in average weekly household incomes compared with the United Kingdom average between 1977 and 1985 was plus 4 per cent. for the south-east and minus 8 per cent. for the northern region.

Between 1976-77 and 1983-84 school-leavers going on to full-time education in the south-east rose by an average of 6 per cent,. and in the northern region fell by 29 per cent. Under this Government we have two nations. We have the north-south divide, which was so forcefully described by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West.

Local authorities in the northern region which try to help to generate employment, even working with the private sector, are being severely hampered by the penal effects of the Government's block grant system.

In view of the huge restructuring that is taking place in the northern region, it is imperative that the remaining key industries such as steel, coal, shipbuilding, heavy engineering and machine tool manufacturing should be protected by the Government. It is nonsense that a shipyard worker should be put on the dole at a cost to the Treasury of £6,000 per annum when he could be kept in work building ships that are required. In that industry we are being outmanoeuvred by countries that subsidise their shipbuilding industries.

The Chancellor could have provided support for small firms in our region. Support is being restricted by the 40 per cent. EC limit on public sector support. In our area 30 per cent. of the work force is employed in small firms, as against 47 per cent. in the south-east.

The North of England County Councils Association has a conference tomorrow to announce its regional policy — the state-of-the-region report. The association has, since 1979, repeatedly asked the Government to do something for our region. We need a Minister of Cabinet rank to express the needs of the English assisted regions.

[Mr. Don Dixon]

Why should the Scottish and the Welsh have a Secretary of State with Cabinet rank when the English regions have not? Why should we not have a Minister in the Cabinet to speak up for regional development and support?

There should be increased resources for infrastructure and support for the EC programmes, not as a substitute for them. There should be increased funding for new technology, telecommunications and research and development projects. There should be greater recognition of the region's needs in regional industrial policy. There should be special employment measures and support for training.

We lost the Killingworth skillcentre. The hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) talked about training. There is now no skillcentre between the Tyne and Edinburgh because of the Government's decision to close the Killingworth skillcentre. The dispersal of Government officers and research establishments to the region would assist the area. All those measures have been asked for over the years, but little has been done.

The Government should recognise the value of local authorities. Tyne and Wear, an effective job creation authority, has been abolished by the Government. Other local authorities are hampered by the block grant restrictions. There should be increased spending on housing and health facilities. The Black report pointed out that South Tyneside district council, in my constituency, was one of the 10 worst in the country, yet we are being starved of resources.

The housing investment programme allocation for South Tyneside this year is £6·5 million. To maintain the real value of 1979 it would have to be £27 million. Yet the local authority has £6·5 million to deal with all of its housing problems. Asbestos has been found in a block of flats for which the council has a modernisation programme which is due to be carried out next year. Because of the restriction on the money available for housing, the local authority cannot bring that programme forward to coincide with the work that has to be done to remove the asbestos.

The Chancellor and the Government could have done many things to help our region. It requires support more than any other region because of its particular problems, most of which are the result of the Government's policies. The other night during a debate on the EC, I suggested that the northern region should be treated as a priority area, because our social and unemployment problems are as bad as those in Northern Ireland, the only priority area in the United Kingdom. The Chancellor should have taken that into account in the Budget.

The Select Committee on Employment produced a good report on long-term unemployment. It put forward positive suggestions to help the 750,000 people who have lost hope and the will to work because they have been unemployed for so long. Yet that report has been ignored. Indeed, the Paymaster General tried to rubbish it before it was even officially published.

The Government could do many things rather than taking a penny off the standard rate of income tax in order to help the people in our area who are unemployed and deprived, which the Government apparently think nothing about.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I hope that the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) will forgive me if I do not pursue his line of thinking about the northern region. It is not because I do not understand and sympathise with the unemployment problems in the north-east. My constituency in Northamptonshire is, comparatively, much more fortunate with an unemployment rate of only 9 per cent.

I want to concentrate my remarks on the taxation of savings and investment. I appreciate that for a person who has no job talk of the reform of taxation of savings and investment is not directly relevant. Nevertheless, I want to follow the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Gardiner) in commenting briefly tonight on the Budget's provisions for savings and investments.

I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General will pursue with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer the idea of discussions with industry on the introduction of profit-sharing schemes. That is crucial and could be important for employment prospects. I say that as a former employer. If we had the taxation incentive whereby part of the overall remuneration came in the way of a profit-sharing arrangement with the firm—a bonus pact—I am sure that an employer would be more flexible in taking on additional staff when times were better because the employer would not be building in the high fixed costs that can often follow if one has to pay comparatively high rates of standard pay plus overtime. I welcome that initiative. One route that my right hon. Friend might pursue is to limit the national insurance contributions for the employer and the employee to the basic salary, leaving some concession for the national insurance contribution on the profit share or bonus payment.

I welcome the Budget as being another step in the right direction towards share ownership. By that I mean not only the broader spread of the ownership of assets in Britain but the direct control of those assets by individuals rather than through institutions.

The privatisation of British Telecom was a marvellous opportunity, which has been fulfilled, in the spread of ownership of shares. I hope that some of the reforms—two in particular—will encourage that process even further. I welcome the reduction in stamp duty from 1 per cent. to 0·5 per cent. Next year, I hope that the Chancellor will abolish it. It is a tax on savings, investment and trading. I do not believe that it should have a permanent place in the Chancellor's armoury of taxation. Many investors—now, fortunately, without exchange control—can make investments in other markets and in other exchanges where there is no stamp duty.

I welcome the personal equity plan, although I agree with the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate that, instead of allowing a husband and wife a concession of £4,800 a year of investment in a personal equity plan and the capital gains and dividends income rolling out tax-free, a more modest concession of £500 of investment, could be made out of pre-tax income similar to the Loi Monory. That would have a more direct beneficial effect on the spread of share ownership. Nevertheless, the proposals in the Budget are welcome.

I notice from the Red Book, when trying to calculate what the officials have estimated the take-up rate will be in the fiscal year 1987-88, that the constant of the scheme is shown at £25 million for the full tax year. I have calculated, making modest assumptions about dividend yield and rates of taxation on the individuals who take part, that it is equivalent to £1 billion worth of equity investment. That could account for perhaps 500,000 new shareholders with a concession of say £2,000 worth of investment per annum. They are large numbers and I hope the plan is successful.

We are in the grey period between the Budget debate and the Finance Bill. I hope that we will have the First Reading of the Finance Bill as soon as possible to enable not only the House but those interested outside to make their comments in good time for the Second Reading and Committee. I ask the Minister to consider seriously, if we are to encourage the monthly deduction from the payroll of payments into personal equity plans, tax relief on interest earned on amounts deposited until they are invested. Otherwise it could be a disincentive. A sum of £200, £100 or £50 a month will take some time to build up before a sensible share purchase can be made. Perhaps we have many constituents who applied for the 800 allotment of British Telecom shares. That is £2,000. It therefore will take time for the individual to build up his cash reserves in a personal equity plan before he can make a sensible direct equity investment. Otherwise the expense of buying shares in smaller tranches could be prohibitive.

When the Minister is drafting the Finance Bill, will he please ensure that no relief is given if the individual makes his investment through a unit trust or institution? The relief should be for individuals who invest directly in equity shares. That is what we want to encourage, and not investment through institutions.

The business expansion scheme relates to the flow of savings and investment. I have taken some time to study the voluminous report from Peat Marwick. It is an excellent report and it gives justification for the Chancellor to proceed to extend the business expansion scheme indefinitely. The report shows that there has been incremental equity investment and it justifies the scheme and its relatively generous tax concessions.

I feel strongly that we have not made enough progress with the encouragement of what I call local syndicates on a county, town or metropolitan basis. The syndicates would encourage local investors to claim tax relief and invest in local business. Local investors often know which local businesses are likely to thrive. I would like to see some guidance either from the Department of Trade and Industry or the Treasury to local enterprise agencies. About 200 have already been set up in the country, including one in my own constituency. There should be some guidance to those agencies on the practical steps that should be taken to set up local syndicates.

The Chancellor encouraged industry to invest more in research and development. I was pleased to see that in the Finance Act 1985 there were concessions to encourage business expansion schemes to invest in research and development projects. I think we should go further. There is no magic in the £40,000 worth of relief but perhaps the business expansion schemes could invest that sum in research and development projects. The money should be directed into high technology and high-risk projects. The Government might consider lifting the ceiling of £40,000 to encourage more money to flow into research and development.

I welcome the Budget. I think that it is imaginative, and I think it will promote what the Chancellor called the enterprise culture. It is good for jobs but it is especially good for wider share ownership.

8.46 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I cannot echo the praise of the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) for the Budget. He obviously does not represent a constituency like mine in south Wales. If he did, he would not be talking about his constituents looking for shares in British Telecom. Most of my constituents are looking for sufficient money to exist on. The reason for that is the massive unemployment which has been created in the past seven years of Tory government.

I am sympathetic to my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon). I enjoyed his speech very much. I should not like him to assume that perhaps by having a Secretary of State for the northern region, as we have a Secretary of State for Wales, his region would benefit. In fact, he would find, as we have done with the Welsh Development Agency and the Secretary of State for Wales, that the region was worse off.

In 1979, the unemployment percentage for the whole of the Port Talbot travel-to-work area was 3·7 per cent. It is now 20 per cent. In one area of my constituency, Maesteg, male unemployment is 40 per cent. How has this come about since 1979? We have had demanning at Margam steelworks near Maesteg and there has been the closure of a number of collieries. In 1980 the Caerau colliery was closed, and in 1981 the Coegnant colliery was closed. Since the miners strike, St. John's colliery in Llynfi valley has closed. That is only one of the four valleys that comprise my constituency. Since the end of the miners strike, in Garw valley the Garw-Fylaldu colliery has closed. In the Ogmore valley we have had the closure of the Wyndham Western colliery. In recent weeks the last link of the Ogmore constituency with the mining industry has been severed with the closure of the Coed-Ely colliery. Since the end of the miners strike, we have lost 1,500 jobs, together with all the supportive industry jobs which were lost in conjunction with those closures.

All this has combined with the closure of factories on the Bridgend estate, together with bankruptcies and other matters which have caused businesses to close. To this is added the cut in revenue for local authorities and the compelled reductions in services such as social services. In the Ogmore area there are still 2,500 people waiting for housing. We are looking for sheltered accommodation for the elderly. All those services have been drastically reduced because of the Government's financial policies.

Hospital services in the whole of Mid Glamorgan have been severely cut. I understand that there is an abundance of doctors, qualified nurses and experienced personnel in a variety of supportive roles who are all out of work. They are all seeking employment but no jobs are available for them; yet the Mid Glamorgan health authority has announced that it is 1,000 nurses short in the area. The social work and essential services necessary for the old, disabled and disadvantaged have all been abandoned to the whim of the grocer's daughter.

Where is there in the Budget any compassion or sign of caring for people? What action is included to reduce the unacceptable figure of 3·5 million unemployed to a level that we would assume was reasonable — back to the 1979 figure in the Ogmore constituency and the travel-to-work area of the Ogwr borough and Port Talbot? What a blessing it would be for the 8,000 people in my area who are out of work if we could return to the 1979 figure.

[Mr. Ray Powell]

Nevertheless, I welcome the extension of aid, limited though it is, to the MSC's community programme schemes. Even the increase in the average wage from £65 to £67—a meagre £2 increase—is acceptable. It will help some of the administrators to extend slightly the scope of the schemes. A much more realistic figure would have been £80.

Of course, I welcome the measure as chairman of one of these successful schemes called community and training in Ogwr. It provides for about 450 places this year and the number is steadily increasing. I have some knowledge of the people applying for jobs especially in the construction industry, because I have interviewed bricklayers, floorlayers, plasterers, painters, plumbers, electricians, architects, buyers, and planners — every conceivable professional or technical person required to build what we need in the construction industry. I have interviewed them. There are thousands of such people in my area alone seeking employment.

We need to meet the demand. My right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor and deputy Leader of the Opposition —the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) — spelt out in detail only yesterday what Labour will do when we form the next Government. It is a matter of priorities. Everyone knows what they should be, but getting the country back to work is more important than anything else. We should be exploiting every sinew of Government responsibility to solve this appalling social curse. We should be rejecting the massive unemployment in the United Kingdom. Hon. Members on both sides of the House should recognise and appreciate the social upheavals it is causing. Young men in the prime of life are thrown out of work, without hope and without a future for themselves, their children, their grandchildren or even future generations.

Since the miners' strike, the coalfield communities campaign has been set up nationally. A Welsh section has been formed to bring organisations together to help the coalfield communities. My constituency desperately needs the assistance of the coalfield communities campaign and of the Government. The coalfield communities campaign has said that in Wales it is vitally concerned with those communities in the Principality which have lost the pits which provided basic resources and the basic source of employment. The campaign stated:

"Throughout this period of economic change . . . one fact remains constant, while the miners themselves may have received some financial consolation for their redundancy, the stranded Community gets no help at all.

The Coalfield Communities in Wales have severe economic problems that are long standing and require investment over a number of years . . . it is in co-operation . . . between the Private and Public sectors that a policy and a programme should be provided for the economic, social and physical retention and regeneration of our Coalfield Communities."

The campaign stated that the Government should "provide action on a massive scale involving major spending in the fields of communication, house building and environmental improvements."

It referred to

"long-standing difficulties of securing sufficient jobs for displaced coal-miners and their dependants within the constrained Valley areas and the traditionally high levels of unemployment which . . . we have suffered and which are factors peculiar to the coalfield areas by comparison with the urban areas of England and Scotland."

The campaign continued:

"the securing of alternative employment opportunities was beset with difficulties. The most serious result being, in my view, the loss of post-school training opportunities for youngsters. Traditional apprenticeships have disappeared and youngsters are not being recruited into employment in any great numbers."

There are already 21 authorities in Wales participating in the Welsh campaign — 16 district councils and five county councils—which together represent more than 2 million people.

The Welsh coalfield communities campaign made its main point to the Welsh group of the parliamentary Labour party. One councillor stated:

"Our coalfield communities face very serious problems which are particularly severe if you compare us with the rest of Britain.

I am most familiar with my own County and what I have to say is specifically about Mid Glamorgan . . . it is one of the most deprived counties in Britain, but you will see much the same difficulties in all Welsh coalfield communities.

Our unemployment problems are severe. Almost one person in every five of our workforce claimed unemployment benefit in January. We believe the true rate of unemployment is probably more like one in four—rising well above that in some parts of the County. We are among the 6 worst counties in Britain.

Our communities are plagued with ill-health. Death rates are the second highest in Britain and more people are permanently sick than anywhere else in the country. As a result more prescriptions are issued to each person than in any other Welsh county.

Our housing is amongst the worst in Britain, with more houses without inside toilets than anywhere else . . . .

The environment our people live and work in is still badly scarred by over two centuries of mining and other industrial activities. Public infrastructure like schools and roads is old and desperately needs replacing or improving.

All those problems are most severe in the mining communities in the valleys and are closely associated with the way the industry has developed and exploited the area.

Putting matters right is enormously expensive and a programme of capital spending in Mid Glamorgan has recently been submitted to the European Regional Development Fund. It is limited to eligible projects on which we might hope to get a capital allocation from Central Government. Even so, it amounts to £77 million over four years.

Mid Glamorgan's ability to commit resources to help overcome its difficulties is severely limited by the present Government's expenditure controls and by its own extremely weak rate base. We have the lowest rateable values in Britain.

Government policies seem to us to favour the prosperous South and South East of England and, when they occasionally focus on poorer areas, it always seems to be the big cities that benefit. Well, we have a big city population in our valleys and our needs are every bit as great. Our potential to contribute to the nation's prosperity, given the right help, is probably greater."

I could go on at some length on the problems which beset Mid Glamorgan and my constituency of Ogmore. I ask the Government to consider nine points which I should like to put to them. They are:

"Recognition by Government of the special needs of the Coalfield Communities of Britain.

Designation of Coalfield Community Action Zones as a means of focussing new policies and giving higher rates of Regional Grant and other support.

An additional investment programme to improve the environment and modernise the public infrastructure in Coalfield Community Action Zones.

A specific additional grant to Welsh Development Agency earmarked for land reclamation and major environmental schemes in the Welsh Coalfield Community Action Zones.

An allocation of additional resources through RSG and capital allocations to the local authorities of the Coalfield Community Action Zones in Wales . . .

A recognition by NCB and the Government that the scale of the problem is not reflected in the scale and scope of the funding and activities of NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. We would particularly like to see NCB (Enterprise) given more support in the form of grants, providing venture capital for new start ups and widening its support towards training beyond ex-miners.

A three year moratorium on colliery closures in Wales and a commitment to invest in a new colliery at Margam.

A far more effective marketing of Welsh coal by NCB, reflecting its special qualities, and an extension of the Government's coal firing scheme to the public sector.

A complete revision of the EEC's coal policies on the lines of the recommendations by the Labour Group of members of the European Parliament."

The Budget has not even considered further prospects of employment within the area to which I have referred. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) mentioned the slogan of the Budget of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) some years ago, "Steady as she goes". My hon. Friend said on Tuesday that this Budget could be given the slogan "Steady as she sinks".

9.3 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): There are many excellent features in the Budget and I should like to give a personal welcome to the reconsideration of the tax position of occupational pension funds. I hope that I am right in expecting that this will at last prove a decisive move in the direction of full transferability of all accrued pension rights.

I want briefly to express some concern about the general Budget strategy. I am worried about its impact on the serious development in this country — the reappearance of the division of the nation into haves and have-nots. I think that there are two aspects of that problem which we can discern in the Budget. First, there is what I would call the cult of the equity, which we see in the otherwise excellent plan for the PEP. I wonder why it is necessary to confine that project to investment in equities only. I think that the decision should be reconsidered, because it seems to be against a discernible trend in the direction of management buy-outs, worker participation, employee shareholdings and the generally increased perception of the advantages of allowing workers to receive a larger share of their remuneration through the performance of the business rather than their wages. Other classes of share such as convertible debentures, value added loan stocks, dynamised debentures, participating preferences and perhaps other experimental forms of investor participation ought to be encouraged as well. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will consider this point.

I should like to see what on the continent is known as the historic compromise: a closer relationship between workers and investors and a greater recognition of their absolute identity of interest. I have said in the House before—I think that I shocked people when I said it, but I shall repeat it now—that we are moving towards a time when workers will give up their right to strike and investors will give up their claim to an equity dividend. This may lie some way ahead, but we should prepare for moves towards greater harmony and better relations between investors and workers. The "two sides in industry" concept ought not to be allowed to continue. Marx may have had a point when he said but of course a fair return belongs to the investors, too. Otherwise there will be no profits and, sooner or later, no workers either.

"The profit belongs to the workers"

However that may be, I think that the historic compromise in the creation of wealth and the end of the game of "Normans and Saxons" should be a particular mission of the Conservative party. I hope, therefore, that the PEP scheme, which I believe is destined to have a very great success, should be extended to other classes of share besides equities.

I should like to say a few words about the increasing division between those in work and those in need in our society. We now have 8 million people on supplementary benefit. That is a very large number and, unfortunately, it seems to me that as a result of the reforms of the rating system which the Government have in mind — and which I fully support—and also as a result of the impact of the Social Security Bill which is now in Standing Committee, it is likely to rise. If it is implemented as it stands, with the emphasis so strongly on needs-related benefit and, unfortunately, inadequate provision for contribution-related benefits and neglect of the scope for benefits founded on citizenship as of right, I am afraid that the division between those in work and those in need in Britain will become even more marked. Every civilised community has to strike a balance between unity and freedom: the unity of the community and the freedom of the individual. That is what politics is all about.

In a modern society where our mutual relationships are so widely expressed in terms of cash, the Budget is an important indicator, a determinant of the balance between the scope which our economy provides for the pursuit of selfish aims—making our own choices—and the power of the various systems and social institutions by which we bear one another's burdens. I am not convinced that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is wise to commit himself to a reduction in the rate of income tax to 25p in the pound and to move in that direction this year by a reduction of 1p in the pound in the taxation of income. I should have preferred that the resources he has chosen to deny to the Departments should have been dispersed in a less random fashion and in a way that would have promoted the unity of the nation rather than its division.

Lastly, I would like to refer to the Chancellor's Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation. It adds to my sense of uneasiness. In 1974 the Conservative party committed itself to the tax credit scheme, though not entirely in the form that I personally would have chosen, and the commitment was repeated in 1979 in the first general election manifesto that emanated from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. But the Green Paper is plainly intended to kill the idea of tax credits stone dead. I am currently serving on the Standing Committee on the Social Security Bill, and as we progress through its clauses I become more and more deeply convinced that the stone that the builder is seeking to reject in 1986 — the concept of a tax credit scheme, or what I call the BIG idea, the basic income guarantee — will, before very long, become the head of the corner in our system for the redistribution of income.

9.4 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): First, I must apologise for not having been in the Chamber for very long. I have been in Standing Committee all day on the Social Security Bill. However, I want to make a small contribution to the debate. I heard the Paymaster General's speech this afternoon. He is a Member of Parliament for an east midlands constituency, which is just down the road from mine. His contribution in Government has been to cut and cut again. He supported similar policies as Minister for Health when we were trying to formulate a policy for a district general hospital. The project got off the ground, but then he imposed cuts and delayed the programme for two years, and jobs went in the process.

Now we have another Budget. The Chancellor suggested that the 7·5p increase in the price of petrol should be absorbed by the petrol companies. They have already given him their answer—they are not prepared to do it. The result is that the increase is to be added to the price. As everybody realises, an increase in the price of petrol means an increase in the prices of commodities which have to be transported, and that will no doubt be reflected in the prices of commodities in the shops. At the weekend I go shopping with my wife fairly regularly, and I notice that prices continue increasing, and never decrease. Nor will they decrease in spite of the reduction in the price of oil, because that cut is not being passed on to the consumer as it should be. The big oil companies are raking off massive profits, yet the Chancellor is prepared to let that continue and not to do a great deal about it.

The Chancellor has missed a real opportunity to reduce unemployment. Every constituency suffers from unemployment, some more than others. There has been a dramatic increase in unemployment in my constituency since 1979, and it continues to rise. I remember in 1979 when the Chancellor of the day gave a massive reduction in income tax to the rich. The Prime Minister, when questioned at the first Prime Minister's questions after that reduction, said that all the money that was being given back would be invested in industry so that industry would expand and jobs would be created, but it has gone the other way. When the restrictions were removed, money flowed out of the country to places where the pickings were richer than in the United Kingdom. The result was massive unemployment, and the level of unemployment continues to rise and cause misery in our constituencies.

Many changes are taking place as a result of the Government's policies. In Committee on the Social Security Bill, the Government have said that they want child benefit paid into the man's pay pocket. That is scandalous. That money belongs to the person who looks after the child, and in the main that is the mother. When the Labour party was in power, it made sure that the mother received the child benefit. Now, however, the system is being reversed. It will be put into the man's pay packet, and many women will be denied that money in future. We all know what happens, and that is why the Labour party when in office changed the rules.

I recall the comment of the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton)—I am glad that he has come back into the Chamber—about ensuring that business has proper training programmes. I think that the hon. Member has a nerve. His party has been in office for almost seven years, and has not done a great deal about training except that the Government got frit, they realised that people were not very pleased with what they were doing and they rushed into a youth opportunity programme that was cheap labour, using youngsters on adult jobs. The £25 paid by the Government was the only money that those youngsters got for the work they did. The Government brought in other schemes but they only provide cheap labour. We want a proper training programme. The Government are late in bringing forward proposals. The people have got the message on unemployment. The training that would enable people to be ready for jobs when the economy improved has not been provided for.

The Government have done a wicked job on education. They talk about skill training and places in universities. Now, by cutting student grants, they are making parents pay. The people who can least afford it have to pay for their children to go to university. Is it any wonder that we get massive lobbies of parents and students to tell us what they feel about Government policy on education?

I have no good words for the Budget. It will not help many of my constituents in Ashfield in Nottinghamshire. When I go home this weekend, my constituents will give me the message at my surgery that they do not accept the Budget either.

9.16 pm

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): It is the mark of a creative Chancellor that against a background of having lost enormous income which he might have expected from tax revenues, and finding himself with very little room for manoeuvre, he has nonetheless managed to spread good cheer throughout the country, other than on the Opposition Benches, and he has managed to lead the country in constructive directions.

This is a Budget for enterprise and responsibility. We should note first, however, that his macro-economic strategy has been overwhelmingly endorsed by the markets. Before we have voted on the Budget the markets have given an enormous vote of approval to the Chancellor's measures and strategy. That is because he has been prudent in his overall fiscal policy. Against the background of the erratic behaviour of sterling M3, the situation has been particularly difficult. Therefore, the Chancellor has been right to take the cautious path on the public sector borrowing requirement. He has been vindicated by the response of the market, by the fall in interest rates, and by the resilience and positive strength of the pound.

The Labour party proposes to spend £24 billion additionally. Heaven knows what would happen to interest rates and to sterling if that seemed a credible and realistic prospect. I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth). The alliance, too, proposes to spend more. I was puzzled by some public statement by alliance spokesmen recently, when they said that, unfortunately, because of falling oil prices, they could no longer create so many new jobs through their proposed budget. They seemed to suppose that it is politicians and not businesses who create jobs.

The fall in oil prices has been a massive benefit to the economy overall. There has been a tremendous drop in the input costs of business. Along with that we have seen a fall in the pound and, because of the background of good financial management, interest rates have come down. So we must congratulate the Government on having ensured that the economy is in such good shape that it is able to take the greatest advantage of the new circumstances, which could have been very difficult to cope with.

Not only has the falling oil price reduced industrial costs, but the Government have been able to reduce the overall tax burden.

It is a Budget for enterprise. The introduction of the personal equity plan is an exciting prospect. Because mortgage interest rates are coming down people will have more money to put into the new investment opportunity. We must be wary and ensure that the plans do not involve excessive administrative costs. We must also be careful about encouraging investors to put more than they can afford into individual stocks. I certainly wish the scheme well although, with time, it may need development and refinement. It is very much a move in the right direction, as is the Government's intention to explore the possibility of profit sharing, which would do so much to end the adversarial style of industrial relations, which has been so dismally characteristic in our national life, and which seems to be the sole, backward looking, stale vision of the Opposition.

This is a Budget for responsibility, and I welcome the initiatives taken to promote charitable giving. That will be of benefit in not only releasing a whole range of resources and energies complementary to the statutory and bureaucratic welfare system, but could be immensely beneficial to training in encouraging firms to give direct charity funding.

With the vote of confidence that the markets have given, with lower taxes, with the incentive to enterprise and responsibility that the Chancellor's Budget has allowed us, Britain faces an encouraging future and significantly improved prospects for employment.

9.21 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) said that this is a creative Budget that has been welcomed by the City. We need not a creative Chancellor for the City, but an effective Chancellor for the unemployed.

This is a Budget designed not for the regeneration of Britain, but for the regeneration of the Conservative party. On neither count will it succeed. Whereas the latter is a problem for Conservative Members, the former is a problem for the whole country. From tax cuts which benefit the wealthiest to an assortment of schemes whose principal feature is their utter insignificance to this country's problems, this is a Budget that does not address our difficulties, but ignores them. It will chiefly be remembered as the Budget which expresses the Government's final word on the unemployed—"You are on your own". This Government no longer see their responsibility in an economic sense, for the unemployed, but see unemployment as simply a social or human problem. I am not sure whether the Paymaster General was disclaiming or avowing the Tory Reform Group proposals earlier. When we look at what it says, we can see that there is a considerable consensus of opinion, not merely on this side of the House, but crossing the House, that it is a central role of Government — and not just the free market—to address the problems of unemployment. The real argument between this Government and so much of the country is that we see the role of Government as central to curing unemployment, whereas the Government see their role as incidental. The unemployed will get a lot of caring, but very little capital.

Last year's Budget was said to be a Budget for jobs, and unemployment rose. This year, not even the pretence has remained. It may be true that one cannot measure priorities simply by the amount of money spent, but it is some guide to priorities. When we consider that the net cost of the Government's employment measures is one-tenth of the give away in tax handouts, that shows us the measure of priority that this Government has towards the unemployed. We should strip away the rhetoric and get down to reality when we examine all the Government schemes.

We heard many comments from Conservative Members about the personal equity plan. The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) welcomed the plan without qualification; a position which is inconsistent with the position taken by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who said that the plan amounts more or less to a con trick. Perhaps that is not unusual with the alliance. Let us examine the reality of this personal equity plan against the claims that are made for it in the Budget.

It is claimed that the personal equity plan will extend share ownership, and it will give first-time shareholders, the ordinary man in the street, the right to invest in shares so that they will benefit from the scheme. Further, it is said that it is to be seen in the same light as council house sales, so that the person who bought his council house will now invest money in shares.

Let us examine for a moment who will benefit under this personal equity plan. First of all, let us blow away some of the puff that has surrounded the plan. The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) and others might be forgiven, if they simply read the popular press, for thinking that the personal equity plan gives some sort of tax break when entering the plan, so that the money put into the plan would be taken out of pre-tax income. However, it is only to money out of taxed income that the plan applies, and if one wants to get the full benefit of the plan, one will have to have £200 a month out of one's taxed income lying spare. I do not know how many Conservative Members have constituents in that position, but Labour Members have few.

Secondly, tax incentives are given first on capital gains tax, and secondly on dividends. The capital gains incentive should be seen in the context that the maximum that can be put in to the personal equity plan is £2,400 a year. It will take years for any one putting in even £2,400 a year in a personal equity plan to yield capital gains on the sale of those shares, which will require relief up to the capital gains maximum of £6,300 a year. It will take several years, even if a person is putting in the full £2,400 a year, before he gets to the stage at which there is a benefit on capital gains tax.

The tax relief given on dividends is a relief only on dividend income that is put back in to buy further shares. Let us take a basic rate taxpayer, remembering that this plan has been sold as the ordinary man in the street's ability to buy shares. Supposing he puts in £2,400 in the first year. If we take the Government's figures, his dividend will be £120 to £150 a year. He will be paying about £40 a year in income tax on that. He can then reinvest that £40. The sole benefit that he gets out of his £2,400 is the right to buy an extra £40 worth of shares and put them back into the plan. Out of that, he has to pay the scheme manager's charges.

I suggest that for the average basic rate taxpayer or man in the street, the gains from this scheme, except over a very long time, will be virtually negligible, but they are not the people who will use this scheme, because the important thing to remember about it is that it is available to existing shareholders. They will put money into the scheme and every broker handling any substantial portfolio will be shoving money into the scheme because it is a tax-free shelter. For example, when the amount of their other investments means that they may be liable for capital gains tax, this is a way to ensure that they minimise that tax liability. The money can be put into the tax-free shelter and kept there, giving capital gains benefits while retaining the full amount of the £6,300 limit each year on capital gains tax on other investments.

The top rate taxpayer who puts money into the scheme when he gets his rebate on the dividends that he uses to reinvest in shares will be getting double what the basic rate taxpayer is getting. If that is taken in conjunction with the changes in capital transfer tax, which means that lifetime gifts are no longer taxable, that person could give money to his wife, children and family and put it into the tax free scheme. Considerable sums of money will be put into the tax free shelters, not by first time buyers or the man in the street, but by holders of already substantial holdings and those on the top rate incomes.

I do not mind schemes for wider share ownership being put forward by the Government. What I do mind is their being presented as schemes for the ordinary man in the street when they are nothing of the sort. It is not people's capitalism; it is top people's capitalism.

Mr. Freeman: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he would scrap the scheme or extend it?

Mr. Blair: I will be even more generous with the hon. Gentleman. Why, if this is a scheme for first-time buyers, is it not restricted to first-time buyers of shares? The answer is that those who will benefit are those with substantial holdings.

That kind of sleight of hand—and it is sleight of hand—governed the Chancellor's remarks, particularly about the effect of the decline in oil revenues upon our economy. He said that if we could survive the loss of half our oil revenues in 25 weeks, this should make us feel perfectly complacent about the loss of the other half over 25 years. There were great trumpetings of "Hear, hear" from the Government Benches when he made that remark. Indeed, the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), in an otherwise good and interesting speech, seemed to suggest that the Chancellor was absolutely justified in making that statement.

In fact, as the Chancellor well knows—and I hope that the Economic Secretary will answer this point in winding up—when he says that we have easily survived the loss of half our oil revenues and why should we not continue to show concern and then pours scorn on the report from another place he is deliberately eliding two things. The first is a drop in world oil prices, which may deplete our revenues but also gives a major supply-side boost to the economy and has all sorts of good counter-inflationary effects of boosting growth, and so on—in other words, as he said, has pluses and minuses. That is one thing. It is quite another thing to have a drop in British oil production, which is a minus for Britain because it is losing it the export earnings from oil, but has no plus because it has an immediate adverse consequence on our balance of payments. That is why the remarks made in the report from another place hold good. The Chancellor, as he well knows, was making a wholly false point.

The testing time for our balance of payments is not very far away. If hon. Members really think that the Government are looking at the long term rather than the short term, they should look at where the figures on our balance of payments are leading us. The figures show that even in the first half of 1987 the current account surplus will be down from an annual rate of some £3·5 billion to an annual rate closer to £1·5 billion.

If we look at page 27 of the Red Book, for example, we see that in fact the significant forecast is that growth in imports of manufactures in 1986 will be over 7 per cent., twice as fast as domestic demand growth. That is the problem that we are going to be facing, and facing soon.

The same type of nonsense—and it really is nonsense—is demonstrated when we discuss the general pattern of the British economy. We have had it again today—how rosy the British economy is and the Paymaster General saying that there is really nothing that we should worry about. But if we look at the Government's record we see a rather different picture.

I shall not go over the figures again—I have done that several times in debates such as this—but the truth of the matter is that whenever the Government talk about how the economy is doing they talk as if they came to power in 1981. They forget that they were in power from 1979 to 1981, when the industrial base of our economy suffered extraordinary damage very largely as a result of Government policy. We must start from the base of 1979 to show the sort of growth trends over the past four or five years. This is shown by the fact that manufacturing output is barely at 1979 levels and manufacturing investment is still way down.

It is that refusal even to acknowledge that there is a problem that is so wilful about the way in which the Government set out on their economic policy. It would be easier if we could acknowledge what the problem was and simply debate the remedies. The difficulty with the Government is that one must spend considerable time persuading them that there is a problem in the British economy.

If our oil revenues had increased, that would have added a further dimension to the parody of reality which is the Government's economic thinking. If we had had those oil revenues, the Government would have used them for tax cuts. The Budget that we did not have is every bit as bad as the Budget that we had. The Government's priority would have been for tax cuts. With 4 million unemployed, growing poverty, crumbling housing and infrastructure, and the desperate position in our inner cities, how can any reasonable person think that the priority is to cut taxes? Yet that is the priority at the heart of Government policy.

We know how next year's tax cuts will be paid. We know that the Government will give us tax cuts, and why. They will give us tax cuts in advance of the general election. That will be the bonanza—the pre-election spree. How will they finance them without oil revenues? They will probably flog off British Gas at an undervalue. So the £4·75 billion from that will pay for £4·75 billion worth of tax cuts. It is impossible to think of a more irresponsible way of running the nation's economy.

It is interesting that everything is geared up to the short term. The only principle that governs Government policy is the principle of expediency. It has been elevated to become the Government's sole principle. When one considers manufacturing industry and selling assets, it is illuminating to consider the Government's remedies when those problems finally catch up with us. One of the most important points in the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Overseas Trade was the Treasury's view about what should happen when North sea oil production declines. The Treasury believes that there should be an adjustment in the exchange rate. In other words, the exchange rate should be allowed to fall. That is the very thing that the Government have been refusing to allow to happen throughout last year, keeping interest rates high because of the inflationary impact. Yet that is what the Government advocate when the decline in North sea oil production catches up with them. In exactly the same way, when asset sales decline, the Government advocate an increase in borrowing. Yet at present they tell us that that would be irresponsible. We in the Labour party do not believe, addressing the long term, that those decisions can be postponed any longer.

The Government must play a role in the reinvigoration of the British economy. The Chancellor admits that in the international sphere it is right for Governments to intervene and to be active in regulating the international monetary system. In exactly the same way, I ask the Government to abandon this free market nonsense in our domestic economy. It is as if they believe that the problems of the 1980s can be solved by the remedies of the 1780s. To realise the importance of their role, we have only to look at what Government could do, for example, in research and development, education and training.

Our research and development will fall in real terms while that of our competitors is constantly rising. Scientific research is either staying level or perhaps slightly declining, while our competitor countries are increasing it by 20 or 30 per cent. Those are the implications of present Government policies.

There is one further implication and it is perhaps the most important of all. As I said before, the Government virtually accept that they will carry 4 million unemployed into the next election. In effect, they now budget for two Britains. I think of the time when someone of my generation will be the average age of the members of the Cabinet. That is a long way off, in the year 2010, but I wonder if it is contemplated that we should carry 4 million unemployed until that time.

A cynical electoral calculation lies at the heart of Government policies. The Government believe that if there are sufficient votes from people who are relatively well paid and in work they can abandon the rest. People who think that are not merely morally wrong but socially dangerous because if 30 to 40 per cent. of our population is cut adrift we will end up threatening democracy. Britain cannot be unified until our priorities change. Unfortunately, there will be no change in priorities until there is a change of Government.

9.42 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): This Budget comes at the end of a period of five years of continuous growth. It also comes at a time when international conditions have been unusually disturbed because of the sharp fall in the oil price and the movement of foreign currencies and so on. I heard what the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said about the consequences of a drop in oil production. I shall have to read his speech tomorrow, because I could not entirely follow his argument. It seems to me that the Labour party is rather disappointed that the economy was not knocked sideways when such a substantial part of the Government's revenue fell away because of the fall in the oil price.

It is right at this time that we should have a cautious and careful Budget and one which does not put too much strain on the markets by over-borrowing. As we were reminded this afternoon, on Monday the Leader of the Opposition said that the Government had borrowed £60 billion in their first five years compared with borrowing by the last Labour Government of £40 billion in the five-year period when they were in office. The right hon. Gentleman is both wrong and misleading. He is wrong because we have borrowed only £50 billion, even in nominal terms, and he is misleading because at today's prices Labour borrowed twice as much.

As a proportion of the gross domestic product, Labour borrowed twice as much in five years as the Conservatives have borrowed in seven years. If borrowing were now as high a proportion of GDP as it was in 1976, the public sector borrowing requirement for the current year would not be around £7 billion but £33 billion or 9·25 per cent. of GDP. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) spoke about the scope for raising the PSBR and I suppose that is the sort of figure he had in mind. The right hon. Gentleman was an economic Minister at the time. Does he now repudiate the actions of the Government of which he was a member?

There is no doubt about what would have happened if there had been a large increase in the PSBR. We should certainly not now be seeing a fall in interest rates or in inflation. Instead, massive increases would be in prospect. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) said, the Budget has been received as an act of confidence by a reduction in interest rates. The 1 per cent. reduction has been estimated by the CBI to save British industry about £250 million per year, and the reduction in mortgage rates announced over the last two days by several major building societies will provide an additional benefit to millions of families buying their homes. The combined benefits of the Budget and the reduction in mortgage rates to the average family with two children and a typical outstanding mortgage of £15,000 amount to £3·76 a week.

We are already seeing the benefits of a steady reduction in the PSBR in declining interest rates. This year, the PSBR, as a proportion of GDP, will be the lowest for the past 14 years and it is no coincidence that long-term interest rates have now fallen below 10 per cent., and are at their lowest for many years. The end of overfunding as a policy instrument, which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in October, will also ensure that a low borrowing requirement is fully reflected in low actual borrowing.

At this time of year it is customary to announce a funding "target" for national savings for the following financial year. Last October, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced that in future the Government's policy would be to borrow sufficient to fund the PSBR in each financial year. That means that there is now an overall net funding target of £7 billion for 1986-87. We have concluded that it is no longer appropriate to have a separate target for national savings within that total. Decisions about the best methods of funding will in future be made in the light of circumstances, including market conditions and the relative attractiveness and cost of different instruments.

National savings will continue to play a significant part in funding the PSBR. We will ensure that the attractiveness of national savings products to investors is maintained. Our aim over the coming year will be to keep national savings rates broadly competitive with other rates available to personal savers. In that context, I do not propose any immediate changes in national savings rates.

The Budget has brought again to the forefront of British politics the question of the basic rate of income tax. It is remarkable how Opposition Members have been put out by the fact that, despite the constraints of the current situation, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been able, in his Budget, to make a further reduction in the basic rate. We have now brought it down from 33p in the pound, which we inherited from Labour, to 29p in the pound today. It is our aspiration to reach a basic rate of 25p, but in reducing it from 33p to 29p we are already halfway there. Hon. Members such as the hon. Members for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike) said that there was nothing in the Budget for any of their constituents. However, 24 million out of 25 million taxpayers in this country have a marginal rate of tax at the basic rate. We have raised the threshold for the starting point for tax by more than 20 per cent. after allowing for inflation, whereas the Labour Government reduced the starting threshold by 5 per cent. for a married man and 20 per cent. for a single man. Conservative Members should not take anything from them about helping those on lower incomes. That is the sort of nonsense that the Opposition peddle.

Mr. Blair: Is it not true that the total tax burden, including national insurance, amounts to about £30 billion more in real terms than when the Labour Government left office?

Mr. Stewart: We have raised the tax threshold and reduced the rate. The hon. Gentleman is really saying that people are better off under the Conservative Government, because those on higher incomes pay more taxes. I am glad to have that confirmation of the consequence of our Budget.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook made great play of the fact that a Labour Government would spend a lot of money on helping various members of society. He said that he would have to spend £3·5 billion in that connection. Where would that money come from? The answer is the higher paid and the rich. He said—and I hope that we can trust him—that he would not raise the basic rate of income tax. He said that when the basic rate of income tax was 30p in the pound. I hope that it still holds now that it is 29p in the pound. I shall give way if the hon. Member for Sedgefield wants to answer that point. He cannot answer it, however, and that is significant. The Labour party is not prepared to give a commitment to not raising the basic rate of income tax.

The Opposition have said that they will raise about half of the £3·5 billion which they want as extra spend for benefits by dealing with the higher rates of tax. I would like to give an example to Opposition Members of what that might mean. Supposing the Opposition were to impose a higher rate of 80 per cent. that would have to be placed on a taxable income of £22,800.

Mr. Prescott: Tell us about jobs.

Mr. Stewart: That is where the process would have to start, if the Opposition were to leave the 40 per cent. and 45 per cent. thresholds unchanged. If the top rate of tax was to be no higher than 70 per cent., people would have to start paying it on a taxable income of £18,600. Is that a proper level of income to attract a rate of tax of 70 per cent? Alternatively, they could increase all the higher rates. If they did that, they would have to increase each level by 17 percentage points. The first high rate would not be 40p in the pound——

Mr. Prescott: Nobody is listening to the hon. Gentleman. Why not tell us about jobs?

Mr. Stewart: Instead, the first higher rate would be 57p in the pound. That is the sort of nonsense which Opposition Members peddle as their recipe for dealing with the Budget problems. They say that there is an enormous amount of money which they can obtain by taxing those on higher incomes.

In the present circumstances, it is right that the Budget should have a balance between the interests of taxpayers. That is why we have been able to make a further move on the basic rate and why that has been so widely appreciated and so popular in the country. That move has not been popular with the Opposition. The Opposition have said that they would not oppose the move as they realise that it would be ridiculous to do so when people want lower and not higher tax.

Mr. Prescott: They want lower employment.

Mr. Stewart: Listening to speeches from Opposition Members, one would think that people wanted ever increasing rates of taxation. That is, of course, what the people have always had when the Labour party has been in power.

Mr. Prescott: The people have had higher taxes under the Tory Government.

Mr. Stewart: High rates of taxation make an inefficient economy. One of the essential ingredients for making an efficient economy which can continue to provide jobs is that the burden of taxation on industry, business and individuals should be as low and not as high as possible. I am sorry that that sentiment is not shared by Opposition Members.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Minister study the comments made by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) on the Jimmy Young programme this morning in which he made it clear that he had no objection to people earning more than £20,000 a year and that he did not intend to increase income tax for those people?

Mr. Stewart: I listened to the comments made by the hon. Member for Stockton, South, and I have a transcript of what the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has said. He said that the Opposition would have to call for a greater contribution from the people at the top of the wages ladder. He would then use the extra £3·5 million to help those people in most need. I have sympathy with the hon. Member for Stockton, South, as the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook changes his tune so often that it would not be at all surprising if he had said today the precise opposite of what he said yesterday. That would be precisely in tune with what he has been saying about public expenditure.

I would now like to discuss a subject which is perhaps a little less contentious than my previous points. It is important during the debate that we should have some consideration of the tax reliefs for charity which have received a welcome on both sides of the House.

Opposition Members sometimes find it amusing to portray Tory Ministers, and particularly Tory Treasury Ministers and Chancellors, as grim and Scrooge-like figures. That has always been a complete misrepresentation, and after this Budget the Opposition will find it impossible to argue that case.

It is fair to say that my right hon. Friend's proposals for tax reliefs on contributions to charity have met with a more enthusiastic welcome than any other Budget measure in memory. The charities VAT reform group has described the VAT concession as being the most substantial concession that the Chancellor has ever given on the charities VAT bill. The newly formed council for industry and higher education has been pressing for such measures on corporate giving here because such measures do so much to sustain and expand higher education in the United States. In the United States private finance alone is worth twice as much as the whole of the University Grants Committee's grant for higher education in the United Kingdom.

The director of the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts has said that the tax relief may mean as much as £10 million extra for the arts in the next financial year. The director of the Charities Aid Foundation has described my right hon. Friend's package as "breathtakingly radical". He has said that, according to his assessment, the combination of measures should double the £1 billion of private support currently going to charity. It is right that those measures should be strongly supported on both sides of the House.

Giving to charity is deeply ingrained in the British tradition. What my right hon. Friend has done, in a characteristically creative and innovative way, is to furnish the charities with a range of opportunities for self help. It is now up to them to realise them in an effective and organised way. In some areas——

Mr. Prescott rose——

Mr. Stewart: —of public affairs state action is appropriate and right but in so many others——

Mr. Prescott: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: —state action is second best to private initiative. I have every confidence that those opportunities will be seized with the energy and imagination which private initiative can generate.

Mr. Prescott: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: The extra funds should now be available. It will be up to the charities to make their pitch. I welcome the contributions of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) from a sedentary position——

Mr. Prescott: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. One at a time.

Mr. Stewart: As a practice, I do not give way to hon. Members who behave in such an uncouth fashion and I do not propose to do so tonight.

Mr. Prescott: When are you going to talk about jobs?

Mr. Stewart: The Budget encourages the development of industry——

Mr. Prescott: When are you going to talk about jobs?

Mr. Stewart: —a drop in energy prices, a drop in interest rates and a drop in the corporation tax rate. All those have come together. A fall of a dollar in——

Mr. Prescott: You are a disgrace.

Mr. Stewart: —the price of crude oil is estimated to save industry over——

Mr. Prescott: When are you going to talk about jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to the Opposition Front Bench that such behaviour is very unseemly.

Mr. Prescott: So are the unemployed. When are you going to talk about jobs?

Mr. Dixon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression that when a Member wound up a debate such as we have had today he would deal with the contents of that debate. We have been making points about unemployment in our constituencies which have been ignored by the Chancellor. Yet the person who is answering, that squalid little person there, has never once talked about——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) knows perfectly well that he must not say things like that.

Mr. Dixon rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. Mr. Ian Stewart.

Mr. Stewart: It is not surprising that people in Britain do not regard the Labour party as remotely suited ever to take power——

Mr. Prescott: What about jobs?

Mr. Stewart: The behaviour of the hon. Gentleman has been simply disgraceful today. He held the Dispatch Box for nearly an hour. He tried over a long period to ruin the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford on Avon (Mr. Howarth) and he is now trying to prevent the Government from putting forward their comments on the Budget at the end of the debate.

Mr. Blair rose——

Mr. Stewart: I was talking about industry. The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) wanted to try to prevent me having the time to address many of the issues which have been raised in the debate.

The best way that we can encourage further jobs in Britain is to have a strong and successful industry and commercial sector. Just because the 35 per cent. rate of corporation tax was announced and introduced two years ago, we should not forget that this, 1986-87, is the first year when we will have the lowest corporation tax rate for many years in Britain and one of the lowest among the industrial countries.

That is one reason why we can look forward to a continuing period of growth in the British economy in the coming year, building on the five years of continued growth that we have now had, despite the sharp shock which has been administered to the economy by the oil price.

Mr. Prescott: Tell us about jobs.

Mr. Stewart: That is why we can continue with our measures in the economy not only to help the company sector and investment, but also with the package of employment measures——

Mr. Prescott: Tell us about jobs.

Mr. Stewart: —which my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General described so effectively earlier.

The Paymaster General pointed out that we had done a great deal to help those who are not fortunate enough to be in work——

Mr. Prescott: Tea and sympathy.

Mr. Stewart: That is an important part of this Budget as it has been of recent Budgets. I remind hon. Members that in the last Budget my right hon. Friend restructured the whole of the national insurance contributions in such a way as to give the greatest help to those at the lower end of the payments scale and to encourage people to take new jobs——

Debate adjourned.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Keynsham Hospital Maternity Unit

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Jack Aspinwall (Wansdyke): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the issues surrounding the proposal by the Bristol and Weston district health authority to close the Keynsham maternity unit.

I would first like to record my thanks to Doctors Tom Garrett, William House and Simon Lowe. I should also like to thank Michael Quinton, secretary of the Bristol community health council and its members, the Wansdyke district council and the 42 general practitioners in the Keynsham maternity unit catchment area who have given positive support. Thousands of people have signed petitions. I thank Mr. Leslie Baker, chief reporter of the local community campaign newspaper, the Keynsham Weekly Chronicle. Mrs. Pam Rocyn-Jones and Mrs. Andrea Hider have been hard-working in their campaign. I should also like to place on record my thanks to Malcolm and Christine Kempster, whom I met on Monday at their home. I also met baby Ellen, who was born at the Keynsham maternity hospital. The professional medical and administrative staff at Keynsham hospital have worked hard to keep a local, caring service.

It is the aim of Government to provide not only the most effective and cost-efficient system of health care but the most responsible. The Bristol and Weston district health authority's proposal to close Keynsham maternity unit negates all three aims. The closure was first proposed by the Bristol and Weston district health authority in September, 1985. In accordance with the appropriate Health Service circular, the Avon family practitioners' committee should have been invited to comment on such a proposal. It was not.

In view of this legal error, the Minister for Health rightly saw fit to defer consideration until the correct consultation process had been followed. The rectification of the error is now being pursued with the family practitioners committee, which firmly opposes the closure. The case is likely to return to the South-Western regional health authority in April. Due to this error a great deal of cost and loss of staff morale has occurred.

I feel obliged to inform the House of the misguided intentions of the Bristol and Weston district health authority. In 1985 total admissions to the Keynsham maternity unit numbered 667. This figure included 579 obstetric admissions and 88 convalescent cases. Of the 579 obstetric admissions, 434 were transfers in, for postnatal care and 113 were actual deliveries. The unit is used by the patients of the 40 GPs in the area and it is estimated, from the bookings made by 1 January, that there would be approximately 120 deliveries in 1986. This is consistent with the number of deliveries in the past four years, despite the uncertainty about the unit's future. Yet the Bristol and Weston district health authority says that the unit is underused. This is not the case. It can be argued that the unit is not reaching its full economic potential, but this is only because some GPs and consultants refuse to accept the change in medical and public opinion in favour of low technology births. There is also the uncertainty about the unit's future. The cost of the maternity unit has been based on it being an outpost of the Bristol maternity hospital and the cost per delivery has been distorted to some extent by that fact.

The cost per patient day at the Bristol maternity hospital is now about £120, whereas the cost per patient day for the whole of Keynsham hospital, including the maternity hospital is £50. If Keynsham were seen as a whole and regarded as a facility for the whole of Keynsham and the surrounding area, the cost for the maternity unit would appear in an entirely different light.

Keynsham maternity unit has a reputation for quality and progressive maternity care. In recent years, there has been new evidence showing that the GP-midwife team is as good as, if not better than, the specialist units. Although the setting and some of the issues are different, the Wendy Savage case is concentrating public and medical opinion on the issue of interventionist maternity care. This is practised by many consultant units, whether or not it is justified clinically or acceptable to most mothers.

A study of the Keynsham and Bristol maternity units undertaken by Doctors Garrett, House and Lowe showed that, for mothers selected as being of low risk and matched for the number of pregnancies they have had for social class, smoking habits, and so on, the perinatal outcome was the same. Intervention by doctors was significantly less in the Keynsham unit. Such intervention — for example, the augmentation of labour and foetal monitoring — is expensive and risky. Professional bodies, such as the British Medical Association, through the general medical services committee, and the Royal College of General Practitioners, now actively encourage GP obstetrics. I refer the House to the resolution approved at the annual general meeting of the Royal College of General Practitioners, which stated:

"That in pursuance of quality, the Royal College of General Practitioners actively encourage those General Practitioners who wish to provide complete maternity services (including intrapartum care) in General Practitioner Units."

The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists implies an encouragement of GP obstetrics by insisting on the retention of standards and skills amongst practising GPs. Many papers have been published which suggest that, in cases selected at low risk, management is best given in GP units. A typical example is Marjorie Tew's article in the August 1985 edition of the journal of the Royal College of General Practitioners. Marjorie Tew is research statistician at Nottingham medical school. She has argued that, by the time of the 1970 national perinatal survey, the percentage of births taking place in consultant hospitals had increased by a third to 66 per cent., but the disparity between perinatal mortality rate there and in GP units had doubled since 1958 to become fivefold — for example the perinatal mortality rate in hospital was 27·8 per 1,000 compared to 5·4 per 1,000 in GP units.

It is clear that the trend of both medical and public opinion is back to "low technology" childbirth wherever possible. The Paulton maternity unit in the Bath district health authority is flourishing, with demand rising. The Keynsham maternity unit mothers' support group has made it clear that more women do not want "high technology" births, and, furthermore, do not want to go to the Bristol maternity unit. To close Keynsham would be to reduce the choice for expectant mothers. Moreover, it will reduce obstetric skills for GPs and once these have been removed, it is doubtful whether they will be recovered. Above all, in the light of new research and demands by mothers, it will be closing the door on what must be regarded as the way forward for maternity care. This is not the act of a responsible Health Service.

Financially, the Bristol and Weston district health authority hopes to save £68,400 with a net saving of about 11 staff. It is on this saving on which the Bristol and Weston district health authority and subsequently the South-Western regional health authority rests its case. That saving is unrealistic. The sum of £68,400 would be counterbalanced by additional expenditure at the Bristol maternity unit to which patients would be directed. In addition, supposed savings would be further lost on extra services to cover the hole left by the closure of Keynsham — for example, community midwives have to visit newly discharged mothers for the first 10 days. The Keynsham area consists of numerous outlying villages with a high mileage to travel for the midwife and further consequent expenditure. Moreover, given the initial delay with regard to the faulty consultation procedure, the hopes of the Bristol and Weston district health authority to be able to release £68,400 in the next financial year by closing the Keynsham maternity unit have already disappeared.

Although originally the Bristol and Weston district health authority made no proposals for the re-use of the space vacated by the maternity unit, which it should have done in the original consultation if the procedure had been properly followed, there is now a definite proposal for its re-use. That proposal is to move in the unit for the younger chronically sick — long-term physically handicapped — who are now accommodated in the inadequate Clara Jeffries unit in the hospital. That would be a short term measure until better long-term accommodation is created away from a hospital site in conjunction with specialist housing. Certainly, the Clara Jeffries unit is inadequate and new accommodation is needed, but the use of the maternity unit is not the answer. Another solution for the short term problem is the use of the Bristol General hospital, suggested by its managers, as a better short term solution.

Finally, to close Keynsham would not be practical. One has only to look at the geography of the area. If the Keynsham unit were to close expectant mothers would be forced to go to either Weston-super-Mare or central Bristol. The other nearest hospital the Royal United at Bath, is not in the Bristol and Weston district health authority region. Mr. Bamford, consultant gynaecologist at the Royal United hospital has said:

"the Obstetric services based at the Princess Anne Wing, Bath, have serious problems due to pressure on beds, Midwives and Medical Staff, these difficulties being more severe than in any other Maternity Unit in the Wessex Region. Inevitably, if the GP Maternity Unit at Keynsham is closed, some patients will look to Bath for intra-partum care and this will just not be possible. Quite apart from this consideration, it can be argued that it is positively detrimental to confine low-risk patients in high-technology units. I would, therefore, strongly support the campaign for retention of intra-partum facilities at Keynsham for low-risk patients."

The sheer difficulty of travel to and from other hospitals, not only by expectant mothers but by husbands, friends and relations, would be costly and extremely inconvenient. It is precisely at such a time that a new mother needs the support, care and close contact of a family. With increasing pressure on Bristol, new mothers would surely be discharged too soon without the support structure they would get at Keynsham.

I have already pointed out the Keynsham area contains a number of outlying villages and districts. For those communities and the surrounding areas of Longwell Green, Bitton, Hanham Abbotts, Oldland and Brislington, maintenance of the Keynsham maternity unit is even more crucial.

The alternatives to closing Keynsham are plainly unrealistic. Expectant mothers have to go somewhere. Currently, it is the practice of the Bath district to discharge patients from the Royal United to Keynsham after 48 hours. The Bath district has indicated that if the Keynsham maternity unit were to close it would not be prepared to accept patients from Keynsham. Still further, patients from Bath would not have the opportunity to receive the support of post natal care provided by Keynsham. The Bristol maternity unit would have the problem of combining high throughput with a high technology practice required by high risk patients.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): Will the hon. Gentleman press the Minister in his reply to answer the point that his constituents are simply the latest in a long line to suffer from the gross distortion in hospital services which has occurred in the Bristol area through the over concentration on the wholly unsuitable St. Michael's hill site, condemned in the Zachary Cope report in 1945 but rebuilt at the insistence of the university and the private consultants in Clifton? Will he stress to the Minister the importance of answering that point in the interests of everybody in the area?

Mr. Aspinwall: I am grateful for the intervention of the right hon. Gentleman. That is a vital point in my representations to the Secretary of State.

I feel very strongly that the problems of inadequae general practitioner cover for home confinement, the demand for which would inevitably increase if Keynsham were to close, and the proposal to close the Keynsham hospital maternity unit, would condemn my constituents to ineffective, inefficient and irresponsible health care. Local general practitioners, the family practitioners committee, the Bristol community health council, the mothers support group at Keynsham and I are fervently opposed to the Bristol and Weston district health authority's decision. To maintain the Keynsham maternity unit would meet the growing demand by mothers for choice and provide the general practitioner-midwife team with a location for obstetrics practice. It represents what must be the future and it would provide an integrated system of health care for the Bristol maternity unit. Moreover, it could give possibly the best cost-effective and efficient structure of health service.

I urge the Minister to ask the Secretary of State to withhold his consent for the proposals of the Bristol and Weston district health authority and the South-Western regional health authority in order to ensure that the excellent service that is provided by the Keynsham hospital maternity unit and its caring staff and local general practitioners remains.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wansdyke (Mr. Aspinwall) on his good fortune in securing this Adjournment debate. He is well known and recognised as a doughty fighter for all the services in his community. He has strongly and clearly represented to the House the very strong views that he holds about the future of the Keynsham hospital maternity unit. They are shared by the organisations to which he referred. The Government have very much welcomed the opportunity to hear my hon. Friend's views. The regional and district health authorities will take note of them, as will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and I.

I shall address not only the Keynsham issue but also the wider context in which health authorities are having to plan the future pattern of their health services. I am particularly grateful and pleased that my hon. Friends the Members for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) and for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) and the right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) are in the Chamber this evening.

As my hon. Friend has said, the proposal by Bristol and Weston health authority is that deliveries and post-natal care at Keynsham should come to an end. My hon. Friend quoted a number of statistics. Perhaps I might in return be permitted to refer to a few myself, because undoubtedly there has been a continuing decline in the number of births at the unit: from 356 in 1976 to 188 in 1979, to 160 in 1980 and 1981 and to 116 in 1982, with a slight rise in 1983 to 123. Of these I understand that only 61 in 1983 were delivered to residents of Keynsham and the neighbouring district of Saltford. Indeed, of the 190 deliveries in 1983 to residents of these communities, 129 took place at other locations, including 60 at the Bristol maternity hospital and 11 at Southmead hospital. On average in 1983, occupancy of the 12 maternity beds was just under 50 per cent. In 1982, it was as low as 35 per cent.

These were trends which the district health authority felt it could not ignore. It was naturally concerned at the declining use of Keynsham, especially by local people. It was rightly concerned that the resources at its disposal should be used to the best possible effect. This is what we expect health authorities to do. The demand for health care and methods of delivering services are not static. There are demographic pressures and improved methods of treatment, including the development of care in the community. This means change and we expect health authorities to balance carefully all these aspects in determining the pattern of care that they wish to provide.

Since 1978-79 this Government have provided an extra 20 per cent. in real terms for hospital and community health services. In the coming year we expect to provide a further £650 million—or 6·7 per cent.—against an inflation forecast which is significantly lower than that, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to underline when he spoke to the House on Tuesday. This represents a very significant increase in resources. This, together with the cash savings of £150 million which health authorities are planning to generate in the coming year, will enable all health authorities to implement a substantial expansion of services, but this will not absolve any health authority from the need to deliver services in the most effective manner.

In the south-western region the position is even brighter than in the country as a whole. A revenue increase in the coming year of 7 per cent. comes on top of above-average increases in every year since 1979. The fact that the Bristol and Weston district is relatively well provided for already means that under the region's RAWP formula—the process of Health Service resource allocation—it has received proportionately less than other authorities in the south-west. However, it too has received regular increases year by year which have enabled a number of important developments to take place. These include the brand new general hospital at Weston-super-Mare and the expansion of cardiac surgery at the Bristol Royal infirmary.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): I trust that my hon. Friend realises that under RAWP, because Bristol is a teaching area, it is losing out as the cost of equipment had increased faster than the provisions under RAWP. Secondly, it seems to me sad that births in Bristol should be concentrated on areas with high technology which is at the convenience of the consultants rather than lower technology which is in the interests of those giving birth.

Mr. Whitney: I recognise the point about the teaching areas. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that there are pros and cons in having a teaching hospital in the area. I should not like to be drawn at present on the clinical merits on one form of treatment or another. I think that the Health Service is flexible enough to cater for all.

All that I have been saying in terms of the expansion of the services has to be set in the context of what the south-western region hopes to achieve in the next 10 years. The region has established a very praiseworthy objective of achieving a relative shift in resources from hospital-based provision to community care for priority groups such as the elderly, the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped. These developments should, as a whole, greatly improve health care in the south-west, but they cannot be brought about without some alterations to existing provision nor by avoiding the fact that resources which may be used none too effectively at present will need to be put to better use in the future. As part of this exercise, the region is currently reviewing its entire acute hospital provision to ensure it can meet changing demands in the most cost effective manner.

It was against this general background that the Bristol and Weston health authority made its proposal for the future use of Keynsham. As my hon. Friend has said, a change of use at this hospital would have consequences for services other than just maternity. The health authority intends to improve accommodation for physically disabled patients at Keynsham. Community clinic services, including ante-natal services, would be transferred into the main hospital and the separate clinic building would be used as a base for mental handicap support teams. There will also be an eight-place day hospital for the elderly. Therefore, whatever view one takes about the future of the maternity unit, or the way in which the health authority has presented it, it would be wholly wrong to think of the proposal as an entirely negative step.

We shall have to look very carefully at the arguments put forward by my hon. Friend about the particular type of maternity care that Keynsham provides, and to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed) referred, and also the social implications of any change, such as transport points and general accessibility to services. I understand that all the deliveries that currently take place at Keynsham could, if necessary, be accommodated at the Bristol maternity unit and that the proposal is not in fact dependent on any agreement by Bath health authority to take on some of the case load. There is also the community midwifery service. But obviously we shall want to examine the alternatives, and I shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend the Member for Wansdyke has said.

My hon. Friend will realise that I cannot comment formally on the arguments for or against retaining the maternity unit. Through the consultation process, the Bristol community health council has opposed the change of use an this means automatically that the final decision will rest with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. At this point I must not pre-empt his decision.

As for the present position, my hon. Friend knows that the south-western regional health authority endorsed the Keynsham plans last September and forwarded them to my Department. My officials examined them carefully and were not satisfied that the consultation process had been followed to the letter. In particular, as my hon. Friend has said, the Avon family practitioner committee, which is now a statutory body, responsible to the Secretary of State, had not been consulted formally, although an attempt had been made to consult general practitioners through the local medical committee. This omission has been rectified and the family practitioner committee has now given its views. The district health authority is likely to consider its position at a meeting next month. If the authority still approves the change of use, the regional health authority intends to look at it again, probably in May, before it could come finally to the Secretary of State.

I should like to thank again my hon. Friend for expressing his views so clearly and forcefully. I assure him that my right hon. Friend will consider carefully the points made by him and by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East before reaching a final decision.

Question put and agreed to.

House of Commons

Friday 21 March 1986

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Sunday Trading

9.35 am

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of 110 parishioners of the Church of Our Lady of Sorrows in Stopgate lane, Liverpool, expressing opposition to the Shops Bill which is at present before Parliament.

I agree fully with my constituents that Sunday has special characteristics as a day of rest, recreation and worship for the benefit of our family and community life.

My petitioners urge this House to maintain legal limitations on Sunday Trading to ensure that the special character of Sunday is protected.

I hope that the House will take due cognisance of their prayer.

To lie upon the Table.

Radioactive Waste Storage

9.36 am

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I present a petition from the people of Grimsby and the surrounding area which sheweth—

That the undersigned are totally and absolutely opposed to any proposal to locate any radioactive waste storage or disposal facility within the County of Humberside and consider that any such facility would relegate the area, designating it as more suitable for dangerous dumping than for development.

Wherefore your Petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House do urge the Secretary of State for the Environment in no circumstances to authorise any such dumping or any survey work to assess suitability for the establishment of any nuclear wast dump within the County.

There are two main signatures, backed by a further 190 signatures, which complete the 1,200 signatures of a petition which, I presented three weeks ago in similar terms, and heralds the tens of thousands of signatures to come.

Humberside will fight this 300-year blight. My constituents cannot see why the Department of the Environment is acting as the political arm of NIREX in trying to force the detritus of a nuclear industry on an area which has no connection with it. My constituents consider that if the Department of the Environment Select Committee to stop rushing into the matter and to begin a basic consideration of whether disposal is necessary, whether this is the best method and whether alternatives can be found, it will betray its responsibility to the environment and by constituents.

National Service (Youth Training)

9.37 am

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): I beg to move,

That this House takes note with approval of the Government's plans to expand the United Kingdom's volunteer reserve forces; and emphasises the great value to young people of basic service training, while recognising that such training should not be funded in a way which would diminish the United Kingdom's front line capability.

The idea that young people should give some service to the community in which they live is not the exclusive property of retired colonels living in the leafy suburbs of Tunbridge Wells or Cheltenham. As social anthropologists from the time of Malinowski and Durkheim have noted, this feeling is widespread in primitive and advanced societies. It is felt strongly by the Masai tribesmen of east Africa and the prosperous bourgeousie of Switzerland. It can be felt with equal fervour by young people, who look upon some form of service as an initiation right, and the elders in the community who believe instinctively that young people should have a special role in protecting and caring for the community.

I am delighted to note that that general view is shared by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement, who will reply to the debate. My diligent research staff have drawn my attention to a speech that the Minister made in a debate on youth problems on 7 July 1980 when he was the chairman of the National Youth Bureau. He called for a three-year young Britons scheme. He said:

"The scheme which I have in mind would be very much voluntary in its nature. I suggest that the first year should consist of basic military training, with limited annual training thereafter on lines operated so successfully by the Swiss. I know that the Armed Forces would not be too keen, but they have embryo facilities and the cadre of instructors."

He went on to suggest that the second year of service should be spent on community work in mental hospitals or old people's homes and that the third year should be spent on industrial or craft training.

My proposals are a great deal less ambitious than that and also a great deal less expensive, but I hope that my hon. Friend's heart is still in the right place. As a starting point for my much more modest proposals, I took the statement made by the then Secretary of State for Defence on 14 April 1983 about the participation of the armed forces in the Government's youth training scheme. My right hon. Friend proposed to make available some 5,200 places for the young unemployed. He said:

"Young people will volunteer to join one of the services on a 12-month engagement, part of which will be spent in formal training and the remainder in work experience."—[Official Report, 14 April 1983; Vol. 40, c. 946.]

I welcomed that scheme, which was not surprising, as I had started the first studies for it some two years before when I was a Minister in the Department. That modest scheme was, I regret to say, greeted with howls of rage by members of the official Opposition. In particular, Joan Lestor denounced it on behalf of the working class and Alex Lyon, in a particularly poetic passage, denounced the scheme as compulsory conscription. Joan Lestor and Alex Lyon, both of whom were soon to be rejected by their constituents, might have been surprised if they had realised how vehemently their dislike of compulsory conscription was shared by almost all the senior officers of the armed forces.

[Sir Philip Goodhart]

Almost without exception, senior officers wish to maintain our Army as a highly professional body recruited on a wholly voluntary basis, and the Ministry of Defence is reluctant to spend money on anything that does not directly enhance the capability of the front line troops. Conscript natonal service men would be regarded as an encumbrance rather than an asset. This view of the chiefs of staff, which was held three years ago, is still their view today.

Now that the armed forces youth training scheme has been in operation for nearly three years, the time has come to review its operation and to see how it can be altered and improved, particularly as the Ministry of Defence now has to decide whether to extend the armed forces YTS to two years to keep in step with the rest of the YTS programme.

I note that the Royal Air Force seems happy with the existing arrangements. Over the past three years, it has offered 1,606 places to young people and has had 916 successful applicants. It is clear that the young people concerned are getting a valuable training, and, as I understand it, the RAF feels that the scheme has been of benefit to it. Therefore, I see no reason to alter the RAF scheme as it stands.

In the same three years, the Royal Navy has offered a mere 1,130 places to young people and has taken on 335 trainees. Clearly it gets a lot less out of the scheme than does the RAF, and if the Royal Navy wishes to opt out of the project, I see no reason why it should not.

The biggest need, and the greatest scope, for change is in the Army. It was originally planned that the Army would offer nearly 4,000 YTS places a year, but it has barely filled a quarter of the original target. Therefore, I propose that the Army should scrap its original YTS and replace it with a voluntary national scheme in which some 15,000 young men or women would be offered 100 days of regular training with regular pay.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Before my hon. Friend gets on to the scheme about which we are all eager to hear, will he accept that the problem with the services youth training scheme is that the services have never understood the major benefit of recruiting people below the existing age for serving soldiers, sailors or airmen? I helped to set up the YTS scheme. Does my hon. Friend agree that not only is it cheap for the Ministry of Defence because it is paid for by the Department of Employment, but that if the services are offering an attractive career, having had a young man within their ranks for 12 months, it should be hoped that he could then become a more permanent part of the force? Is it not this failure to see this point that has been at the root of the extraordinarily poor figures in the three services?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I accept a great deal of what my hon. Friend, who did so much to set up the scheme, has said, although I note that the old Army young leaders scheme used to be of great value both to young people and to the Army.

My scheme would have considerable attractions to employers. Many employers wish to employ young people with specific skills, but the commonsense message that I get from employers' organisations nationally and locally is that they are, above all, anxious to employ young people with a sense of initiative, of purpose and of discipline. The fact that a young person voluntarily undertakes to spend an intensive period of training should do a lot to enhance his attractiveness in the eyes of a great many employers.

Secondly, such a scheme of 100 days intensive training would be attractive to many men and women who are not particularly attracted by the present Army YTS. Large numbers of recruits are still coming forward both for the Regular Army and for the Territorial Army, and it is clear that many young people relish the challenge, particularly the short sharp challenge that the initial contact with the armed forces inevitably provides. The scheme would also have decided financial attractions to those taking part in it. The 100 days pay for a private, class four, band one comes to no less than £1,340. If one were to set aside £340 of pay for food and accommodation charges while serving, the young person might expect to be £1,000 better off at the end of 100 days.

Many hon. Members will have received letters from young people who are about to embark on a university career. Despite the fact that our grant system for undergraduates is the most generous in the industrial world, many young people going to university are faced with financial pressures. Some of them might find life at university considerably easier if they could start with nearly £1,000 in their pockets, having done a period of military training.

When choosing people who might join the scheme, priority should be given to those young people who have served in the cadet forces or other voluntary organisations at school and also to those who indicate a readiness to do some future service in the Territorial Army.

Three questions then arise. First, would the scheme be excessively expensive? Secondly, would it be an undue strain on the resources of the Army? Thirdly, would it be of any military value? The answer to the first question is, yes, it would be expensive, but not excessively expensive. The Manpower Services Commission is currently spending about £1,100 million on training schemes involving some 400,000 young people. Within that global figure I note that the estimated gross cost of mode B1 youth training scheme place is £3,800 for one year. When we move to two years of mode B1 training, the cost will of course increase. If the cost of training a recruit in the Army was £38 a day, which is a realisic estimate, a place in my suggested scheme would cost no more than a mode B1 place for one year.

Then there is the question whether the scheme would be an undue strain on the Army. Five years ago, or even three years ago, one could have said with some confidence that the Army could have coped within its existing resources. At that time the amount of money that we were spending on defence was growing quite sharply in real terms, and there was considerable elasticity in the Army's excellent training establishments.

I note that in 1981 the Army took in 25,956 recruits. In 1981-82 the figure fell to 12,405. In 1983-84 it bounced back again to nearly 20,000. That degree of variation showed that there was still a considerable amount of flexibility in the Army's primary training system. Since then, however, there has been a double squeeze. In real terms, the amount of money that we are planning to spend on defence is beginning to fall and a review of the Army's training facilities has eliminated a lot of the spare capacity that used to exist. There is talk once again of overstretch in the Army.

I do not want the Army to have to find from its existing resources the extra men and money that would be needed to cope with this scheme. Those with considerable expertise in training tell me that between 500 and 600 extra permanent staff would be needed to cope with this scheme and that the extra gross cost could be between £50 million and £60 million. That is a lot of money, but it is not such a lot when one considers that the budget of the Manpower Services Commission has gone up by £2 billion in the last seven years. I believe that the Army's manpower ceiling should be adjusted to take account of this extra commitment and that the money should come from our rapidly growing youth training budget rather than from our shrinking defence budget.

On the question whether the scheme would be of any military value, I think that it could benefit the Army, both directly and indirectly. One of the direct benefits would be, as I have just suggested, a small extra increase in the regular strength of the Army. Indirectly, I think that it is of help to the Army to be perceived to be making a contribution to the solution of a real national problem. As the number of men and women in the Army contracts, there is always the slight risk that the Army will lose contact with the community as a whole. As many hon. Members in the House can testify, the Army wins friends by having a large number of young people passing through its ranks.

Then there is the question whether 100 days' training is worth anything militarily. To that my reply would be that, if it is not, the NATO Alliance is in real trouble. As I have said, I hope that a considerable proportion of the young men and women who enter the scheme will go on to join the Territorial Army. This Government have sensibly recognised that the Territorial Army needs to be strengthened. I also note that at the moment less than a quarter of the officers and men serving in the Territorial Army have had any service with the regular forces.

I note that in an emergency both the British and the American armies rely heavily upon reserves to fill gaps in their order of battle. A large part of our military planning is based on the assumption that very large numbers of American reserves would cross the Atlantic to take part in a land battle in western Europe. The largest element in the American reserve is the army national guard, which is almost 500,000 strong. I note that before a national guardsman is counted as being properly trained he has to do 12 weeks, which will probably be extended to 14 weeks, basic regular training with the regular American army. Indeed, the Americans believe that three months' primary training with the regular forces is essential for their reserve forces. I believe that 100 days' primary training would have an important and beneficial effect upon our own reserve forces.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Will my hon. Friend make it clear that the first American reserves to be deployed to Europe at a time of emergency or war would be their air reserves, that the air national guard squadrons come across for regular training, in some cases on an annual basis, and that with no trouble at all they are deployed to Europe across the Atlantic in supersonic aeroplanes? That dimension has to be made clear also.

Sir Philip Goodhart: The pilots involved in the ground crew need considerably more than the 100 days' training that I am proposing.

I note that in the Army debate on 30 January 1986 the Minister for the Armed Forces said:

"The critical importance of the reserves is shown by the fact that, in a period of tension and after full mobilisation, the size of the Army as a whole would increase by some 175,000 through the addition of the reserves, and the size of the Army in Germany would almost treble. From that it can be seen that the Army would be in no position to discharge its wartime commitments without our reserve forces. Moreover, the reserves are strikingly cost-effective. The TA, for example, generates over 30 per cent. of the Army's order of battle for only some 5 per cent. of its budget."

Those of us who have attended Army debates over the last 20 years, such as my hon. Friends the Members for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) and for Windsor and Maidenhead (Dr. Glyn) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck), could, I am sure, almost recite that paragraph by heart. For almost 20 years, virtually without change, it has appeared in the speech of the Minister of whatever party who has had the privilege of opening the Army debate. This year I was glad to see that the Minister for the Armed Forces was able to go on to say:

"The expansion of the Territorial Army is making steady progress towards our target of 86,000. The strength of the TA was only some 59,000 when we came into office in 1979. It is over 76,000 now, having increased by some 4,000 in the past year." — [Official Report, 30 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 1121-22.]

Even with that expansion, I note that our reserve forces are significantly smaller than those of some of our NATO allies. The French army reserve is 305,000, the German 750,000, the Italian 550,000, and the Greek 350,000. Even the Belgians, with 160,000, have an army reserve almost as large as ours. In almost every case, the reservists will have had at least 12 months' regular experience. The only exception is the Belgians, whose reservists will have had a minimum of eight months' regular service.

To sum up, the present Army services youth training scheme has been only a qualified success. With nearly three years' experience under our belt, it needs modification. I believe that it should be replaced, at some small additional cost, with a scheme that gives 100 days of regular training to 15,000 young men and women every year. I believe that this scheme would be attractive to employers. I believe that it would offer a challenge and provide a pleasing financial reward to many young people. It could do much to strengthen the reserve forces which have such an important role to play if we are faced with a war or an emergency.

Of course, I do not expect my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement to say this morning that he is wholly won over by my argument—which he himself advanced only a few years ago—and that the money is ready and waiting in the kitty and that my proposed scheme will be introduced on Wednesday week. however, I hope that he will remember his earlier enthusiasm and will recall his own wise and robust speech delivered a mere six years ago. I hope that he will look seriously at the proposal. I hope that he will remember that many members of the public think that a little bit of military training would be good for many of our young people.

Meanwhile, I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State whether he has anything more to say about another proposal for strengthening the reserve forces which I put forward in the Army debate on 30 January and which he may recall as I think he was sitting on the Front Bench at the time. In that debate, I pointed out that there was

"one way in which we could enormously enhance our helicopter capacity at very small extra cost to the defence budget." — [Official Report, 30 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 1155]

It has been estimated that there are some 550 civilian helcopters and that about 350 of them are civilian versions of military helicopters. Many civilian helicopters are operated by pilots who were trained in the armed forces. Many of the larger civilian helicopters, such as the converted Sea Kings and the Super Pumas, are now working in the North sea oilfields.

For many years, the Admiralty has had a scheme for taking over a number of British merchant ships in an emergency, and public funds used to be spent to modify those ships so that they could swiftly adapt to their wartime role. In much the same way, I believe that 250 of our civilian helicopters could become part of a territorial army of the air. Some modification of the earmarked helicopters might be needed. Extra wireless sets and identification equipment would have to be set side. Some extra training would have to be given to the pilots and the ground crews, and special arrangements would have to be worked out with the operating companies and their clients.

Of course, it would be unrealistic to think that civilian helicopters could be pitchforked straight into a major battle, but the existence of this territorial army of the air, which would be almost as large as the Army's existing helicopter fleet, would mean that every service helicopter now stationed in this country could be given an overseas role. The creation of this territorial army of the air would be the most cost-effective way of filling some of the gaps in our military helicopter capacity.

Since I made that suggestion on 30 January, there have been letters to The Times in support of this proposal from Field-Marshal Lord Carver, the former Chief of the Defence Staff, and Mr. Michael Rankin, the director of the British Maritime League, who pointed out , sadly, that the old Admiralty scheme for equipment for merchant ships had fallen into abeyance. I note that the proposal for mobilising civilian helicopters was raised also during the recent North Atlantic Assembly meeting in Brussels by that distinguished Dutch General, General de Jager, who is chairman of the NATO military committee and who pointed out that the Dutch had a mobilisation scheme for civilian earth-moving equipment. It seems that the Dutch have an up-to-date register of bulldozers and that their drivers would be required to report in the first hours of an emergency, which might perhaps be more effective than sticking one's finger in the dyke.

The proposals which I put forward in the Army debate on 30 January were not entirely new, because I had put them forward some four years ago in the Ministry of Defence. I suspect that the Ministry of Defence is aware of the existence of these civilian helicopters and is aware of their potential value in an emergency. I very much fear, however, that it has not yet even reached the point of talking seriously to the main helicopter contractors about the precise way in which civilian helicopters could be mobilised. Do we have service wireless sets ready to put into the helicopters? Do we have suitable "identification friend or foe" equipment to put on those helicopters? Have we had any talks about mobilisation plans with the civilian helicopter pilots who have served in the regular forces?

I am glad that the Government have plans for a helicopter squadron of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, but so much more could be done with just a little more planning. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State can give us some positive information about progress in the Ministry's thinking on the territorial army of the air. I hope also that it will not take the Ministry another four years to come up with a sensible scheme for giving a short period of military training to some of the young people who would like to undertake it and who could give valuable service to their country.

10.8 am

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): We are all grateful to the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) for giving us an opportunity to debate this topic. At root is the role of the Ministry of Defence in the community and its broader role in the affairs of the nation. One of the consequences of the decision to go for wholly professional armed services — which, on balance, has been proved to be correct — has been to make the Ministry of Defence constrict itself and to have a tendency to cocoon itself in a wholly military atmosphere. That was always one of the things people feared when we went for a wholly professional force.

One of the strengths of the previous system, in which people were compelled to serve in one of the four services, which included the Royal Marines, was that a wide range of people were involved in military affairs. That meant that the armed services were not cocooned and that there was a much wider spread of knowledge and involvement in and commitment to the armed services.

Memories fade. The second world war is long gone and many people have never served in the armed services. That being the case, we have to make an effort to ensure that the Ministry of Defence does not see its role in a narrow way. The Ministry of Defence, together with its civilian employees, is a major economic force in the national economy. Apart from the Department of Health and Social Security it is our largest single employer. It was right for the Government in 1983 to see that the military and civilian employment aspects of the Ministry of Defence made a contribution to youth training. A number of people in the Chamber today were deeply sceptical about whether the armed forces youth training scheme would be successful.

Those of us who have served in the Ministry of Defence are well aware of the deep-seated hostility to any involvement by the volunteer held by most of the senior military figures. This scheme had the smack of being reluctantly forced on the chiefs of staff by Ministers, but the chiefs of staff went along with it, confident that it would never work. The figures of uptake are deplorable. The armed forces youth training scheme was launched in August 1983 with the intention of providing 5,000 places a year. Up to the end of last year only 1,500 youngsters had accepted places. That is an indictment of the way the scheme has been run and not of the people who could have been encouraged to go into it.

It is important to focus on the other part of the scheme, the Ministry's civil employment training scheme. That was expected to provide about 2,000 places a year, but only something like 650 received training. One cannot go to any of the military establishments without realising the depth of the training commitment to the professional service man. That training is of a high calibre. Many of the people in civilian youth training schemes are green with envy when they see the training facilities provided by the Ministry of Defence. It has the capacity and the skilled instructors and standards that would undoubtedly benefit our youth training effort.

The first question we have to ask ourselves is whether the armed services and the civilian employers in the Ministry of Defence will in April participate fully in a two-year youth training scheme. The Minister nods his head so I assume they will. That is good. One of the criticisms of the extension of the youth training scheme is that the Government have not yet given sufficient commitment to funding the extra training capacity that is fundamental for such a scheme. There is no point in taking people into these schemes for two years unless there is an extra input of resources to ensure that the scheme has a much stronger training element than hitherto. The inadequate effort we put into skill training is a scandal. Only yesterday, the head of the Manpower Services Commission made a scathing speech about the shortage of skills in the nation.

Whatever view one holds about politics or about the Budget, it must be of paramount importance to increase the skills of our youth. We must be ready to seize the opportunities of a new technological era. Few Government Departments are better able to set an example by increasing training for today's youth than the Ministry of Defence. It is fundamental that the chiefs of staff are told straight that they have to co-operate in this scheme and give a great deal more commitment to it than they have done hitherto.

I hope that as a result of this debate the Minister will go away strengthened for his part in the bureaucratic struggle.

The hon. Member for Beckenham said that the service which has contributed most and got the most out of the scheme is the Royal Air Force. My affection for the Royal Navy is well known and the Royal Marines is second to it. Anyone who works in the Ministry of Defence knows that the most open-minded of the services is the Royal Air Force. Perhaps that is because it is the youngster of our services and also because many of its senior officers have had a wider training and come from a more varied background. It is much easier to incorporate new ideas into the RAF than it is to incorporate them into the Army, the Royal Navy or the Royal Marines.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the Royal Navy should opt out of the scheme. I vehemently oppose such a thing. The Royal Navy and the Royal Marines should play a full part in the scheme and above all the Army should have a role. What is to be done? I do not know what a realistic target figure should be, but we should not fix a target figure and then fail to fulfil it. This time let us have fixed target figures that will be fulfilled. The next question we must ask is why has this scheme failed—apart from the reasons of bureaucratic inertia and professional hostility. One of the reasons is that the standards for acceptance to the scheme are far too high and much too restrictive.

I have a suggestion of the utmost importance. In the United States the head-start programme has special help and positive action programmes for black and ethnic minorities. That programme has been given a powerful push because the Department of Defence at the Pentagon made a major contribution to the programme right from the start. It deliberately took on a great number of people who were not even fluent in languages and who had problem backgrounds. It was thought that because of the nature of the armed services the people going into the training schemes would be living in a much more disciplined framework than exists in any of the normal youth training schemes. The scheme was therefore especially suitable for people from disadvantaged backgrounds who would be the hardest to train.

Our scheme is wholly voluntary and that is right, but the standards for acceptance ought not to be pitched so high, and the armed services should take into the scheme volunteers who have the least educational qualifications and some of the most difficult backgrounds. People who have been through the courts and who have been on probation and things like that should be taken on. There is a peculiarly strong sense of responsibility in the armed services, and that will mean that the scheme may cost a bit more. It may also mean that the ratio of trainers to trainees may have to be somewhat high. It is time that the Ministry of Defence was asked to take on some of the obligations that the nation requires of it, and the Ministry is in an advantageous position to try to deal with some of our most disadvantaged kids.

Mr. Wiggin: I agree with much of what the right hon. Gentleman says. At the time the scheme was introduced the armed services made the valid point that the entry standards for young people for YTS should not be different from those for the ordinary service man. The problem of age comes into this. I was interested in the right hon. Gentleman's comments about the Royal Navy. The Royal Navy has traditionally had serving boys, and if the services are prepared to take on 16-year-old boys as Regular soldiers, airmen and sailors, life would be a great deal easier. That point has caused a lot of difficulty about entry. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would not wish the Ministry of Defence to take on the role of an educationist.

Dr. Owen: I am afraid that I do think so. The cost should not be borne by the armed services' budget but by the Manpower Services Commission's budget. It is not reasonable to ask that the cost should be borne by the armed services' budget which, heaven only knows, will be deeply stretched over the next few years. With a 7 per cent. reduction in real terms we cannot ask the armed services to bear the cost of a social responsibility. But the armed services are particularly well equipped to take on the obligation of the social responsibility and some of the stresses and strains of that, and should do so.

Now that the scheme will last for two years, it is easier to justify people of a lower educational attainment being taken on and being part of a head-start programme. It is much easier to justify taking on some kids with a truancy rate and a record of drug addiction or petty crime. Those are the very people who often are not accepted on the civilian youth training schemes because they are seen as being a disruptive force, as indeed they are. It is perfectly understandable that a factory or small employer would find that difficult. People in the probation service and elsewhere cannot place such kids. The armed services could meet that need and we should ask them to do so.

The programme should last for three years, and during that time the kids would catch up and the head-start scheme would succeed. Educational attainments would be improved and many would then apply to stay on in the armed services as professionals. At that juncture they should meet all the educational and other requirements for full-time professional service. The value of such a scheme has already been proven by its success in the United States and we could have such a scheme in Britain.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): There is one problem in what the right hon. Gentleman has been saying. We are, and I hope that he is as well, thinking of a voluntary scheme. In my experience of drug addiction and the sort of people about whom he is talking, the voluntary nature of the scheme would have to be somewhat forcibly put, in order to get those people to enter into any scheme involving discipline and the armed forces.

Dr. Owen: Yes, there is no doubt that a kid who is on drugs will not volunteer to enter such a scheme. However, once they have gone through the withdrawal period and they are off drugs, they are often only too well aware how vulnerable they would be if they went back into their community to an atmosphere of urban decay and decline and a culture of drug-taking. I am advised that people believe that some children who have come off drugs, who have been on probation or have had some problems in the courts would volunteer because they are keen that they should be given a second chance, or even, one could argue, a first chance. Such people get depressed after endless applications for youth training schemes and constant refusal. It is then that they go back into crime or on to drugs. I believe that that is the experience of schoolmasters too. They feel that some of those people are attracted to the challenge of the armed services. They are often physically fit people who like the idea of some of the outdoor activities that would go with such a scheme. The young sailors' scheme has been referred to. Many people who are attracted initially into such schemes would not necessarily have high educational attainment and they often have high rates of truancy.

Somebody must make a start. We cannot let such kids go on with no chance. The needs are not being met by the existing system and it is much easier for the Government to do something. It is not wholly a matter for the Ministry of Defence. The Department of Health and Social Security and the Department of the Environment have a role to play. But private employers will not do much. It is extraordinarily difficult to ask them to take into youth training schemes kids with a bad record who will be bad risks and difficult to handle. It is my strong belief that the Ministry of Defence should be giving such a lead.

I have already made it clear that the money for such a scheme should not be taken from the Ministry of Defence budget. It must be funded by all of us. But let me deal with the cultural atmosphere. France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Holland, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Sweden and Switzerland do not have fully professional armed services. They have a system of volunteers. They do not do that purely and simply because it is cheaper. There is a philosophical point here. They want the armed services to be part of the life of the nation.

I am not arguing that we should go back on the earlier decision. We should keep the professional armed forces for as long as we humanly possibly can. The self-restraint and control that the Army in particular, and the Marines, have demonstrated in Northern Ireland has shown the immense value of professional armed forces. The provocation, tension and strain of service in Northern Ireland would have been very difficult for a conscript service.

As our services become ever more sophisticated the need for ever more highly skilled people grows. A petty officer in the Navy these days is a highly skilled technician. The Navy is very different from what it was even 20 years ago. Therefore, I am not arguing against a professional armed force, although I am putting up a warning. I am not altogether sure how long Britain will be able to fund a fully professional armed service to the extent that we have been doing. I say bluntly that if people start saying that we must make slashing cuts in the British Army of the Rhine, I for one would be perfectly prepared to consider the continental system.

I am committed to a professional armed service as long as it is possible to maintain and sustain it. If our national economic difficulties go on and our national economic decline continues and we cannot fund the necessary level of armed services, we shall have to reconsider the matter. That is a separate point. It is part of the philosophy that underlies the resistance inside the Ministry of Defence to this scheme. The Ministry does not think that it has a social obligation. It thinks that it is all right to be cocooned in a wholly professional atmosphere, and it is wrong. If it is not forced in this small way to widen its horizons and to take on a social obligation—at no extra cost to the defence budget but at considerabl extra cost in terms of effort and energy—we shall all regret it.

I wish the Minister all strength to his elbow. Frankly, he will not be able to carry out such a scheme unless it is made abundantly clear on the Floor of the House of Commons, on as much of a cross-party basis as is humanly possible, that the scheme is, in origin, right. It has been badly conducted and poorly carried out and it has not had the necessary commitment.

The Secretary of State must bring the chiefs into a room and give them their marching orders. The Ministry of Defence is one of the best Ministries in Whitehall. When the Secretary of State says that something should be done, it is done. People must be told that the scheme will be given priority. The one thing that the Secretary of State must get from the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a commitment that the scheme will be funded by the MSC funds and not the Ministry of Defence. I hope that that message will go loud and clear to the Secretary of State and the Chancellor and that the Government will act quickly.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I support the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart). The House not only congratulates him on it but is thankful to him for giving us this opportunity to have this important debate.

I strongly support the idea of voluntary military service. It is good for the youth of our nation and it is for the nation in that it enhances our defence capability. In addition, it enhances our social fabric, particularly the talents and occupations of our young people.

But, as the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has already said, the armed forces have consistently poured cold water on such ideas on the ground of cost. The budget should be shared not only by the MSC vote, but, if necessary, by the Departments of Health and Social Security and the Home Office. Those Department have something to gain by having young people in the armed forces.

The second reason why the armed forces tend to pour cold water on the scheme is that they object to the mix with the regular forces. I am currently serving as a Territorial soldier in a regular infantry brigade—the 1st Infantry Brigade at Tidworth. I have seen that the integration of part-time and regular soldiers can work extremely well. There is a role to play.

I believe that defence is essentially capability times will. That is important, because if the capability or will is zero, the equation is nil. It is interesting to note that there is strong reason to suspect that Mr. Costa Méndez advised President Galtieri that the British did not have the will to defend the Falklands, primarily because we showed a lack of will by withdrawing forces from the east of Suez and the Mediterranean only a few years before.

This form of youth service and voluntary national service will enhance not only our capability but our will. The primary role of the armed forces is the defence of our national interest in times of war and peace and that implies two basic capabilities. First, we must exert a presence to deter aggression and to monitor or act in a surveillance role. Secondly, the most obvious role is to exert a decisive hitting power.

Modern sophisticated armed forces are extremely expensive. Integrated weapons systems and the highly trained and highly skilled manpower needed to operate them are very expensive, and the expense is growing fast. I believe that an issue which will haunt not only this Government but every Government for decades to come will be how we can continue to afford the enormous escalating bill for defence. I think that voluntary national service could have a tremendous impact on that bill.

The hitting power capability is highly sophisticated and therefore highly expensive. It is an ideal role for regular forces who often prove their excellence. The presence role is much less highly technical and involves little more than basic training. None the less, it is very important and involves a great deal of manpower. It concerns me greatly that exercise Brave Defender showed that we are woefully lacking in the presence role in the defence of the country if it comes to a war. For the total defence of this nation to be truly effective, we need much more manpower, particularly in what I call the presence, surveillance and deterrence role. I think that that is ideally fitted for the Territorial Army, the reserve forces and the home defence force.

It is interesting that at a time of need for manpower, which exercise Brave Defender must have written large in the eyes of Ministers in the Ministry of Defence, we have high youth unemployment. What a marvellous coincidence. I agree strongly with the right hon. Member for Devonport in that I think that the armed forces have a part to play in the social role of the Government. That must be taken on board by my hon. Friend the Minister.

I agreed to speak for less than five minutes, so I shall say no more. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham. I shall not repeat what he has said, because I agree with it, but I should like to thank him for his motion and say that I strongly support it. The idea of applying the youth training scheme to voluntary national service is excellent, and it is in the national interest. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take serious note of his proposal.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I join other hon. Gentlemen in welcoming the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), with whom I have worked closely on other matters unconnected with today's debate. We have had an interesting and excellent debate so far.

I hope that the House will bear with me while I try to analyse some of the background as to how we got to our present position. We have to put the debate in the context of a growing interest among the public and in the House in schemes of national and community service.

The scheme that has been presented this morning does not stand on its own. Many other organisations and personalities have put forward schemes on parallel lines, if not of the same strength or in the same way. The whole area of community or national service for young people is an idea which had been persistently, if intermittently, attractive to politicians of all parties. It has also found widespread support among the public, including supporters of all parties. That is not surprising, certainly at a time of high unemployment and of a shortage of skilled people.

The idea that young people should apply themselves to the benefit of others and do useful work while acquiring the habit of diligence and the attitude of service, has a compelling simplicity, especially when so many young people are cooling their heels on the dole and many of the general public suspect that they are acquiring an outlook which will serve them and society ill in later life.

In 1980 and 1981 an organisation called Youth Call emerged as a movement for compulsory community-national service. An associated poll by The Observer at that time found a majority of the public in support of a national community service. Later, in 1984, there was a further wave of interest. Opinion polls were conducted and given extensive coverage in national newspapers. The surprisingly high figure of 80 per cent. favoured either voluntary or compulsory community national service. An associated study was carried out by David Marsland which claimed to identify hundreds of thousands of jobs which could usefully be done by participants in a national community service scheme. It is clear that the notion of this form of scheme and service by young people strikes a chord with the general public and it is right that it should receive the most serious consideration by the House.

I want to spend some time on the principles which should guide that consideration. This morning's debate has already shown that there are some serious ambivalences in what is intended among many people who might have a general concern and think that some form of national or community service is a good idea.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the armed services would have a very important role to play in the theme he is developing?

Mr. Sheerman: Indeed. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to develop my theme because this is a debate which we should take seriously, and I want to underline and analyse some of the background. I think that that is how we should deal with a serious debate, which I think the hon. Member for Beckenham intended.

We must not only acknowledge but state with the utmost vehemence that there are hundreds of thousands of young people who are currently without work and without hope. There can be little doubt that their talents are wasting, their skills, if they have them, are withering, and their attitudes to life and work are deteriorating. There are 500,000 people under 25 who have been unemployed for over six months. A third of a million are unemployed and have never had a job since leaving school. Meanwhile, there are jobs to be done to the benefit of the community in social services, the health service and in caring of all kinds.

There is work to be done in the environment beautifying our cities and repairing and building the national stock of housing, railways, roads and canals, just to name a few. We must not assume that the unemployed are idle in their enforced leisure, but we know enough about the number who desperately want to work and do something creative to know that satisfying, constructive work is badly needed.

Secondly, in these days of refusal by the Government to acknowledge the need to support and properly fund the many badly needed services, we must proclaim the fundamental importance of introducing all young people to the values of caring for others, respect for the environment and commitment to public service. Not only are such values sadly lacking among many of the alienated youth in the inner cities, but they are lacking, perhaps more so, among the young ex-public school fogies whose lives are sheltered from the realities of life for those without the benefit of a silver spoon, and in whom the absence of caring attitudes is, for that reason, more reprehensible.

Thirdly, we must note the importance to employers of having young employees who have had an opportunity to develop their personal qualities, can work easily with others and have self-reliance and a capacity for initiative and leadership, to which a period in service to the community could undoubtedly contribute. Self-esteem, a sense of responsibility and overall maturity are of value not just for the individual but for the employer and society as a whole.

Mr. Jim Spicer: The hon. Gentleman is developing his theme extremely well, but I wonder when he will address himself to the main point of the debate. He has avoided any discussion about national service and the terms of the debate.

Mr. Sheerman: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. However, I should like to proceed with my analysis and then I shall come back to that point.

All those arguments point strongly in the direction of national service for youth, but there are some dangers. Once I have looked at some of the dangers, I shall come back to the terms of the motion. The first danger is the spectre of compulsion. Schemes that proclaim their voluntary character often become, in practice or through the dictates of implementing them equitably, overlaid with compulsion, as one of the prime movers of Youth Call, Jane Prior, found to her distress. We have begun to witness that in the youth training scheme.

I was interested to hear the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) develop his argument, which revealed the difference between what was intended for a national service scheme in the armed forces and what it might develop into. Would it be a scheme, as is intended by the hon. Member for Beckenham, which would eventually supply a military need and be an asset to the armed forces, or would it be a scheme for the most alienated, deprived and unqualified of our young people, to give them a short, sharp shock? The ambivalence of that came out clearly in the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. I also had a feeling that an element of compulsion to go on to those schemes was an underlying theme of the right hon. Gentleman's general argument.

The first danger is the spectre of compulsion. Secondly, there is the danger that those schemes can become confined to young people who are unemployed and disadvantaged, as the right hon. Member for Devonport said. Hence, they often entrench the very things that one is trying to get rid of. They entrench social division and resentment because they are for a particular sort of young person—not for all youth, but for a particular sort of problem youth. That is a very real danger.

Many people see clearly the advantages of national service of one sort or another for other people's unemployed children, while, of course, their own will be far too busy doing important things such as taking A-levels and preparing for university, or even going on to a commission in the Army, Navy or Air Force.

Thirdly, there is the problem of how young people's co-operation and commitment is managed—the essence of the service ideal. How can it be retained in the long term, in the face of any element or threat of compulsion? Fourthly, there is the practical problem of payment. If it is too low, compulsion becomes necessary to enforce participation, and the schemes run the risk of the stigma of cheap labour. If the payment is too high, the cost may bear comparison with alternatives that have more value for young people and society as a whole. Then there is the problem of job substitution. There is little net additional virtue in a scheme that displaces as many good works as it accomplishes.

Finally, there is militarism, and the point at which a concern to encourage caring dissipates into a desire to promote self-discipline. That is to be promoted by the curious paradox of attempting to induce it by an overdose of discipline imposed externally through a military regime. One acute observer described Youth Cell in 1981 as "an unholy alliance of cranks and aging militarists".

I do not think that most people who have contributed to the debate can be classified under either of those heads, but the ideals of community service deserve better champions than that.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): The hon. Gentleman said that he is against compulsion. Does he mean only complusion for military service, or would he be against compulsion for a scheme that combined service to the community and military service?

Mr. Sheerman: I should be fundamentally against compulsion for any such scheme, as my colleagues and I have been fundamentally against any compulsion to enter youth training schemes or community programmes.

At the end of the day, any proposal for a form of national service must face the fundamental issue provided so effectively by another organisation, called Youth Choice, which grew up to oppose the ill-thought-out proposals of Youth Call. What is it that young people want and need? Instead of treating young people as a problem to be eliminated, we need to recognise them as a potential to be enlisted. In recent surveys, while 80 per cent. of all respondents favoured national community service of some sort, 82 per cent. of those aged 15 to 24 preferred a proper job or a college place to any sort of community service. The most pressing problem for those young people and our society as a whole is how to train those young people and how to enlist them as full, contributing and valued members of our society. There is room in the programmes for all young people's education, training and preparation for life for an element of community or national service, but it must be part of a comprehensive scheme for helping young people to achieve the transition to the financial, occupational and personal independence to which they are entitled. That is the anlaysis that lies behind the motion that we are debating.

The Labour party believes in having a fully professional army. It believes that it should be a voluntary army, not an enlisted or enforced army. We do not believe that there should be compulsory national service. We also believe, with other hon. Members who have spoken today, that there is an enormous capacity and capability for the armed services to train people. As others have said this morning, the tragedy of our nation is that there are about 4 million unemployed people. We also have a shortage of skilled people, which is affecting industries from the high-tech industries to an industry that the Minister and I know well —the textile industry.

We are having the debate in the context of hon. Members calling for the Army, the Navy and the Air Force to take an active role in skills training for young people. In that context, the proposals will take money from other organisations doing similar jobs. Conservative Members seem to think, as the right hon. Member for Devonport said, that such a scheme would be funded not by the defence budget, but by that of the Manpower Services Commission. That is rather odd. There is mass youth unemployment, but when all the figures are boiled down, the MSC spends less than £1.2 billion on those 400,000 young people. Moreover, it is ironic that although we are changing from a one-year to a two-year scheme, the budget will be practically the same.

Conservative Members have already said that we cannot get skills training on the cheap. We know that from our experience in the services. People cannot be trained to be competent, to have confidence in themselves and to make a real contribution to the services on the cheap. Training is expensive. The quality of training, the machinery, technology and the skills of the instructors at military establishments in Devonport, Portsmouth and elsewhere leave one full of envy by comparison with our youth training scheme, the community programme, skillcentres, or even our colleges of further education. The services take skills training very seriously.

If we believe in training our people, whether through the armed services, the MSC or through our education system, we must pay for it. The proposals in the motion come ill at a time when the Government have closed the skillcentre network. Interestingly enough, many of the instructors at skillcentres were trained in the armed forces, and in many ways the techniques used resemble those found in the armed services. Nevertheless, one third of our skillcentres have been closed, and many of them in the areas of high unemployment.

Most of the industrial training boards have been closed. Apparently we do not need planning in most of our industrial sectors. The levy system that ensured that employers carried out training has been swept away, and as a result there is now total dependence on voluntarism in training. Our employers pay only 0·15 per cent. of turnover towards training, compared with 2 or 3 per cent. in our competitor countries of Germany, Japan and America. Although a massive youth training scheme has been introduced, there has been a collapse in our apprenticeship system.

What on earth are we doing discussing this motion? Of course the Labour party believes in skills training. It would be very much in favour of using spare capacity in the armed services to train young people to a high level of competence, and of using all available resources. It is a disgrace to our nation if young people and adults are unemployed and without skills at a time when there is a capacity to train them in skillcentres or in the armed services. I go around the country and have seen for myself that the record of the past seven years is one of closures. Indeed, prime training capacity has been lost in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Devonport——

Dr. Owen: I do not quite understand whether the hon. Gentleman is in favour of expanding the armed forces' youth training scheme to two years and of finding the money to continue it. We all want to know the answer to that question.

Mr. Sheerman: I did not interrupt the right hon. Gentleman when he made his speech and I let him make it in his own way. However, I shall come to that point shortly.

The Labour party opposed the introduction of a youth training scheme in the services because it did not believe that a link with a military element in the programme——

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Sheerman: I shall not give way as I wish to finish my point.

We opposed the introduction of a youth training scheme in the armed services and we still oppose its introduction. Indeed, the take-up has been very small and represents a failure. Hon. Members have said that the small take-up is due to mischievous chiefs of staff not being in favour of the scheme. They say that Chiefs of Staff never wanted it, and have prevented it. But I do not believe that. I believe that young people were not attracted to the idea. There is some truth in the argument that the army did not go into the scheme very enthusiastically, but if that was so, the Government should have said that the programme was something that the Government wanted and should be delivered.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that in the unlikely event of a Labour Government the armed forces youth training scheme would be stopped?

Mr. Sheerman: That would be a very serious consideration. After the next general election, the Labour Government will consider the skills needed and the potential for delivering them. The Labour party has nothing against using the capability of the armed services for training young people. I come back again to the speech by the Minister in 1980. The first year involved basic military training. The Labour party would certainly be against that as a component. The next part was community work, and the third part was industrial and craft training.

[Mr. Sheerman]

I do not think that the Labour party would find anything wrong with the latter two parts of the scheme. A Labour Government would find nothing wrong with using the armed services capability for training, but they would not want military training. The difference between the two types of training should be stressed.

The right hon. Member for Devonport started by talking about the parallel with the head-start programme, and the desire to use the fine skills that exist in the armed services to train people. He talked about a scandalous lack of investment in skill training, and I absolutely agree with that. However, once one starts talking about using the armed services for training, two arguments quickly emerge. For example, the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) wants 15,000 people to be trained for 100 days with the possibility of them being interested in becoming recruited as professionals into the services. The hon. Gentleman believes in that argument, and I accept that it has a respectable pedigree. But I must say that I do not agree with it. However, it is disturbing that the right hon. Member for Devonport should begin with that sort of argument, but end up identifying the role of the armed services as being targeted on the low achiever, those with drug problems, and those suffering from the dreadful deprivation of our inner cities.

The hon. Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) put his finger on the flaw in the argument. It is common sense —the take-up of the youth training scheme in the armed services bears this out—that there would be minimal take-up of two or three-year schemes for underprivileged youngsters unless they were made compulsory. The Social Democrats have taken a great interest in this. Indeed, they take a great interest in anything which the opinion polls say might win them some votes. The danger of the alliance's attitude is that implicit in its arguments is that it would make the scheme compulsory for underprivileged youngsters.

Dr. Owen: I specifically excluded that suggestion. It is a typical slur from the hon. Gentleman. I made it clear that that was neither our wish or our intention. Indeed, it would be completely against my philosophy and of that of the Social Democratic party. The hon. Gentleman has widened the debate into discussing a national volunteer community service, although I thought it was confined to the armed services, but he still does not accept that the present services scheme is training people. I gather that he would not wish that scheme to continue, but similar schemes have been used in many countries to give youngsters a head start. Some police forces have taken on low achievers to try to encourage black people to join the force. The idea is to give people a special start. The hon. Gentleman, with his Socialist philosophy, should be in favour of such a scheme.

Mr. Sheerman: My Socialist philosophy, which the right hon. Gentleman so recently shared, leads me to believe that we should have special programmes for underprivileged youngsters, but the Labour party does not believe that they should come within the ambit of the armed services and it does not believe that they should be made compulsory. The right hon. Gentleman has no right to suggest that I am casting a slur on his speech or his reputation, if that was necessary, by saying that the logic of his argument leads to compulsion. He did not say that he agreed with compulsion, but the logic of his argument leads to that conclusion. If there was no compulsion, youngsters would not take up the scheme.

When one gets behind the right hon. Gentleman's soft words and tones, one finds the more militaristic wing of the argument. I do not wish to be too hard on the hon. Member for Beckenham, but he used the language not of the short, sharp shock, which proved so disastrous for our young offenders, but of the short, sharp challenge. The right hon. Member for Devonport and Conservative Members have something in common. They believe that short, sharp shocks for delinquent youngsters, for youngsters with problems and for low achievers is the way to sort them out. Anyone who read the fascinating analysis of the right hon. Gentleman's political ideas that was written by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) will have seen the interesting link between his ideas and those of the Tory party on short, sharp challenges.

Mr. Wilkinson: The hon. Gentleman's speech is neither short nor sharp.

Mr. Sheerman: Indeed. The interventions threw me a little off the main thrust of my speech, but I shall end now.

The Labour party wants a professional Army. It does not want a national service that brings in 15,000 people for 100 days and pays them double the YTS training allowance. The Labour party believes that we must expand all our resources to train our people to their fullest potential. Youngsters are crying out for such training. The Labour party admires the competence of our professional armed services and believes that they could play a major role in a unified and co-ordinated attempt to bring British youngsters to the level of skills and competence that has been achieved by our industrial competitors. However, we do not want such training to have a military element. Some hon. Members may say that the Opposition want to have their cake and eat it, but we believe that that is a sensible alternative.

11.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): It may be convenient to the House if I intervene now. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) on the wording of his motion, which I commend to the House. I am grateful for his kind comments about our reserve forces, and I praise his research skills in revealing my past.

The Government have given the reserve forces the high priority that they deserve. We have set about the expansion of the reserves for all three services, and we have reason to be proud of what we have achieved. I shall explain how far we have got, and what we plan for the future.

We are making good progress with the planned expansion of the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Marines Reserve. Thanks to an excellent response to our recruiting advertising, the Royal Naval Reserve's strength is close to the target we set ourselves, and the Royal Marines Reserve is well on target to reach its expanded ceiling of 1,580 during the next few years.

The Territorial Army had done just as well. I am pleased to say that it is now more than 77,000 strong, an increase of about 18,000 since 1979. The current annual increase is in excess of the 3,000 a year required to meet expansion targets. The second phase of our plans includes the formation of six new infantry battalions, two more Royal Engineers airfield damage repair squadrons and a new Army Air Corps squadron. That shows the scale of what we are achieving.

We have enjoyed similar success with the Home Service force. About 92 per cent. of its strength turned out for exercise Brave Defender last September and, despite its recent formation, it proved to be fully capable of discharging its central task of guarding key points. Since the beginning of last year, 42 of the eventual 47 companies have begun to form, and recruitment has reached 69 per cent. of an establishment of nearly 5,000.

The Royal Air Force Reserve forces have also made strides. The Royal Auxiliary Air Force especially has been undergoing a major expansion since 1979 from a strength of a mere 250 towards about 1,300—a fivefold increase which illustrates the importance that we attach to the reserves. That expansion has led to the assumption of some new roles for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, including ground defence, air defence gunnery, movements and aeromedical evacuation.

The Royal Naval Auxiliary service has a slightly different status as an unpaid civilian volunteer service. It has a vital wartime role in support of the Navy at key United Kingdom ports and anchorages. Its tasks now include the manning and running of about a third of the vessels that would be needed in those areas, and this splendid force will be increasing in numbers from the present 2,800 to 3,000. Recruiting for this is well under way.

Of course, this pattern of expansion throughout our reserve forces would be of little value if we had not at the same time produced the equipment that they need. The scale of this varies greatly according to their roles. Some reservists are intended to release individual Regular service men in time of crisis for tasks which only they can undertake; in other cases, reservists will form up in complete units alongside regular units. Last year, for example, we announced several trials into the employment of Royal Auxiliary Air Force and RAF volunteer reserve personnel — 70 strong — in several further roles, including a 2,000 — strong auxiliary support force similar to the Army's Home Service force, a trial of two university air squadrons of RAF volunteer reserve instructors which, if successful, would release qualified flying instructors to the front line, the formation of a further RAFVR intelligence flight at Strike Command to provide intelligence support at headquarters and front-line units, and a two-year trial into the feasibility and cost-effectiveness of recruiting RAF volunteer reservists to serve as aircrew in regular RAF squadrons, in aircraft such as Nimrod, MR and VC10s. Other possible uses of reservists, in ground and aircrew roles, are under consideration for the future.

The take-up and use of civilian helicopters was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham, and he has taken up the issue in single-service debates. The cost of arming civilian helicopters would be extremely high. In the current financial climate, the installation, support and crew training involved with weapon systems alone would be prohibitively expensive. However, it is clear that larger civilian helicopters could undertake a number of important tasks. We are studying this possibility in the wide-ranging examination of the future role of support helicopters, about which I gave details to the House during the RAF debate on 26 February.

Against this background of expansion we are investing in new equipment for the reserves. For example, by the middle of 1986 all 11 RNR sea-training centres will be equipped with the new River class of fleet minesweeper, one of which, HMS Spey, was launched by my wife. New fast patrol boats should be in service by the autumn.

But it is not enough even to provide men and equipment. Thorough training is also essential if our reserves are to be fitted to meet the responsibilities that are placed on them. We shall maintain our campaign to educate employers and persuade them of the importance of offering employees every assistance in the continued participation in reserve force activities. The new independent national committee for employer liaison under the chairmanship of Mr. Tommy McPherson, is intended to reinforce this process. Employers' whole-hearted support is vital to our plans

All in all, I believe that the Government can be proud of this record. As I have indicated, we have a wide range of improvements under way, and I can assure the House that under this Government the reserves will be no less of a priority in the future.

I would like also to take this opportunity to mention the current manning situation in the armed forces. Although there are continuing shortfalls in trained strengths for officers of some 1,000, or 2·7 per cent., service men and women's numbers are very satisfactory, being only 900, or 0·3 per cent., down on trained requirement. However, these overall figures do obscure larger shortfalls in particular areas, especially specialists, where competition for available manpower is traditionally fierce in the labour market, and the attractions of alternative employment outside the forces that much greater. Shortages also in part reflect the overriding control of ceilings on total manpower, covering both trained numbers and those under training. I am happy to say that recruitment overall to the Regular forces remains generally satisfactory. Most recruiting targets are being met. Voluntary outflow has not reached a critical level although it is causing concern, especially for Army officers.

My hon. Friend has at some length questioned the value of the armed services youth training scheme. This is, of course, part of the overall and wider youth training scheme which was introduced by the Government in 1983 because far too many young people were entering the labour market without skills or qualifications. We offered a year's broad-based training and planned work experience to 16 and some 17-year-olds and, three years later, the statistics of success speak for themselves. Since 1983, more than a million youngsters have joined YTS; two thirds of them go into work, further education or further training afterwards.

YTS has indeed been successful but the Government recognised that it could be made better. It was apparent that many youngsters on YTS and their employees wanted more occupationally relevant training, building on the foundation that we had already established. We recognised also that we should aim to offer all YTS entrants the chance to gain a recognised vocational qualification or credit towards one. So from next month we shall be investing £1 billion a year of public money, offering two years' training to 16-year-old school leavers and one year for 17-year-old leavers. Two year YTS will be an integral and permanent part of vocational education and training provision offering opportunities for qualifications which employers respect and young people value.

Comprehensive provision is, therefore, already available to meet the training needs of 16 and 17-years-old, including those youngsters who are interested in taking part in the armed services. Our scheme has been in place since August 1983 and runs parellel to the civilian YTS. Since the start of the scheme the ASYTS has attracted 9,000 applications for some 6,000 places. Of those applying 2,700 have been accepted and over 2,200 trainees have already attended courses. I am particularly pleased that 860 youngsters have subsequently converted to regular service engagements. Not surprisingly, having acquired a taste for service life, trainees want the benefit of service pay and work. Although I am disappointed that it has not been possible to fill all the places available on the scheme, I am nonetheless satisfied that the ASYTS has made a useful contribution in the important area of offering young people training and worthwhile work experience. Many of those who have entered the scheme have done well and some have reached impressive standards. A wide range of trades and skills are taught, including driving, secretarial, cooking and electronics. Excellent opportunities are also offered for pariticipation in sports and other activities. Trainees should find that their prospects of finding a job after completing the scheme will be enhanced considerably by the high quality of training that they receive in the services.

Of course, ASYTS trainees are required to train and work alongside regular counterparts on existing courses, whose own standards are high. No doubt our requirements for high standards of entry have an effect on the entry level. However, if we were to lower minimum standards the weaker trainees would have difficulty in keeping up with the training and work experience, and that would be unfair to the individuals concerned. I listened with care to the arguments advanced by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) about the high entry standard that we demand. I shall consider what he said about a possible lowering of the standard to accommodate the wider scheme that he has in mind.

I illustrate my point by saying that in this financial year we are offering 2,209 places, and so far there have been 2,407 applicants, of which 852 have been accepted and 810 have attended courses. Although we have not filled all the places available, there has been a healthy rise in the level of recruitment in the latter part of 1985. All of the months from August-November set new strength records for the scheme, producing an average strength of 700 for those months. Hon Members will be aware of our plans to extend the current one-year scheme to a two-year scheme in line, as far as possible, with the civilian YTS. I am happy to give the right hon. Member for Devonport that assurance. The two-year YTS aims, to give all trainees the opportunity to seek improved courses that result in recognised qualifications. We hope that it will prove possible for trainees to be on courses by April 1987 which ofer the opportunity of attaining a qualification or credit towards one. In the transitional period some courses will not offer the prospect of a qualification at their end, whilst we explore ways of complying with these new arrangements. Nonetheless, such courses will continue to offer valuable training and work experience.

I believe that the ASYTS is providing, and will continue to provide, an excellent opportunity for young people to gain training and work experience, and we wish that there were greater demand for it. However, it is not, and was never intended to be, any kind of an answer to the relatively minimal and very specialised recruitment and manning difficulties that exist in the armed forces, the basis of which are being properly investigated and which we shall do our utmost to remedy. I wish to put on record that within the Ministry of Defence we have an excellent civilian YTS scheme and about 680 youngsters are on it at present. The scheme is split almost equally between the United Kingdom and Germany.

However, I regret to have to say that, laudable though the objective is, basic training on that sort of scale for so short a period would be questionable both for the individual and in defence policy terms. The modern Army is professional and highly trained. However, I take the point made by the right hon. Member for Devonport about the dangers of a professional force and the MOD being somewhat cocooned from the community at large, and we must take his observations and comments on board and consider them, I accept what he said about the possible dangers. Training is specialised, in depth and inevitably expensive. Given the finite resources available, it is essential to achieve an adequate return on our investment in training in the form of many years of service by the individual soldier.

As the House is aware, it is our policy for the Army to maximise its deterrent force by shifting resources and manpower from support functions to the frontline operational units. Part of this policy of trimming the tail and sharpening the teeth has been to ensure that the training organisation is maintained at the most economic level to meet its task. Consequently there is now little, if any, spare capacity in our training organisation. We simply, therefore, do not have the headroom on anything like the scale envisaged by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham to train 15,000 additional junior soldiers.

Inevitably, there is also a cost aspect to that. On 1985-86 capitation rates, 15,000 recruits on strength for 100 days would cost some £40 million in pay and personal costs alone. I have to say to my hon. Friend that I see little prospect of such funding being made available from the defence budget or by the Manpower Services Commission. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Devonport and other hon. Members who have spoken in that they did not suggest that the funding for the wider scheme that they advocate should come from our increasingly tight Ministry of Defence budget, but from wider Government resources.

It would also be fair to say that the young man or woman would get little benefit from only three months in the Army. It is too short a period to appreciate the practical and stimulating side of Army life, and to do more, than merely "square bashing". There would be no opportunity properly to learn any of the specialists skills that together make up the panoply of the modern Army. For the purposes of youth training in skills which are valuable in the civil life of this country, I believe we must continue to look to the armed services youth training scheme which, as I mentioned earlier, offers sound training and is now to be extended over two years and allied to a trade qualification.

In the specific case of candidates wanting Army experience between school and university, which I think my hon. Friend mentioned as an example of those who might be attracted by his scheme, I should explain that we recognise the value of short-term attachments for potential officers, and make provision for it, in a number of ways. For the candidate of clear officer potential there is the opportunity to do a short course at the royal military academy, Sandhurst followed by up to 18 months' experience on a unit attachment with a short service limited commission—about 50 a year are taken in on that basis—prior to going up to university. I should emphasise that the SSLC is for top quality candidates who will be ambassadors for the Army in their university careers. Many of them take up regular commissions or join the Territorial Army later. Another opportunity, this time for those whose officer potential is less clear-cut, is provided candidates, mostly school leavers, considering entering the competition for a regular commission. To enhance their leadership qualities and provide a foretaste of Army life they can be sent to one of the training depots of the divisions or corps of the Army. Again, this "O" type engagement, as it is called, is relatively limited in numbers, there are only 270 at present, and geared to officer candidates. Clearly, they are not an appropriate vehicle for an expansion of the numbers of ordinary school leavers sought by my hon. Friend. But they illustrate the importance we attach to attracting the best young people into the armed forces, and to giving them the right opportunity to succeed.

When asked yesterday at Question Time by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who has pursued this theme, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

"I know my hon. Friend's views on this but it would mean an enormous change in the whole of our defence policy which is founded on professional Armed Services, and which has served the country well. Although I know that he would like to give many young people an opportunity of belonging to something like the Armed Services I do not think I can promise him anything on this so far as I can see in the future. We prefer to rely on the Armed Services youth training scheme to give some people the opportunity."—[Official Report, 20 March 1986; Vol 94, c. 410.]

That sums up the Government's view, and while I am conscious of an increasing interest on all sides of the House in the sort of scheme that my hon. Friend has in mind, I can hold out no hope of a change in our policy in the foreseeable future. Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend on the wording of his motion, which I commend to the House.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): We have been fortunate to have this motion introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), who has immense experience in this area and has consistently produced imaginative schemes for the improvement of our armed forces, particularly for the Army. We have also been fortunate to have the considered response of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement on behalf of the Ministry of Defence.

I would not wish the debate to be too narrow. It was good that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) alluded to the overall strategic context within which we must consider the issues before us. The fact is that defence expenditure is to decrease in real terms during the years ahead. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is formulating a minor review to see whether all our commitments and programmes can be carried out within the budgetary allocations that are anticipated. In my judgment, there will be a real danger that we shall not be able to carry out all our commitments or to see to fruition all the equipment programmes which our armed services would desire. In other words, something has to give.

Many Conservative Members have always insisted that a cost-effective option for the Government in those circumstances is to make increased use of the volunteer reserves and the auxiliaries who are paid only when they train or are used. My hon. Friend outlined the significant enhancements which have already taken place in our reserve forces in all three services. We are all delighted that they have occurred, and it is a credit to the Government. We see further potential along those lines.

Thirty years ago the 1956 White Paper announced the end of conscription. In that year there were 770,000 men and women under arms in the British armed forces. Today the figure is less than half of that as the number has fallen to 327,000. One key and crucial responsibility is to carry out the vital NATO commitment, the Brussels treaty commitment of the British Army of the Rhine, which involves 55,000 men plus a tactical air force on the continent of Europe in peacetime, with all volunteer forces. That major continental commitment is essentially a manpower intensive commitment, and in time of emergency or war we plan greatly to increase the strength of BAOR and, indeed, to more than double it. This can be done only by weakening the British home base, so it is more important than ever that we should have strong reserves to augment the front line in Germany and to beef up the defence of the home base.

Our reserve forces are woefully inadequate and constitute some 290,000 men and women—0·5 per cent. of the population. They include the Ulster Defence Regiment as well as all the other reserve formations. Our reserve forces are clearly inadequate compared with those of our neighbours. All the main continental neutrals have reserve forces far larger than ours—for example, the Swedes, the Swiss, the Yugoslavs, and, indeed, even, the Austrians. Every Warsaw pact country has many more reserves that we have, except for Hungary, and every NATO country has far larger reserve forces than ours, except for the Netherlands, Portugal and Canada. As a percentage of our population, our reserves are only 0·5 per cent., whereas in NATO as a whole the percentage is 1·7 per cent., in Warsaw pact countries it is 1·9 per cent., in the United States it is 1 per cent. and in the Soviet Union it is 2 per cent. That is bad enough, but what makes the matter worse is that, because our armed forces are all regular and, therefore, expensive to maintain, the size of our armed forces as a whole as a percentage of the population is far lower than that of most comparable countries.

For ourselves, 0·59 per cent. of the population is in the armed forces as a whole. In NATO the figure is 1·35 per cent., in the Warsaw pact 1·65 per cent., in the United States 0·9 per cent. and in the USSR 1·9 per cent. As the defence budget will decline in real terms and as for political reasons I see little likelihood of a change in our basic strategic commitments, we must look at manpower policies and enhance our reserves.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does my hon. Friend agree that he should also consider the important role of the reservist in line with the serious haemorrhage of experienced and highly trained regular Army officers who are deciding to leave the forces?

Mr. Wilkinson: My hon. Friend is right. That is a problem not only in the Army but in the Royal Air Force, which is the service I know better. To their credit, the Government are seeking to enhance the training available to the regular reserves and to give them a week's training after three years, and this is an improvement. The problem to which my hon. Friend alludes is serious.

In Europe as a whole, as I pointed out in the debate on the Royal Air Force on 26 February, when I urged that we should get away from the taboo of discussing national service, we are the only major country without conscription. The others that do not have conscription are Ireland, Luxembourg, Malta, Monaco, San Marino, Liechstenstein and Andorra. They are all fine countries in their way, but, with the sole exception of Luxembourg, they are neutral and they are all, significantly, small countries.

In the world as a whole, 61 per cent. of the states have national service. Perhaps the most interesting exception tends to be Commonwealth countries, perhaps because they follow the British model. In the NATO order of battle, one third of the front line troops would be conscripts. In the Warsaw pact order of battle, two thirds of the front line troops would be conscripts. Therefore, at a time of high unemployment—in 1984, 25 per cent. of young people between the ages of 18 and 24 were unemployed — we should carefully reconsider the potential merits of national service. Perhaps those who did not go on to higher education or secure a job within a reasonable time after leaving school or those who do not attend a YTS programme or some other worthwhile training scheme should do national service.The counter argument was that put forward by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), that it would be wrong for only the disadvantaged to have to do national service. He could be right. If that is the case, and if we take the arguments implicitly put by the right hon. Member for Devonport, perhaps it should be a universal scheme, if that is the way we wish to go.

In "virgin soldier" days, in the old-style post-war national service, there were many examples of occasions when conscripts saw operational service — in Korea, Kenya, Malaya and Cyprus. They were not criticised; their performance on the whole was good. Today, fortunately, the opportunity for operational service by conscripts, if national service were reintroduced, would probably be small, but there is a chance for overseas service. They can go to Belize, Gibraltar, Cyprus, the Falklands or Germany. This would be valuable experience to them in addition to the technical training that they can receive.

I have always argued that one of the principal benefits of national service is the technical training, and that is why the admirable, in other respects, scheme that my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham has proposed is deficient. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, 100 days is not an adequate period in which to learn a technical skill that will assure a conscript a job in today's industry and commerce. People need longer than that. Interestingly, perhaps for demographic reasons above all, the Germans have just increased their national service from a year to 15 months, and got it through the Bundestag without too much of a problem.

For strategic reasons, we should look at this matter again. Reserves have an important part to play in increasing the contact between the regular forces and the community and in providing training opportunities for young people. We need to be able to expand our front line more than we can at present because our reserves are inadequate. If we had national service, we could more easily fulfil our central European commitment through BAOR, and we would find it easier to have trained personnel in the reserves.

The sector that I know best is the air reserves. The Royal Air Force offers opportunities for technical training better than any other service except the Navy. I can suggest three clear flying roles for the auxiliaries. One is the light support helicopter role, which has already been identified and which the Government intend to fulfil as soon as resources are available. The second is the point defence role with the Hawk, currently fulfilled by the tactical weapon unit instructors. I suggest that it should be done with dedicated aeroplanes — the new Hawk 200 single seater aircraft, for example. Thirdly, there is inshore maritime patrol. Interestingly, I have here an advertisement from Flight International which says:

> "Due to possible expansion in UK offshore patrols on behalf of the Government, a well-established UK Company invites applications from ex coastal command, pilots, navigators radar operators."

Already the benefit of service-trained aircrew for carrying out of this important inshore role has been seen by the Ministry of Defence, and auxiliary squadrons should be created for the purpose.

I applaud the decision of Her Majesty's Government to allow volunteer reservists to fly as qualified flying instructors in the university air squadrons and as aircrew on VC10s and Nimrod aircraft. Therefore, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to see whether volunteer reserve personnel could also serve as aircrew on the communications squadrons.

I whole-heartedly approve of this motion, admirably introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham, but the issue has to be examined somewhat more broadly. The debate is timely and worthwhile.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) for giving us the useful opportunity to concentrate our attention on a way in which we might seek to match some real individual needs with some important needs of our society. The scheme that he has outlined would, of itself, be most valuable. I should like to see it as an element of a wider scheme, and I was glad that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) widened the scope of the debate to allow us to consider taking the motion in a broader sense.

The personal needs that I have just mentioned are obvious to us all. It is a tragedy of this period in our national life that there are far too many unoccupied people — both young and old. There have been economic dislocations, which are the result of the interaction of many causes. The high birth rate of the 1960s led to large numbers of school leavers coming on to the jobs market only to find that the opportunities that they wanted were not there. There have been the impacts of technological change and recession. Sadly, they have resulted in many people finding themselves out of jobs rather earlier in their working lives than they might have expected.

The problems caused by the recession, and of getting rid of inflation and overmanning have led to too many people finding that society appears to have no need for their services. It is not good enough simply to write off those people merely as the casualties of unfortunate and inevitable change. Nor, for a moment, do I suggest that the Government have done so. They have produced a succession of imaginative and valuable schemes to enable people to retrain and to assist in the process of adaptation. However, I think we all acknowledge that the scale of the problem is very great and that the useful, worthwhile remedies that the Government have offered do not adequately match the problem. We find, therefore, that many older people in our society have idle skills and unsatisfied idealism. They would like to find a role for themselves. Many people, both young and old, are left with the blighting feeling that society does not need them. They feel isolated.

It is an irony of our democratic history that, although with good intentions, our liberal state has arrogated to itself more and more power and taken upon itself more and more responsibility in all sorts of fields. This has led to an atrophying of the sense of individual, local responsibility and the sense of community. Because people feel isolated they are looking for new ways in which to find that sense of community and that sense of involvement and belonging that is a very deep human need. Sometimes they find it in delinquent fashions: in a kind of tribalism by joining gangs; sometimes they place an undue emphasis upon racial identity; sometimes they show an enthusiastic allegiance, which can be wholly innocent and positive, to football clubs.

The point that I am trying to illustrate is that people have a need to belong. Therefore, the Government have been right, as a central part of their strategy to seek to devolve responsibility back to individuals, families, businesses and, importantly, to voluntary organisations which can be a focus of loyalty and pride, which enable people to give service to the community and which strengthen their sense of belonging to the community. These personal and social needs interact with one another.

At another level, it is obvious that there is work that many of us would wish to be done but which we are unable to organise to have done by the conventional means of increased public expenditure and bureaucratic organisation. At one end of the age spectrum, help is needed for meals on wheels for the elderly. At the other end of the age spectrum, physically handicapped children need to be given help. All of us are aware of the inadequacy of the present provision of services. The only realistic prospect of improving and extending the provision of services is by means of enhancing the role of the voluntary organisations.

I have direct experience, as I am sure all hon. Members have in their constituencies, of the help that the voluntary services can give in enhancing the performance of the statutory provision of services. I have seen young people lending a hand and giving help in some of the very excellent sheltered housing accommodation that we have in Warwickshire. They give a great deal of help to old people and they derive an enormous amount of satisfaction from doing so. There is an enormous amount of work to be done for the environment by clearing derelict land and repairing and improving housing, thus making our inner cities better places in which to live and attracting back business and employment opportunities. The insulation of our housing stock is a project which remains to be carried out. Even though the price of oil has come down, it is no less rational or desirable to make that national commitment. However, we will not organise to do it at a national level other than, possibly, by looking to the voluntary services.

Hon. Members will be familiar with the community programmes in their constituencies. They may share my impression that people working on community programmes who suffered from a sense of rejection and isolation and from the traumatic experience of becoming unemployed or being unable to find a job have found, through their experience of the community programme, that they have been provided with an opportunity to belong, to serve and to develop real enthusiasm. The only shame is that the scheme remains as limited as it is.

I greatly welcome the expansion of the scheme, in successive phases, and the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget. Even so, the opportunities to enter such programmes are limited. Only young people who have been through a period in which they have been unable to find employment are eligible.

We have been unable to match those who want work, those who want to contribute, with the work that there is to be done, mainly because of the cost of running a full public sector scheme. There are other objections, too, to such an approach. I think that Conservative Members would have deep reservations about any attempt to organise the carrying out of these functions on a national scale. It is better that the way in which they are organised should be generated more spontaneously at local level.

Therefore, I support what I take to be the much broader implications of the proposals that are contained in the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham: a scheme of voluntary national service that would be nationwide. One could argue about the details, but it might consist of one-year units. I was attracted by the scheme to which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement referred in his speech. In the days before the burden of his particular responsibilities fell upon his shoulders he advocated that scheme. Even in his official capacity I hope that he remains personally committed to a scheme that would contain the three elements of community service, military service and industrial training. I agree with him that if these experiences and this training are to be effective, one year is probably necessary to make the best of them. Although these opportunities should be available to all, on a voluntary basis, they should be directed mainly to the unemployed.

As other hon. Members have mentioned, it is notable, on the military side, that we are untypical of European countries. I think I am correct in saying that it is only Eire, Luxembourg and the United Kingdom in Europe that do not have a scheme of compulsory military service for young men. Since about 1956 it has been regarded as rather way out and eccentric to advocate the restoration of conscription. I say "way out and eccentric", but I defer with great respect to what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood, (Mr. Wilkinson). Nevertheless he will acknowledge that he is a pioneer in advocating such ideas again in this country.

[Mr. Alan Howarth]

Politicians have perhaps misjudged what might be the national response. I recall that 10 years ago I was with Lord Thorneycroft, when he was the chairman of the Conservative party, in Liverpool. We held a meeting with social workers in Liverpool. I must confess that I braced myself, lifted an eyebrow and was rather startled when he suggested to the assembled social workers that there might be some merit in introducing conscription. However, I was educated by that meeting because the social workers took the point extremely seriously. They were ready to talk about it and to understand what might be the virtues of conscription.

Lord Thorneycroft did not mean a scheme of military conscription exclusively. He had in mind a scheme of national service. He was prepared to argue—I hope that I do not misrepresent him—that it should be compulsory for all young people to undertake some kind of service. His idea did not fall on stony ground. That suggestion was made 10 years ago, before the enormous unemployment problem was experienced on a national scale. But at that time Liverpool was already experiencing the great sadness of large-scale unemployment. Anyone who has seen the beautiful cathedral in Liverpool, which was finally completed after many years of construction and which stands amid a sea of desolation, must realise acutely the importance of finding new ways of enlisting all the latent energies in that great city and giving people the opportunity to work there and contribute.

I believe that staff would be available to operate a scheme of national voluntary service. There are large numbers of professional social workers and people employed professionally in voluntary organisations. I would not advocate a compulsory scheme, but I think that we can encourage young people to assume that this scheme shall be the next phase of experience for them after leaving school. Schools and employers could do much to steer young people in that direction.

I believe that we would want such a scheme to be part of a wider training programme. We should recognise the inadequacies of the present national provision for training. Last night, the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission, Mr. Nicholson, was reported as having uttered a scathing indictment of our limited training achievements compared with the Germans. He was not the first person to observe that fact. The Secretary of State for Employment has probably done more than anybody else to improve our national provision for training both in his time as chairman of the MSC before Mr. Nicholson took the post and currently. The Government are well seized of the problem and have been active and effective on this front.

There is still much to be done. A well-considered scheme of national voluntary service would give young people a systematic opportunity to gain not only technical skills and the experience and habit of work but a sense of obligation to the community. Those elements would ultimately be of value not only to them as human beings but to our economy.

I believe that the scheme should be in a formal relationship with the rest of the training system. We should give a young person a credit for undertaking a period of voluntary service. What the young person learns would be seen very much as part of the continuum of education and training stretching from, say, the age of 14 to 21.

I hope that employers' organisations will willingly and enthusiastically endorse this experience as an element of the wider programme. I believe that they will discover that the graduates of this national scheme of voluntary service will be attractive and useful recruits to their businesses.

I am grateful to the House for its tolerance in allowing me to go a little wide of the motion. I should like to come now to the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham. I am very attracted to his scheme. I do not feel well qualified to comment on its details, so I am happy to defer to my hon. Friend and to other hon. Members with greater experience. I regret the fact that the hon. Member for Huddersfield felt obliged to commit the Labour party to opposing the continuation of the youth training scheme in the armed services. I shall not enlarge on that point because the hon. Gentleman is not in his place.

I endorse the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood about the inadequacy of our reserve forces. I believe that a country that is not prepared to provide the means of defending itself adequately at a conventional level and to maintain adequate reserves of people trained in military skills will lack to some degree national self-respect. The scheme proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham would do much to improve our defence capacity and credibility.

We should be prepared to take the steps needed to counter an invasion. Heaven forbid that invasion should ever occur, but it must be a basic responsiblity of our society and Government to do what they can to ensure that our people are prepared to defend themselves. Presumably, a national scheme of voluntary military service would place the emphasis on local defence. The young people involved would identify with their localities and respond. I should have thought that, from the point of view of the Ministry of Defence, it would be economic and practical for localities to be defended by local people. I wonder whether that is part of the scheme envisaged by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham. We should prepare our population for the experinece of wartime. The Government have done much to strengthen civil defence, but it is still woefully inadequate.

If emphasis were placed on defence, as clearly it would be under such a scheme, I think that some of the fears of the Labour party would be seen to be inappropriate. The ethos of defence must surely be acceptable. There is no question of militarism or of preparing the nation to be militarily aggressive. That is certainly not contemplated. The emphasis is fairly and squarely on defence. We would also have the benefit of the practical skills learnt during military service training, although my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement has rightly cautioned us against having exaggerated hopes.

In considering these issues we must contemplate the melancholy question of cost. In looking not only at the military component but at the broader scheme we can distinguish between the gross costs, which would be not inconsiderable, and the net costs. The gross costs would include the cost of personal allowances paid to the volunteers for their cost of living, the cost of professional supervision and training, and the costs of administration, equipment, meals and perhaps travel. Those costs would be offset by important savings. The net costs would be considerably reduced as a result of savings on unemployment and supplementary benefits, because participants in the scheme would be removed from the unemployment register.

I reject the option put forward by some people in considering such policies that a young person who refuses to take part in a voluntary scheme should be disqualified from receiving unemployment or supplementary benefits. If that happened, the scheme would, in effect, become compulsory. It is important for there to be no doubt about the voluntary character of the scheme. I believe also that firms would be willing to donate the services of people to train volunteers and to donate equipment. Therefore, the net costs need not be formidable.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham has introduced the debate at a timely moment, following my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget in which he greately extended tax relief on charitable donations. That is extremely relevant.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has opened up the possibility for charities to have the financial strength to make a vastly greater contribution of the kind of which they are uniquely capable. At their best, charities are economic and efficient. They are motivated to meet local needs and have local knowledge and sensitivity. They sit loosely to convention and adapt to changing circumstances. They are animated by the enthusiasm of their voluntary members rather than by directives from on high, and respond to specific needs and not to abstract theories. Charities are well suited to engage and enthuse the energies of our young people.

By their very nature, charities cannot be regimented. But there is such a wide variety of charities up and down the country that between them all I am confident that if we continue to give them the fair wind the Government have given them they will play their part. To some degree we can co-ordinate the work. Charities are willing to look for a lead from Government Departments and are willing to co-ordinate themselves under various umbrellas. The National Council for Voluntary Organisations and the volunteer centres are well established and in many ways give a practical lead to a large number of diverse charities.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education recently established a national advisory council for youth services. That could perhaps play an important part in the task of co-ordinating a large range of activities. The cost of failing to provide these opportunities for young people will be great, not just in terms of the immediately quantifiable costs to the social security budget, but in terms of the cost of a generation of young people less disciplined and less committed to responsibility and to work in the service of the community. Those costs would accumulate.

The severest economists among my hon. Friend will say this is a waste of money that cannot be jusified; that we have to allow the free play of market forces; and that any extra public expenditure in this field will be at the expense of profitable businesses to which we should look for new jobs. There may be intellectual truth in what they say, but there is a powerful human argument for another course of the kind that I have attempted to sketch.

I support my hon. Friend's proposal. I should like to see his scheme amplified so that it becomes part of the wider scheme that would promote skills and carry out useful work. It would be beneficial not just in the provision of an improved capacity for the defence of the realm but would benefit the social services, the environment and education. Above all, it would be valuable in promoting social cohesion, a sense of mutual responsibility and true neighbourliness.

12.3 pm

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I shall confine my remarks to dealing with the skilful exposition by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart). He has presented us with a unique opportunity for discussing the forces. I have the greatest respect for my hon. Friend, but whatever he may say I take the view that our reserve forces are insufficient to meet the needs they may be required to satisfy in an emergency. The reserve forces were shown to be insufficient in exercises Lionheart and Brave Defender.

Our reserve forces are vital not only for the defence of Europe and to NATO but for our defences at home. There is inadequate provision for home defence should any form of external aggression occur, because at that point we shall require many more troops to defend our own country. That is especially true when one considers that the Soviets have special infiltration forces. I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) who said that local defences should have a local character so that they are able to recognise infiltrators in times of war. The scope of the debate allows me to extend my speech to that point.

I was interested in the speech of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who said that the forces must not only accept responsibility for training their own members but must also make a contribution, as they are doing in the Army youth training services, to general training and discipline. Civil defence ought to be confined to a separate debate. Quite wrongly, national service was turned down because, if I remember correctly, the chiefs of staff advised the then Government that they could not afford the manpower to train the recruits and at the same time fulfil their commitments to NATO and their other commitments. At that time they had many commitments all over the world. On those grounds, and I gather on no other, they said that they could not undertake that training.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood said that at one time we had about 750,000 service men. Now we have only 300,000. The Army youth training scheme has been a great success, but its expense should not be entirely borne by the services Department. The right hon. Member for Devonport spoke about that. Although it is expensive, it provides training for people, and the money ought to come from sources other than the services. The skills people obtain from this scheme are enormous, and I am happy to note that the skills from this source are to be recognised. I am not sure how that is to be done, but some sort of qualification would help the participants. It would be a good idea if they had some sort of certificate or piece of paper that they could show to their future employers. It would show that they had taken part in the scheme and had been competent and reached a certain degree of efficiency.

The Minister spoke about pre-university training at Sandhurst. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said quite clearly what his party would do if it was in power: it would cut out the service element of the YTS altogether. That is part of its policy. If we find that we are short of reservists and cannot fulfil our obligations abroad and at home, and particularly in civil defence, we should consider the desirability of some form of compulsory national service. If we do that, I suggest that we call it, not national service, but community service, and that it should have a duration of one or two years. It should include the option for the participants of either military service or some form of community service which would be of use to the nation, such as road building. It should not be confined to military service and it should not be called national service but rather community service. That would instil into our youth something that they now lack—the discipline that we obtained from the original national service.

As many of my hon. Friends have hinted, I hope that as a result of this debate we shall have some form of national or community service. We should make sure above all that our home base is safe from attack in the event of a war when almost all our forces are deployed abroad. A small proportion should remain to look after our nation. After all, the ultimate objective of an armed force is not only to atack in Europe but to protect our nation at home and to preserve our home base.

12.10 pm

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) were right to broaden the debate because it is important to look at the scheme in the overall context of resources available for young people and to see what priority the idea that we are debating should have when competing against various other ideas, governmental, voluntary or those that are just being proposed.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said that the root of this debate was the needs of the armed forces, or words to that effect. I should say that the root of the debate is the needs of young people and what we should do for them. We should then try to relate that to the needs of the community, although the two are necessarily intertwined.

Nobody can dispute the fact that the priority at the moment is those young people particularly in need, and they are, of course, the young unemployed. Other hon. Members have described graphically the seriousness of the situation.

We must look at two particular areas—the long-term youth unemployed, and the post-YTS unemployed. We have large numbers unemployed in both categories, and yet we have many needs within the community. Let me address myself to how we can correct that mismatch and use one to alleviate some of the problems of the other.

It is right that the bulk of Government resources at this time should be concentrated on training school leavers. The two-year youth training scheme will cost £1·1 billion. I am sure that the hon. Member for Huddersfield would agree that, although he criticised the lack of spending, it is right that public money should be used to pump-prime private money. I hope that the will not say that the current lack of spending on training in British industry should be filled purely by Government money. I am sure that he will agree that British industry should pay more for training. Therefore, it is right that, when we use Government money, we should use it to stimulate private companies to spend more. That is precisely what the new two-year youth training scheme will be doing.

Young people going on the youth training scheme, having read all the advertisements, will have high expectations. They are now all expecting to be threatening Japanese industries. I have no doubt that in a few years Tracy and all the others featured in those advertisements will be building television sets and stereos and selling them to Japan rather than having them all come the other way.

I have every confidence that those high expectations will be filled by the youth training scheme. But the minority of those young persons who come off the youth training scheme — although in some pockets of high unemployment it may not be a minority — will have their hopes dashed. It is impossible for the Government to guarantee a job for every youth training scheme trainee, but we must offer them something. There must be a guarantee that they will be allowed to continue their development.

The second priority is the long-term unemployed. They are the people who have had no chance of a high-quality training scheme; people aged between 18 and 25 who left school at the height of the recession who never had the chance of a job, or people who have had a job for only a short time. They do not have any decent training and now they find themselves becoming longer and longer unemployed because employers are increasingly taking on people who have been through the youth training scheme. Therefore, that limits the vacancies available for people who have not had the benefit of that scheme.

Another problem for people in that category is that employers will look for people who have either had training or had some experience. They will therefore go for older people and that group of people will spend longer and longer unemployed and it will be harder and harder for them to get a job.

The Government have various schemes which will help, such as the community programme, the new counselling initiative and various retraining measures. It is right that such schemes should be provided and they are proving effective. But not only must we counsel for retraining, because we are always looking to fill vacancies such as the one which will soon be appearing in the west end for a director of a graphics company, but we must also look to counselling to fill other needs in the community, not necessarily within the established employment market.

To meet the needs of the post-youth training scheme unemployed and the long-term unemployed, we need greater imagination. This is where I come to the subject under discussion today. We need some form of national community service. The armed forces will have a role to play in that. We need greater imagination to mop up those young people who are not on a community programme or an existing Government or industry — structured retraining scheme in order to give them some hope for continued personal development and to stop the sheer waste of human resources in Britain.

Before we can embark on any such scheme, we need to approach the problem from the point of view of the Department of Health and Social Services. As long as young people are told that they have to be available for work we shall be extremely limited in our scope of providing community places for them. We must end the ridiculous anomaly of, for example, the 21-hour rule. It is in no way incompatible that young people should work full time on a community or armed forces scheme and at the same time be deemed available for work. The vast majority of young people want a job and the moment that they have a chance of one they will take it. Therefore, in the meantime we must allow them, rather than hang around the streets or watch videos all day, to be able to improve their position and increase their chances of getting a job.

The elements of such a scheme must be, first, that it should not be compulsory. To introduce a compulsory scheme takes away the very benefits of having a national community scheme. We want young people who are motivated to help the community, and for them and the community to get the most out of it they must not be forced to go on the scheme. The Thompson report on the youth services said:

"Coercing or compelling young people to take part would defeat the primary purpose and benefit of young people's involvement in the community."

That is right.

Secondly, young people should have the chance to shape the project in which they get involved so that they are involved from the very start. They should be allowed to take the initiative and to respond to local needs, where those are identified, or to identify them for themselves.

There should be clear aims so that young people have a target in sight which is easily achievable. There can be nothing more frustrating than taking part in a scheme where nothing appears to have been done at the end, either for oneself or for the community. Therefore, I favour initially looking at three-month projects. There should be short projects, with which young people can get involved in a community or the armed forces or wherever, with a limited aim which is achievable and which enables people to get most out of them. That would also allow people who are unemployed for longer to take up more than one such module.

Young people must be allowed to participate in the running of the schemes. They should not be used as cheap labour for job substitution. Apart from the damage that that may do to young people, it would not do a lot of good for local economies if local building work, which could be done and paid for in the proper way, was done by young people simply because the sponsoring agency wanted to get the work done on the cheap. In exploring those community provisions, we must look at what young people get out of them.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My hon. Friend spoke about construction projects being done on the cheap and disadvantaging construction firms in the private sector, with which I agree. Does he agree that there are a number of schemes which would be of great social value, whether it be the refurbishment of village halls or other types of construction projects, where there is no realistic prospect of them being done on a commercial basis, and where it would be of benefit if they were done through the community programme or similar schemes?

Mr. Lawler: I agree with my hon. Friend. The distinction must be between work that could or would be done and work that would not be done, either because finance is not available or simply because it is a scheme for betterment that would not be considered through the normal channels. The same applies to the existing community programme.

Many sectors and agencies have a part to play in community service and we must seek to use them all. There is a great variety of work to be done and I shall broadly separate it into four categories. There is all the environmental work, whether it be village halls, improving inner city sites, or derelict areas. There is much community work to be done such as help for old people, the under-privileged and the handicapped, which is not simply confined to inner city areas but can be found in rural areas. There are many social and community needs in rural areas which could be satisfied by involvement with young people. To explore those needs and discover how they can be provided for by young people on a community service scheme, we need the co-operation of local authorities, voluntary organisations, conservation groups, charities, and social services departments.

There is a strong role for employers and education. I do not detract from the provision they make for adult and youth training, but there is undoubtedly greater scope for further training. Work experience and community provision is a good thing and provides training in a certain way but there is certainly a need for young people, particularly those who have been on the youth training scheme, to continue to develop their training. Otherwise, the training will be wasted, and we cannot allow that to happen.

Mr. Sheerman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that job experience, community service and training are important but that the item which has not been mentioned enough in the debate is the fact that there have to be jobs at the end. If we had had a proper Budget for jobs which put money into the economy to get jobs going, young people would have had a rosier future.

Mr. Lawler: I feel that schemes such as YTS, training through a community programme and the other schemes I am elaborating on help to create jobs. There is no way that the Government create jobs. Those schemes create jobs by helping British industry to be more innovative, they get rid of the shortages of skills and encourage people to use their skills and go on to form their own businesses and become self-employed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not touch too much on self-employment. It has been with some difficulty that the Chair has interpreted the terms of the motion to allow some latitude, and I think that we are stretching it when we start to talk about self-employment.

Mr. Lawler: As I am attempting to show, there are competing schemes for resources which would otherwise be devoted to our national service scheme. I promise you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I shall not dwell at length on self-employment.

Many human resources and a great deal of technical resources are being wasted at the moment. I should like to see all our universities, colleges, schools, and industrial training centres opened in the evenings and weekends during vacations because in them there is equipment worth millions of pounds—nearly all paid for by public money—which is lying idle. Unemployed young people should be able to make use of that equipment to improve themselves.

The Army and the police are other important elements in providing opportunities within this scheme. Some young people might wish to work in the community or retrain themselves using equipment which is already available, but many of them would benefit from participating in a scheme sponsored by the Army, the police or other emergency services.

The other sponsoring agencies which should be involved are the chambers of commerce, enterprise agencies and other self-employment schemes, many of which already exist, such as Live Wire and Instant Muscle. They do tremendous work in encouraging young people to become self-employed.

Finance is the crucial element. There is limited finance available from the Government, although they have devoted huge resources to youth training and youth matters. However, much money is being spent in this area which could be better spent. There are numerous agencies involved in providing for unemployed young people. In most cities and rural areas throughout the country one will find drop-in centres and unemployment centres which are all funded, but in a very haphazard and unco-ordinated way. We must rationalise that spending and target it so that it benefits young people more effectively.

The community programme, an excellent scheme, could be used to provide supervisors on national community service and also cover the marginal costs of the overheads of opening up a school or an ITEC centre at the weekends or in the evenings and allow them to be used by unemployed people. It could also be used to provide any extra spending which would be necessary to pay for specialist tuition. Charities, voluntary organisations and industry through, for example, existing schemes such as the Kodak conservation scheme would all provide financing and input to a national community service scheme.

I believe that young people would respond to the setting up of such a scheme because it will provide a means for those who have not been lucky enough to secure employment and those who have been on YTS and still not been able to find a job, by which they can continue with their development. Having just been taught by the youth training scheme how to climb the ladder, it will prevent them from falling off it. I hope that the Government will set up a committee to review the piecemeal and unco-ordinated provisions which apparently exist, get rid of the duplicated resource provision and introduce a co-ordinated national community scheme for unemployed young people to participate in voluntarily. It could provide scope for further training within the community and work provision, increase access to groups to existing training schemes and facilities and make more effective use of existing resources, to promote the involvement of community and environmental projects amd assist and encourage young people to become self-employed.

All that would be on an unpaid and voluntary basis. I believe that young people will come forward as long as they are allowed to retain their benefit and, by so doing, spend their time in a more constructive way than would otherwise be available to them. I hope that that will be established on a national basis without having to wait too long.

There is a great variety of training and a great deal of work to be done. We must allow each young person to find what will be of most benefit to him, because whatever is of most benefit to him will be of most benefit to the community in the long run.

I disagree with one or two points made earlier in the debate. Hon. Members said that money for an expanded national service scheme should come from the Manpower Services Commission. Recent reports have identified that 80 per cent. of people in small firms receive no training and 15 per cent. of companies are complaining that their production is being limited through skill shortages. While that is happening, the MSC must have all the resources that it now has at its disposal, to ensure that adequate training is provided for young people, and retraining is provided for adults. Although a national service scheme would have a valuable role to play, resources should not be diverted from the MSC to pay for it. There is nothing more valuable for our economy and British industry than a properly-provided, resourced and staffed on-the-job training scheme such as the YTS primarily is.

In times of limited resources, we must have cost-effectiveness. There is nothing more cost-effective than a voluntary national community service scheme. Young people do not need to be drilled round a parade ground to get discipline, because they will get discipline from being involved in the community, and from contributing and achieving something. That will give them all the discipline that they need to make sure that they play their part as full citizens, as they grow into their adult years.

Therefore, we want a national community service scheme. We want means for unemployed young people to develop themselves and their potential so that they are not wasted. We want a scheme that matches up work that desperately needs to be done in the community with the human resources that are available, as well as with the technical resources. We should open up and make full use of those resources. It is a scandal that the available resources are going to waste. For probably more than half the year, equipment and resources are not used. The Government should launch a committee to look at that in a highly imaginative way and come to the House with a scheme for national community service.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) on introducing this subject, particularly as I did my national service in the 1950s, and have been a member of the Territorial Army reserve for five or six years.

There has been some interest in the Chamber this morning in the position of the Labour Front Bench. I was interested in the way in which the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) ranged widely around the topic before finally having to admit that there was no way in which his party was prepared to support any commitment on behalf of the armed services towards helping our young people. He made that clear.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman knows that that was not the point that I made. I said that we would not be committed to national service that included a military element in the use of the armed services. Using the armed services for providing skills training for our young people is a possibility under a Labour Government.

Mr. Thompson: I still disagree with the policy that the hon. Gentleman is propounding. He misses the whole point of the debate.

There has been much talk since the Budget about the right fiscal approach to reducing unemployment.

However, the question is how we tackle the revolution that is taking place in work and leisure, particularly as it affects young people. Therefore, it is right that this morning we should have this debate on voluntary national service youth training and the reserve forces because it focuses on the needs of people, particularly young people. That point was emphasised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler). I wholeheartedly supported his comments along those lines.

We can relate those needs to policy decisions in areas such as defence and, indeed, social services and improving our infrastruture. I have for a long time been in favour of the concept of voluntary national service. I hope very much that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will take seriously the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham and other hon. Members. The Government must take the matter seriously. They must take it on board and not just say that it has been an interesting debate, and now they can move on to something else. Serious issues are at stake.

For example, the concept of voluntary national service could be applied to a whole range of activities—the armed services that we are debating this morning, the police, the fire service, nursing, social services and so on. However, rightly, in the debate we are concentrating mainly on the opportunity in the armed services for young people and volunteers. I supported the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), when he emphasised that all three services should be involved. On that point, I may disagree slightly with my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham.

I was also astonished by the remarks of the Labour spokesman, the hon. Member for Huddersfield, when he tried to say that a voluntary scheme was compulsory. I hope that it is clear from the debate that all of us have been talking about a voluntary scheme, with perhaps one or two exceptions, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who advocates a return to conscription. However, the motion is clearly about a voluntary scheme.

I shall not comment on the details of any scheme because they were set out clearly in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham. However, I reinforce the support for the youth training scheme in the armed services. I hope that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will do more, with his colleagues, to promote the scheme and make it more successful.

I also wish to speak out strongly in favour of the concept of national and community service, an ideal that has been referred to in many speeches. It has been debated ever since the abolition of national service in the years between 1957 and 1960. Indeed it was John Grigg who said that the greatest mistake made by the then Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, now the Earl of Stockton, was just that. Many other commentators also said that. However, we cannot put the clock back.

Today, there are strains in society because of rapid change. There are changes in the structure of society, the nature of employment and, particularly, in the role of education and training. Therefore, there is a need for policies, action and ideas to promote community spirit and a sense of identity and purpose, particularly among our young people. As has been stated, some of those young people are in danger of alienation from society. I should like to emphasise that.

In my experience, in commerce, industry and education, that spirit is all too often lacking. I have spoken in education debates, and I do not wish to raise that subject today, but there is no doubt that the morale and spirit in education is not all that it should be. That is also true, of course, in industry and commerce. The situation is not helped by the increasing politicisation of our universities and schools. Again, I could speak about that at some length.

The needs of 17-year-olds are not always fully met by our schools, universities and colleges. Although I fully support the youth training scheme, young people's needs are not fully met by that either. If they were, we would not be seeing increasing drug abuse and increasing crime among the young, along with many of our other inner city problems. Politicians, educators and the churches have failed to cure that sickness in our society despite all their pamphlets. Those of us who did our national service know that the experience was not necessarily valued by all, and sometimes hampered an individual's development. But for the overwhelming majority, national service represented a unique and valuable opportunity to widen one's experience and develop one's character. I believe that there is a lesson to be learnt from that.

Many of us who did our national service were imbued with a sense that we owed a duty to the community that stood over and above our duty to develop our talents to the full. In what is generally regarded as a selfish and materialistic society there is an urgent need to swing the pendulum towards self-discipline, courtesy and loyalty. What have the armed services got to offer? I believe that their traditions and ethos admirably suit them for any task that involves helping young people with their training and development.

Perhaps the defence establishment could be persuaded to agree that it has a role to perform that goes further than the mere provision of sophisticated equipment or of skilled regular personnel for our country's defence. The services can share with some of our young people the tradition of service, comradeship and leadership that so impressed my generation of national servicemen. Officers know their men well and that, together with the way in which they treat them, provides an example that could be applied throughout society. A recent pamphlet about the Falklands war discussed the distinction to be drawn between the Argentinian officers and ours. It was clearly pointed out that our traditions of leadership were largely responsible for our superiority in that conflict. That is why I support the extension of our reserve forces and the idea of voluntary youth training with an armed services input.

I also support those of my colleagues who have spoken about civil defence. It is vital that the Government should take that subject more seriously. I see a link between what we have said about the reserve forces and youth training, and civil defence. I do not just see civil defence as preparing for a possible conflict. I regularly speak for the concept of emergency volunteers who could intervene in any other civil emergency. But the Government have not taken up such ideas anywhere near as enthusiastically as they should have done. This country could gain tremendously from pursuing that course.

The arguments for compulsory conscription are probably overwhelmed by the realities of the situation, and so that is probably not on. But there would be a spin-off from more contact between the armed services and our young people. As has been said, there must be more understanding between civilian society and our armed services. I believe that the risk of isolation is increasing. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham said that as the tolerance of violence in society increased, so the tolerance of the concept of the necessity for the use of force by society decreased. I shall not start a philosophical debate on that, but there should be a better understanding of our armed services and their role. The Ministry of Defence must bear that in mind. It is not good enough for it to say that it has a marvellous force that can do everything, while forgetting about the rest of society and its attitude to the services. I cannot stress that point strongly enough.

Let us therefore use, in any practical and realistic way, the fine traditions of our regular forces. Let us use and exploit the desire for adventure and service among our young people. I do not accept the depressing view of others that volunteers will not come forward or that the youth training scheme has not worked well. If the package is sold properly, plenty of volunteers will come forward for the scheme of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham, or for any other scheme. It is chicken-hearted just to say that such a scheme is not on. The problems of our country are far too serious to be dismissed like that. Let us tackle those matters by considering the needs of the people and the country first, especially the needs of our young people.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): I join hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) on bringing this subject before the House. I am delighted to see that he is properly dressed and is wearing his Parachute Regiment tie. That leads us to believe that he would "target the area" properly. That is exactly what he has done, and I intend to follow his line and concentrate on the points that he made.

Before I do so, may I comment on the contribution of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). He ducked and weaved actively and broadened the scope of the debate by talking about the role of this and that, and who could help where, but he did not accept that, at some time, everyone should acknowledge a need to serve the nation, not just to serve oneself. That concept is not foreign, even in Socialist countries. Austria, Sweden and many Socialist countries accept national service and see nothing dishonourable in serving one's country. It is a sad reflection on the present Labour party that that central theme was missing from the hon. Gentleman's speech, and it was reinforced by his clear commitment to remove the youth training scheme already in place. It has imperfections and it could be improved, but it has given excellent training to thousands.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement mentioned the increase in our reserve forces and gave us an impressive array of figures to show, just how they had been expanded. But, against the background of Brave Defender, will the expansion of the reserve forces bridge not the gap, but the gulf that exists between resources and requirements? If it can be shown that that is not happening, when will the Government take further action to bridge that gulf? Will they bring their proposals before the house at the earliest possible opportunity?

Nothing changes much in life. The British people have always believed that national service was good for the vast majority of young people who took part in it, and that view is still supported by public opinion today. The hon. Member for Huddersfield said that 80 per cent. of people asked in a survey agreed that some form of national service was very acceptable.

However, there is the widely held opposite view—the alleged view of those in the services—that national service is bad for the armed forces. I speak with 13 years' experience of the Army. When we had national service, the vast majority of men in my battalion were doing their national service. They formed the backbone of the battalion and went into the specialist skills areas. Without them, we would not have operated as effectively as we did in Suez, Cyprus, and other parts of the world. Those who decry the role of national service are making a grave mistake and are misleading people.

The pundits will say that four months' training is not enough. Indeed, that point was echoed by my hon. Friend the Minister. But there is a misunderstanding of what we should try to achieve in those four months. We shall not try to impart skills—to turn people into lathe operators or motor mechanics. It would be a basic operation. I joined the Army when I was 16, and I remember only too well my first four months there. The first six weeks were spent in general training corps. Everyone spent six weeks in that corps and then spent 10 weeks "up the hill" receiving specialist corps training. I do not say that at the end of the four months we possessed all weapon skills, but at least we were totally different from the reserves who had joined up four months before. We had a basic sense of identity and a belief in ourselves. We had learnt about others and, in my view, we were much better members of society than when we had started out on the road into the Army. I believe that that is the road down which my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham would like us to start today.

Army training was an excellent base, but it did not provide civilian skills, and that is not the proposal that is before us. I am worried about the youth training scheme, which has been described in many quarters as a failure as a result of the armed services not wishing to play their full part in it. However, that is not true of some arms and services. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham would expect me to do, I shall take the Parachute Regiment as my example. In 1984, the regiment took in 80 youngsters through the YTS and 75 per cent. of them completed their year's training, with 27 of them staying on in the Regular Army. Of the others—I was present when they passed out—they went out better than when they went in. Most of them went out into good jobs because employers were looking for the qualities that had been brought out in them during their year's training.

My worry about the YTS is that in 1985 the number of young people coming forward for training in the Parachute Regiment had fallen to 35. There is something amiss and I hope that the MOD will conduct an investigation to ascertain why there was such a dramatic falling off between 1984 and 1985 at a time when youth unemployment was supposedly on the rise.

The problem of pay still exists. There is a vast differential between those who are in regular service and those who are on the short-term YTS. However, the benefits that flow from the scheme are immeasurable. First, there is the art of living. I return to what I said about the four months of training that was received by those who did national service and the training that was received during war time. Those who received that training learnt to live and work together and to grow up, and they are all better for it.

The second benefit is discipline. I know that "discipline" is often regarded as a dirty word but there is a lack of it among some of our young people. I take up the remarks of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport, (Dr. Owen), who said that discipline would be a tremendous help to some of our more deprived young people. The right hon. Gentleman argued that they would benefit immensely from it, and he is right.

The third benefit is education. When I went to Aldershot to watch the passing out of those who had received training in the Parachute Regiment as YTS volunteers, the two people who impressed me most of all were those who worked in the education service. They told me that they thought that they had the most rewarding job in the services. On day one they took on board 80 youngsters with only four or five CSEs between them, and at the end of the year they were turning them out with three of four O-levels each. Education is an area that we have not considered closely enough and there are many benefits that could flow from that. Within four months I would expect to see basic education and motivation built in as a major part in a young person's training. If youngsters came out of the services after four months with the right sort of report, that, in itself would be a recommendation to many employers, who would recognise that there was a base on which to build some further skills.

Fourthly, there is no doubt that our Territorial Army, good though it is, does not have enough people within it with a service background. Four months' training in the services would provide a valuable reserve, and I would hope that many who received it would go on to see service in the reserve forces.

Time presses. I sum up with an old adage — the difficult we do at once, the impossible may take a little longer. I believe that these proposals are difficult. It seems that Government Front Bench spokesmen believe them to be impossible. I hope that they will reconsider and see whether it is not possible to achieve the impossible.

Sir Philip Goodhart: With the leave of the House, I thank hon. Members who have made the debate so interesting, and I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note with approval of the Government's plans to expand the United Kingdom's volunteer reserve forces; and emphasises the great value to young people of basic service training, while recognising that such training should not be funded in a way which would diminish the United Kingdom's front line capability.

High Technology (European Co-operation)

12.56 pm

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): I beg to move,

That this House strongly supports the policies pursued by Her Majesty's Government in European collaboration in research and development in high technology industries, including through Esprit and Eureka, and in addition wishes to see these industries further develop joint manufacturing and marketing projects.

I wish to draw attention to some matters that I find encouraging and others that give me cause for concern. I hope that the encouraging items show the way in which some of the problems can be tackled. In the development of new ideas and in the making of new scientific discoveries, Britain's record in this century is one which any other country would find difficult to match. However, it has been repeatedly stated that in translating that scientific invention into profitable and practical use we have lagged behind.

When Great Britain was in the happy position of being able to sell its manufactured goods to an empire, the impact of international competition was weakened and we could rely upon a market of immense size. That no longer applies.

Although the costs of manufacturing goods may be falling with increased automation and mechanisation, the costs of developing new aircraft, new computer sytems and even new motor cars steadily increase. To fund the investment needed and to obtain a profitable return requires large sales and a large market.

In general, European companies and countries have not been particularly successful in looking beyond their national boundaries. The pursuit of jointly funded projects has been the exception rather than the rule. There has been no particular wish to buy European. The British are slightly inclined to buy British, but the French are more positively inclined to buy French. If no attractive home product is available the average European purchaser is at least as ready to buy Japanese or American as to buy from another European manufacturer. Perhaps that is sensible, but the consequence of a fragmented Europen market is to reduce the sales volumes of individual European manufacturers and thus to deny those manufacturers the funds for the further investment that they need.

About 20 years ago I naively assumed that the EEC would lead to a truly common market, that within a relatively short period the barriers to trade which then existed would be substantially removed. Although some progress has been made it has been disappointingly slow. Even some of the important initiatives that have been taken are all too easily clogged up with bureaucratic decision-making. In high technology projects a delay of even a few months can turn a profitable project into a financial disaster.

In two areas European co-operation has been encouraging and the benefits have still to be fully realised. One is in the development of information technology and the other is in the design, development and manufacture of major aerospace projects. In information technology the EEC's funding of the Esprit and Eureka projects are proving to be an important stimulus to development effort. Esprit is, of course, related specifically to information technology projects. On a European basis it is an extension of the aims and objectives of the well-established Alvey programme.

[Mr. Timothy Wood]

The European Commission identified five priority areas of information technology that justify Community effort. They are advanced micro-electronic capability, software technology, advanced information processing, office systems, and computer-integrated manufacture. The Commission also proposed bringing the 12 major European information technology companies, including International Computers Ltd, GEC and Plessey from the United Kingdom, together with universities and other research centres. It has certainly been good to see those companies from different European countries co-operating more steadily together, as well as competing, where appropriate.

The Alvey project has proved to be an important stimulus in bringing together those companies and academic institutions in major research projects in Britain. There are encouraging signs that Esprit is acting as a catalyst for greater co-operation and dialogue between the European high technology companies. Although the Esprit programme is an important catalyst for joint European competitive collaboration between companies, it is naive to suppose that that in itself will enable European companies to compete effectively in the long term.

There is a need to progress further in collaboration on product development, manufacture and marketing. Inevitably, there must be major reservations about how programmes, such as Alvey and Esprit, can respond swiftly and flexibly to encompass the rapid changes that may be perceived in the development of new projects.

When I worked for ICL, on one or two occasions I was involved in putting forward development projects to the Department of Trade and Industry for support. The Government officials examining the project were extremely helpful and constructive in their approach. Nevertheless, by the time that the proposal was sufficiently well formulated to merit support, a substantial amount of work had already been carried out. Furthermore, the nature of such projects is that significant changes may need to be made to them and considerable time may have to be spent on justifying them to those responsible for financial support.

Overall, although one is providing that catalytic help to companies, they often have to spend considerable resources and time, presenting the case for a particular project and considering the case and the possibility whether the Government will believe that the proposed changes can be justified financially. Those factors often act as a slight hindrance, although the end result may be financial support.

The House of Lords Select Committee on European Communities considered Esprit in its eighth report last Session. I agree with its main conclusions, and although I have already touched on most of them, they are worth re-emphasising. Pre-competitive collaboration should be a precursor to collaboration on product development and manufacture. There need to be many more effective moves to create a true common market with the reduction of differing standards, and of border delays and restraints on trade and services. There is also a great need to ensure that a sufficient number of people are properly qualified to exploit the new technologies.

I have often spoken of my concern about the amount of higher education and training that we provide, and I certainly do not wish to expand unduly on that aspect now. I wish to concentrate on how we can further expand upon co-operation between countries and companies, rather than on the more basic requirements of education and training.

Eureka was clearly stimulated by a wish on the part of the British Government to have a European high technology counterpart to the United States' strategic defence initiative. There is no doubt that many high technology companies believe that the United States space programme gave a major uplift to the development of a multitude of new projects, which will have a much wider application than the space programme. It is arguable as to whether research directed to more terrestrial activities would produce the same beneficial effects. However, it is clear that many companies involved in innovative projects believe that the setting of clear national or supernational goals for exciting projects can act as a major fillip to progress.

At the moment, the Eureka initiative is leading to attempts to resolve some of the problems identified as a result of the experience of work on Esprit. There is a major need to open up the European markets in sectors such as standards and public purchasing, and I welcome the efforts made by my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Trade and Industry to make progress in this regard. However, I wonder whether it might have been possible to indentify exciting projects in medicine or communications, for example, where a major European drive could have been attempted and where one might have tried to excite popular imagination on specific projects that might be pursued. There is an opportunity to do such things, and if it is taken up, we might find in this country, as in the United States, that the necessary stimulus has been created.

The European collaboration in aerospece activities has advanced much further than in other sectors. Im my Stevenage constituency, over 8,500 people are employed by British Aerospace. I am delighted that such successful progress is being made in so many collaborative projects. Undoubtedly, the more concerted approach to European purchasing of defence equipment is having a beneficial effect, but that is not the whole story. Aerospace manufacturers have learned that while competing on some projects they can successfully collaborate on others, and that it is not necessary to have a large monolithic organisation to produce major new systems.

Airbus Industrie is a strikingly important example of a European response to the impact of large American aircraft manufacturers in general, and Boeing in particular. With the A300 and A310 having proved themselves in service with many airlines, the orders for the A320, standing at over 100, are well ahead of what many supporters of the project, like myself, dared to hope would be reached at this stage. The clear intent of Airbus Industrie to go ahead with the A330 and the A340 aircraft highlights the prospect of a European range of aircraft that meets the needs of many of the world's airlines. The British Aerospace involvement in the design and production of the wings of this aircraft is a most significant aspect of British involvement. However, there are a multitude of other contractors and sub-contractors making their contribution as well.

I have noticed that there has been a certain amount of speculation about the funding of British Aerospace's involvement in the A330 and the A340 development. The Government support for the A320 programme was clearly of vital importance. However, I believe that at present, apart from possible recycling or rescheduling of that finance, it should not be necessary for there to be further British Government support. British Aerospace has demonstrated to financial institutions that it is becoming a much more successful and popular company. That positive picture will, I hope, be reflected in a desire by investors to support this and other investment opportunities that British Aerospace presents.

Turning away from Airbus Industrie, one looks at some of the other aerospace projects which are also most significant. The Tornado aircraft and the European fighter project are other examples of European collaboration. But collaboration is not related solely to aircraft. The development and production of missiles for such systems as ASRAAM and Milan are extremely significant from the point of view of my constituency. There is also a range of collaborative ventures in space and communications development. A whole series of satellite and related systems are being developed in collaborative projects for use both on the Ariane launches and on the United States space shuttles. After last week's encounter with Halley's comet, it is perhaps worth singling out the success of the Giotto project. But most projects are, of course, associated with potentially profitable and useful satellite communications activities.

I could spend a great deal of time eulogising about the multitude of important projects that are being pursued by British Aerospace, many of them in my constituency, but I want to consider further whether there are lessons to be learned from European co-operation in aerospace which should be pursued in other areas of endeavour, in particular in information technology. I believe that a great deal can be achieved but that even now our opportunities are becoming more limited unless Governments and companies move much more rapidly than they have done.

Twenty-five years ago, in computer development, one had in this country several manufacturers producing mainframe computers. They included ICT, Ferranti, Elliott Automation, English Electric and EMI. By a series of mergers of computer interests, those manufacturers were reduced to one — ICL. At the same time, the physically large and slow machines of those days have either become enormously more powerful or have been superseded by desktop machines which are also more powerful, faster and easier to use.

For the small business and home computer market, a whole series of new companies has sprung up and, in many instances, faded away once more. Companies like Acorn, despite the success of its BBC microcomputer, and Sinclair, despite its innovative approach, have found the going much tougher than at one stage they anticipated. Even the United States company, Commodore, at one stage the producer of the most popular home computers, has suffered severely.

While much attention has been devoted to the varying fortunes of the microcomputer manufacturers, the manufacturers of large computer systems have had their own challenges to face. For the past 30 years the world computer industry has been dominated by IBM at least as significantly as Boeing has dominated the aircraft industry.

The huge world market which has been achieved by IBM has meant that that company has been able to devote enormous resources to further research and development. Nevertheless, it has proved possible for other companies —sometimes quite small companies—to develop items varying from processor chips to highly effective printers to floppy disk systems. It is not the case that only if one is very big is the world beautiful.

However, the development of complex systems and software requires considerable resources, and the effective marketing of these systems, together with proper support, after those systems have been sold and installed requires great resources too. ICL, Bull of France and Siemens of Germany, have set up a research centre of technological excellence in Munich. I hope that it will prove to be the small beginning of major efforts to produce larger computer systems and computer networks on a European rather than a national basis.

Large computer systems seem to me to lend themselves at least as easily as aircraft to the development and production of varying parts by different companies in different countries. In a typical computer system one would have not merely the computer processor; one would have various memory systems for direct access memory, or disk drives, or magnetic tape drives. One would also have varying types of printers, display equipment and so on. A considerable variety of components could be developed by different companies if they collaborated more.

A company may first consider whether it is sensible for it to produce a certain item. If it is not, the company looks at the world scene and perhaps picks up one component from Japan, another from the United States, and so on. That may be sensible in the short term but, by acting in that way, the company is eroding its potential markets.

In the end, the potential market is one of the crucial aspects of success in high technology. A company that does not co-operate with other manufacturers will not create a large market. Many high technology industries will fail if they do not create such a market. The lesson to be learned from aerospace is that the various European aerospace companies have got together, resulting in them being able to market jointly their various products and thus win greater confidence from potential purchasers of their products. In turn, this means that, in 10, 15 or 20 years, they will have more resources for research and development.

How do we best advance this cause? I am not one of those who believe that companies and industries should be led by Governments. It is up to companies to ascertain the ways in which various projects can be pursued together. However, Governments have a role—first, in providing the catalyst in terms of, for example, the Alvey programme, Esprit and, potentially Eureka and, secondly, in creating an environment in which Government purchasing in different countries is co-ordinated. Co-ordination would mean that the French would not look for a French manufacturer and then look at the world scene, that the Germans would not look for a German manufacturer and then at the world scene, and so on.

It has been said that ICL's market has been excessively protected in terms of sales to the Government. In some respects, that is true, but it has not been protected in terms of the European market. I do not want protection. I should like co-ordination in the way in which we organise our affairs in Europe so that we can create the base to enable our companies to succeed.

Similar considerations apply to aerospace and information technology. They may apply in the longer term to the nuclear power industry, motor manufacturing, and so on. Where there is a need to spend large sums on research and development and on support for the consumer after he has acquired equipment, it is a function of Governments in support of industry, to ensure that the potential is fulfilled.

I hope the House will see that the points I have made are valid and that there is a strong case for reinforcing co-operation on high technology initiatives, and for reinforcing the work in aerospace and in information technology. If we do that, we can become within Europe a highly successful and continuing base for the manufacture of high technology goods. I hope that we will not be reduced to a tourist centre and a place where people come to see what was once the base of an empire but is no longer.

1.21 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) on initiating this debate. He may have caused more embarrassment to his Government than was the intention when his motion was originally tabled, because it comes hard on the heels of obvious anti-European initiatives against industries that are of key importance to high technology. It comes at a time when we are selling out our helicopter industry to Sikorsky. In that case we barely looked at, and then turned down, a European alternative. It also comes when the Government have embarked on a hell-bent course to sell off Land Rover.

I mildly rebuke the hon. Member for Stevenage for saying that even motor cars cost a lot to develop these days. They always did, but they cost more than ever now because they are at the forefront of the advanced technologies about which he was speaking from his own experience in software and computers and their application in the main areas of the Esprit programme. Motor cars, including Land Rovers, are at the forefront of those applications and to a large extent the health and strength of our advanced technology industries depend on the health, strength and size of our motor car industry. That is why the Opposition were against the Government's proposals to sell off with meaningless undertakings first our helicopter industry to Sikorsky and now, irrespective of the merits of the case, our own vital motor car and truck industry to General Motors.

With considerable help from Tory Back Benchers, we managed for a while to fight back the Government's intention to sell Austin Rover, and all the success it has achieved, to Ford. Far from promoting national and pan-European solutions to our problems, the Government have given up on British management and technology and have turned their back on co-operation with Europe. They are intent on cutting their own expenditure by selling out to the Americans.

Mr. Wood: One of the crucial points I endeavoured to make in my speech was the importance of a large market. If one finds that, for various reasons, a market has diminished, there is no point in wishful thinking about the maintenance of a specific manufacturer. One has to build confidence in a market for the goods being produced, and that must be done by combined development projects and by good after-sales service. Once one has got that market one is in a good position, but there is no point in crying once the market has been lost.

Mr. Robinson: I do not see the relevance of that intervention to the point I was making. I agree there is no point in crying over a lost market. One has to do something about it. One must get back that market share and that is what every other country and every other industry is doing. It is a diversion from the main topic of today's debate, but it is interesting to note something I have not heard said on either side of the House, that Renault, the enormous state-owned French car and truck producer, has made losses in the last few years of £1 billion a year. We hear no debates about the French Government flogging off Renault in part or in whole. As a whole, it is making those losses irrespective of any changes in the management of the company.

We can blame the French Government of Mr. Mitterrand for many things, but we cannot blame him for the running of Renault because he has no direct responsibility for it. It was nationalised by none other than General de Gaulle, as hon. Members on the Government side will know. It has remained nationalised and has been run by a succession of distinguished French industrialists. Whatever we may think of President Mitterrand, he has no responsibility for the performance of Renault. The French see the strategic importance of that as they do of Esprit and the other programmes that we must consider today.

I noticed one surprising point in the speech of the hon. Member for Stevenage. I do not know how it will be received by his constituents. He said, if I understood him correctly—I am sure he will take every opportunity to correct me if I am wrong—that he did not think that British Aerospace needed Government support for its share in the development of the wing structure for the new Airbus. He is being quite quixotic in making that remark.

In my experience, dating back to the early 1960s, I know of no aerospace project of that magnitude that has not involved Government funding in some form or another. One can go back to Rolls-Royce and its unfortunate collapse and the humiliation of receivership that it experienced which the Conservative Government then—they may regret it now—forced the company to go through; to the invention of launch aid, a brilliantly innovative concept from the Department of Trade and Industry; and to all the programmes, civilian and defence. They have always needed Government aid, and we must say again, as we did at the last trade and industry Question Time, that it is not enough for the Secretary of State to list a formidable series of barriers and obstacles for the company to overcome and to refuse to give me an explicit undertaking that aid, even in principle, was not ruled out. We are asking for no more than that.

Anyone can sit back and say that the company must be profitable and that the money must come from somewhere else. In all, he rattled off about five obstacles to any Government funding. The harsh reality is that at the end of the day, the Government will have to back the project, and the earlier that that is made plain, and the earlier that the Government come in and support British Aerospace, the better will be the deal that we shall get out of that aspect of European co-operation on the new technologies.

Mr. Wood: British Aerospace has not as yet made an application for aid. My understanding is that it is still considering what its requirements, if any, might be. The point that I was trying to emphasise was that, in view of the major successes that British Aerospace has been having, I see good prospects of further funding being available from the private sector.

Mr. Robinson: Nobody is putting that in doubt. That is not the issue. I am sure that the directors and management of British Aerospace will vigorously pursue every avenue of private finance. The hon. Gentleman is missing the point. What he ought to be doing, if he were doing his job as a constituency Member of Parliament, is joining Labour Members in pointing out to the Government the obvious fact that they will have to support the project. We shall see. If it does not come in that project it will come in some other, but I guarantee there will be government funding, directly or indirectly, behind that project. The Minister shakes his head. I hope that in the coming months I shall reflect with wry amusement on the fact that on this particular issue he has not been correct. Money will be needed. It will be found, directly or indirectly, and I hope that that European area of collaboration will proceed.

We are discussing today the question of European co-operation in advanced technologies against a background of continuing decline. That has accelerated considerably under the Government, but it has been there since the war. Historians and economists trace it back to the 19th century. I am never clear what good it does for us to carry out that form of industrial analysis, which relates our problems to a cultural difficulty, other than that it focuses Government policies on what we should be doing now, which those who look that far back may often fail to do. If I could do that today it would be by merely establishing yet again how great the need is.

There was a debate in the other place in which it was pointed out, and it is worth pointing out again today, just how far Europe and the United Kingdom are behind. If we look at the production of main frame computers, integrated circuitry, and video recorders the figures are alarming. The market for large industrial computers is dominated by the United States with Japan catching up. But eight out of 10 personal computers sold in Europe are made in the United States. Nine of of 10 video recorders sold here are made in Japan. European manufacturers of integrated circuits control only 30 per cent. of our market—that is the Community market—and 13 per cent. of world sales.

It is a long time since Babbage first developed the concept of the computer way back in the 1920s. During the war, with our national effort focused in the dire straits of apparently overwhelming odds, we assembled a team of scientists at Bletchley park, built the British colossus and cracked the German Enigma code. In the post-war period we have seen a progressive decline of our ability to develop and apply some of the billiant fundamental research which has been carried out. That is a commonplace point and one we should never lose sight of.

With equal emphasis, I must also point out that the solution to the problem of our failure sufficiently to develop and apply technology and research is not to cut the research itself. I see no merit in cutting research because, by their very nature and character, the people who do the fundamental research will not be those who will be out in the hurly-burly of the market place, under the pressure from sales and production, giving us the products needed from the basic research.

The movement for saving British science is not an aberration. It is not a group of academies anxious to preserve their own funding, but a reaction to the cuts in all areas of Government finance for basic research. Cuts will not solve the Minister's or our country's problems in the application of that research. To give up on what we are doing well will not solve the problem of what we are doing badly. We must think how far behind we are. It was put very aptly in a debate in the other place when it was stated that > "We are paddling in the shallows to reach the development boat, and that boat has yet to be pushed out." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 November 1985; Vol. 468, c. 755.]

That is how far we are still behind.

No doubt we shall hear from the Minister a whole series of individual statistics relating to the Brite programme. One does not hear very much about that but it is one of the successful European programmes. No doubt we shall hear about Esprit and the number of successes we have scored there, and about Eureka. Having poured cold water on Eureka and having told the French Government that it was unnecessary and that the private sector would do all that was necessary, the Government, perhaps in anticipation of today's debate, on 13 March gave their blessing to Eureka. However, it did not stop us from doing badly in the first share of the Eureka programme and we have to admit, that to a large extent that was because of the Government's lukewarm, half-hearted support for it.

I accept that the Minister will have to pad out his speech with all sorts of statistics relating to Brite, Esprit and Eureka. I believe that Eureka is the most recent of the European based collaborative programmes. No doubt the Minister will inform us what each of the acronyms refers to. However, I ask the Minister not to lose himself in a wealth of detail relating to each of the programmes, to the proportion of the grant, to carefully chosen statistics and to other information we shall no doubt hear, but to address himself to two central points. The second point is a great deal more important than the first.

Is there nothing that the Government can do to overcome the two criticisms which are levelled at the present programmes, even by those who are most in favour of them and in some cases by those who are deriving most benefit from them? The criticisms deal with the length of time it takes to get through the bureaucracy.

Inevitable obstacles exist in Brussels. I am sure that they are not created deliberately or because Brussels happens to be the centre of the official administration of the Common Market. They probably exist because, as with our own Civil Service, the problems of discrimination and the problems caused by being fair and undertaking a thorough evaluation, means that the evaluation periods are very wrong.

Does the Minister accept that the difficulties for small companies and universities are a great deal more formidable than those for large companies? A large company can afford a professional lobbyist; it can hire someone to live in Brussels, and he can stay there until he brings home the bacon. That is not the case for the universities since the Government hacked to pieces our research effort and support for the universities, nor is it the case for small companies.

Our heavy research and development effort, which is geared to the defence industry, is dominated by a few large companies. Indeed, it is difficult to get the spin off to the small companies. The pattern that is emerging from the European co-operative programme is similar, in that the beneficiaries are the very same large British companies with the resources to get in and overcome the bureaucracy involved.

[Mr. Robinson]

I ask the Minister to look at that. Perhaps he will consider the possibility of Government help, by way of advice, introductions and even an increase in our office in Brussels, by which the small companies could be guided through the maze leading to the award of a grant under one of the European collaborative projects.

Mr. Wood: From my knowledge of British Aerospace and my experience in ICL, I know that there are a multitude of cases where small companies are taking part in projects, although the large companies may have initiated the development programme. Therefore, it is not true to say that small companies are being excluded in the way that the hon. Gentleman implies.

Mr. Robinson: I think that, under the Whips' orders, the hon. Gentleman must by trying to spin out the debate. I did not say that small companies were being excluded, but those involved in defence in this country do not have anything like the participation in the European programmes that I am sure he, the Minister, the Government and officials would like. There are problems for them. I am highlighting them and wondering whether the Government, in their wisdom and generosity, could extend a helping hand to the small companies in Britain. I assure the hon. Member for Stevenage, from my personal contact with such companies and knowledge of the matter, that those companies face formidable difficulties — perhaps they are as much in their own minds as in reality — in getting through the necessary process of evaluation.

Speaking in another place, the former vice-chancellor of the university located in the city that I have the honour to represent said in regard to the Alvey and Esprit programmes in Europe—I quote from col. 752——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman must paraphrase. I am sure that he can do that.

Mr. Robinson: I meant to say that I would not quote. I apologise.

The former vice-chancellor referred to the need for an expansion of our national programme. He said that our national situation is critical and that we do not attract enough people into engineering. He said that we are not established as far as we should be in Europe, that we should prevent the present national hæmorrhage of skills and first-class talent, and that we need a national effort such as the French have, which is wholly nationalistic in research and development. He called for a major Government initiative.

I suggest something to the Minister that is much less ambitious and more modest. Has he read what was written in the latest edition of the British Plastics Federation's communication, referring to the briefing of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Department? It stated that the DTI outlined proposed changes in the manner of funding R and D, which will lead to an increase in funds for the EEC R and D budget and to a reduction in funds for national R and D programmes. Is that the case?

Does the Treasury really regard everything that our companies successfully obtain from the various European funds — to which, of course, it has to contribute — as involving a necessary reduction from the Department of Trade and Industry's support for the innovation programme? If so, it follows that, on any analysis, Europe, let alone Britain—which is probably the worst off of the advanced nations in Europe — is in a dire crisis in relation to Japan and the United States. That is recognised by every other Government involved, even if it is not recognised by our Government.

The very magnitude of the requirements in Europe means that there will be no United Kingdom funding if the Treasury line is pursued. The Minister shakes his head, but not long ago a Minister in his Department told us that all Government spending was bad. The only logical conclusion to that is that all Government spending should be ended. For many a year we have not had a particularly positive approach to spending in support of industry. I know that much to their credit, officials are resisting the line put forward by the Treasury. They do not want a reduction in the support for the innovation programme. Can the Minister give us an assurance that there will not be that reduction?

One of our major companies, GEC, is very good at getting both national and international grants. It has a proposition under the Eureka project. However, one of the reasons we are doing so badly is that it has been held up on the ground that the Treasury argues that the funding is additional,—a new concept of additionality—and so it cannot put the money into that project since money is already committed under Support for Innovation. Alternatively, money no longer needs to be committed under SFI, because the Government are contributing to the Eureka project. That has been agreed by the companies and has been agreed, in principal, by the Governments. The French Government have put up their 50 per cent. They have put their money where their mouth is, but our Government are dragging their feet. I hope that the Minister will give me a straight answer on that point today.

The scale of resources being committed under the support for innovation programme and under other related programmes is tiny compared with France or Germany, not to mention the two giants whom we are trying to catch up—America and Japan. A distinguished former civil servant has put forward figures for the micro-electronic component industry and they speak for themselves. The French have increased their spending by 500 per cent. during the past four years. The Germans have more than doubled theirs, but we have barely increased ours.

The Government's policy is shameful because it is short-sighted. It is harmful because the Department of Trade and Industry is being humiliated by the Treasury. It is negligent because it ignores the needs of British industries and research institutions. Labour will still work to save British science. It will work to restore the research and development budgets of our universities and research institutes. We will back British enterprise, British technology and British management, in whom we have not lost faith. We will back those institutions in their efforts to co-operate with Europe and to obtain their fair share from Europe. That is the only way forward. While the Government are looking and walking backwards, Labour will have the courage, intelligence and self- interest to back Britain and British brains.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood) for raising this important subject and I congratulate him on the cogency of his observations. He drew attention to major developments in European co-operation in high technology. There can be no dispute that the success of those industries is critical to the future economic prosperity of the United Kingdom and Europe as a whole. It is especially vital that European industry should and will prove itself competitive in the emerging world markets for new technology if new jobs and wealth are to be created in Europe.

So far, European industry's performance in competing with the United States of America and Japan has been disappointing. In recent years, the Community's share of export markets for high technology has tended to decline while the penetration of imports into the Community in those sectors has increased. Yet this relative competitive weakness seems to be growing at a time when, according to the European Commission, the Community has been and is still spending a larger proportion than the United States of America or Japan on basic research. Unfortunately, Europe's strength in research is not matched by its performance in producing and selling products. We have a good record for winning Nobel prizes, but not for winning new markets. But there are positive signs of changing attitudes towards the better exploitation of research and development so as to sell products, processes and services not just in Europe but in world markets.

That new spirit is shown by the steps being taken to create a genuine common market in Europe, to match the large domestic markets enjoyed by United States and Japanese companies. The Community has had this objective for all of 30 years. But many non-tariff barriers, such as differing national standards, remain in place. The creation of standards which are applied throughout Europe is vital if real collaboration in high technology industries is to be fostered, as is the opening of public purchasing to create a more unified market.

In June last year, the Commission's White Paper "Completion of the Common Market" was welcomed by the European Council. This year, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, as the two countries holding the succeeding presidencies of the Community for the year, have identified more than 100 specific issues for decision. The process of opening the European markets is of central importance to the encouragement of co-operation by Europe's industry. Many of the individual measures taken to implement the White Paper will have a direct bearing on high technology Sectors such as information technology and telecommunications. In addition, the Eureka initiative—to which I will revert in detail later—will provide a clear link between the completion of the internal market and industrial collaboration by highlighting the measures which industry believes are essential to implement individual collaborative projects.

It is important also to recognise that the Community is playing a significant role in encouraging collaborative partnerships in high technology through aspects of its research and development programme. The most striking example is the Esprit programme, designed to strengthen Europe's capability in information technology by allowing companies to share costs and spread risks through co-operation across frontiers. The United Kingdom strongly backed the Esprit programme from the outset as an exciting and novel initiative. This view has been proved right by the response from industry during the two years the programme has run to date. The United Kingdom information technology industry has responded positively to the opportunities which Esprit offers. About 50 United Kingdom firms and 35 academic institutions are taking part in about 210 projects, which together represent more than two thirds of the work being supported under the programme. The whole programme represents a remarkable demonstration of European collaboration in an important high technology sector.

In computers, the Esprit programme is the centrepiece of European collaboration, but it is backed by a growing number of bilateral links. For example, the British and French Governments are exploring the idea of setting up a forum to encourage cross-frontier links between their two national industries.

The Community is developing programmes for research and development in a number of other areas which are also encouraging co-operation between firms in advanced technologies. The Brite programme is one example, which is concentrating on the application of new technology in more traditional sectors of industry. Another is the Race programme, which is concerned with the development of advanced telecommunications. All these programmes will help to bring together European industry into a collaborative effort which can handle those large, or particularly expensive research and development projects which can be more easily tackled at a European level than on a national basis.

A major development in the Community's research and development efforts will take place over the rest of this year with the discussion and agreement on a new framework programme for reseach and development between 1987 and 1991. The process of formulating and considering these new plans has only just begun, so I cannot discuss them in detail today. But the objective of the new programme must be quite clear: to address the research and development needs of European industry and to further the creation of a climate in which collaboration in high technology can lead on to real success in the market place.

Aerospace is another area where European collaboration has been an outstanding success. The current Airbus programme is the largest and most significant example of international collaboration in the field of civil aircraft. It has demonstrated that six European industrialists can combine their manufacturing resources to produce a highly competitive range of aircraft with a market appeal strong enough to challenge United States industry. The Airbus programme has also created the opportunity for numerous collaborative projects among European equipment manufacturers.

Both my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage and the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) referred to Government funding of the A330 and A340 projects. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House last week, the Department has yet to receive any application from British Aerospace for financial assistance in respect of these programmes. When that application is received it will be considered on its merits, taking into account among other factors the prospects of the project achieving commercial viability and evidence that British Aerospace has tried to obtain private finance.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Will the Minister give me an assurance on a matter to which the Secretary of State refused to respond when Trade and Industry questions were last before the House? It is not a hypothetical question because it relates to what is taking place. If the entirety of the money cannot be found from the private sector and if the other criteria are satisfied, including the criterion of the return on capital that is invested in the project, will the Government then, in principle, not be opposed to supporting the project?

Mr. Howard: I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made the position entirely clear in the House last week. I would not wish to add a word to the remarks which he made on that occasion.

I now turn to Eureka. Eureka is designed to stimulate a competitive European industrial capability in advanced technologies by providing an international framework for predominantly industry-based action to improve the exploitation of research and development through creation of collaborative, cross-frontier projects between two or more firms in the 18 member countries. The aim of these projects is to produce high technology goods, processes and services with a worldwide, not just European, sales potential.

So Eureka provides a framework for European business collaboration in advanced technology. I emphasise business collaboration, the essence of the whole concept is that collaboration should be market-led, initiated and carried through on a commercial basis by companies themselves. The Eureka machinery for co-operation between Governments is specifically designed to be flexible and responsive — the minimum necessary to discharge Eureka's two key tasks, which are to provide a network for the exchange of information on, and opportunities for, collaborative projects and a Europewide forum to identify market obstacles to the success of the projects, and to put new impetus behind action to tackle them. These are obstacles such as differing technical standards and protective public purchasing.

Eureka emphatically is not a new international bureaucracy. There have recently been some rather ill-informed suggestions to the contrary. One newspaper had evidently heard that the 18 member countries have agreed to establish a central secretariat. It jumped to the conclusion that this will be some vast unwieldy organisation charged with the task of "co-ordinating the projects themselves". Nothing could be further from the truth — as had been made crystal-clear in a press statement issued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 11 March when he announced the date of the London ministerial conference on Eureka. The alleged vast new bureaucracy will consist of just half a dozen professional people with a similar number in support. And their job will essentialy be to set up a data-bank and circulate information about Eureka projects.

Some newspapers have contained all-too-familiar calls for public money, echoed by the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West, who remains embedded in the old Labour party attitude of measuring each and every programme by the amount of money that can be thrown at it. Without any real regard to the qualitative nature of the targeting of Government assistance to areas where it can achieve most good.

I shall make two points perfectly clear. The first is that Eureka is not, and will not become, a new international mechanism for funding collaborative ventures. All 18 member countries are firmly agreed on that. Anything of the kind would be costly, wasteful and wholly unnecessary.

Secondly, it is absolutely right that the market itself — private capital — should be the primary source of finance for market-led projects of the kind that Eureka is designed to stimulate. I am certainly not saying that we see no role for Government support for industrial research and development. We of course recognise that, while high technology projects with genuine commercial potential should eventually show a profit, they often involve real risk in the initial research stages. So it is at this point that support from public funds can be justified to help the creation of what will become successful products, processes and services that will benefit not just the firms concerned but in aggregate, the country as a whole.

This is where our support for innovation scheme comes into the Eureka picture. Collaboration between British and European firms is an increasingly important development if those firms are to capture a real share of world markets. The Government are determined to make full and effective use of the SFI scheme to encourage British industry to take part in Eureka. I can put it no better than my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Information Technology, who said:

> "Collaboration is essential if business in Britain and in Europe as a whole is to remain competitive in new technologies. We are determined to make full and effective use of the resources available under the Support for Innovation scheme to encourage British industrial participation in Eureka.
> United Kingdom firms participating in Eureka projects are therefore eligible for support of up to 50 per cent. of their share of the applied research costs, and up to 25 per cent. of their share of development costs. Only one United Kingdom firm need be involved in a project to qualify for assistance at the higher level. In other respects, the terms of assistance in each case will be determined under the normal SFI criteria".

I should add that, following a recent exchange of views on the Eureka machinery on the support Governments are making available for Eureka projects, it is clear that these terms are very similar to those on which support is available in most other European countries.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: It does no good for the Minister to read out a press notice from the Department of Trade and Industry. Will the Minister categorically deny what the British Plastics Federation has circulated, which is to the effect that, as the support for the European collaborative ventures — in support of which all hon. Members stand—increases, the resources made available by the Department for the support for innovation scheme will decrease? Will the Minister please deny or confirm that?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman persists, as in other aspects of his approach, in inviting the House to regard the matter in black and white terms. He invites the House to adopt a simplistic approach. The House would not be inclined to regard such matters in such a misleading fashion.

There is no fixed approach to the funding of research and development. Of course, we have budgets for spending, but the exact balance between spending on collaborative projects in Europe and purely national projects must depend, as any sensible person would expect it to, on the merits of the applications received.

Mr. Robinson: The French Government have a different approach. The Conservative Government also has a different approach to regional policy, which was to maximise our uptake of European funds. If we reduce our national funding we shall reduce the total funding available to British industry. The French Government ensure that for every franc or pound that they obtain from the various collaborative Europen ventures, one unit of Government funding is provided.

Will the Minister please say whether the Government's intention is to reduce the support available through the support for innovation scheme to national programmes, in favour of European programmes? I am sorry to put a direct question to the Minister but it is better for him to give me a direct reply.

Mr. Howard: I have made the Government's attitude clear and said that applications regarding both collaborative projects in Europe and purely national projects will be treated on their merits. I do not share the hon. Gentleman's perception of the French Government's attitude to the matter. It is probably wise to resist any temptation, although it is a considerable one, to follow him into the highways and byways of French politics. It will be interesting to see whether the new French Government's attitude to the large losses made by Renault is the same as that of their predecessors. I do not necessarily regard the decisions taken across the Channel as being the best touchstone to apply to decisions made by our Government. I am confident that the Government's attitude can stand analysis on its merits and has nothing to fear in comparisons with attitudes and decisions taken by our European Community partners.

The facts about Eureka are that there are already 26 Eureka projects actually going ahead; there are another 50 project proposals in the pipeline; and, in the specifically British context, United Kingdom firms are now involved in discussions on about half of these 50 new proposals. Eureka is still at a formative stage and it is certainly not perfect. But it is developing into a bandwagon on to which companies—British and European—increasingly want to climb. We, as the United Kingdom chairman, are doing our best to ensure that a reality is made of the concept.

It is clear from all the developments I have mentioned that co-operation in the high technology industries is a matter which is taken very seriously in Europe today. There are already many examples, within the Eureka framework and outside, of exciting new joint ventures in high technology involving European companies. I can assure my hon. friend and the House that the Government are playing their full part in encouraging these developments. At the end of the day it will be the degree of flair, innovation and marketing skills shown by our industries themselves which will decide whether Europe can improve its track record in competing for world markets. But the Government are determined to create the right conditions for European collaboration in the advanced technologies, and are working hard with other European countries, both inside and outside the Community, to achieve that objective.

2.2 pm

Mr. Wood: I wish to thank my hon. and learned Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson) for their speeches. I commend the motion on the Order Paper to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House strongly supports the policies pursued by Her Majesty's Government in European collaboration in research and development in high technology industries, including through Esprit and Eureka; and in addition wishes to see these industries further develop joint manufacturing and marketing projects.

Sport for the Disabled

2.2 pm

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I beg to move,

That this House recognises the important role which sport can play in improving the quality of life for disabled people; notes with concern that the extent of the Sports Council's support for sport for the disabled was only £100,000 from a total budget of £30 million in 1985-86; and calls upon the Sports Council to make a reality of its slogan 'Sport for All' by giving proper financial support to disabled sportsmen.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to draw attention to the provision of sports facilities for the disabled. My motion first recognises the important role which sports can play in improving the quality of life for disabled people. In support of that argument, perhaps I may refer to a letter from a constituent who is a member of an organisation known as SADSAD—the Slough and District Sports Association for the Disabled. She asks herself:

"What do I benefit as a member of SADSAD? I gain better confidence in myself as a person, a unique individual and take a much more positive and social attitude to the others."

Sports associations give the disabled the opportunity to achieve and excell in another sphere of activity, and to gain confidence and, above all, self-respect through competitive activity and participation in sports.

For disabled sportsmen, competition is on two levels. Naturally, they compete against each other, as all sportsmen do. However, there is also the important element of competition against the individual disability. Beating the disability is the aim of many of these people —to live life to the full and to overcome the difficulties that they have found in their way.

However, without the provision of specialist facilities, or at the very least careful design of sporting facilities intended for general use to ensure that access for the physically disabled is relatively easy, there can be many obstacles to be overcome before the intending sportsman of sportswoman reaches first base—participating in a chosen sport. While facilities designed to be suitable and accessible for disabled people are equally accessible and suitable for use of the able bodied, the reverse, sadly, is not the case.

It has to be recognised that disabled people in our community form a minority, but it is a pretty sizeable one. It is estimated that about 8 per cent. of our total population suffers from disability in one form or another—more than 4 million people, and some estimates suggest that the figure is higher. It is important for those of us who enjoy the good fortune of being able bodied not be negligent of the needs of the disabled or to be complacent about our own good fortune and good health. Some people are born with disabilities, but many more acquire disability through accident or illness.

In my local sports association for the disabled, only one in 10 of its disabled members were born disabled, and the other 90 per cent. have suffered from disabling accidents or illnesses at a later stage in their lives. For those who in their able bodied life have been keen sportsmen the realisation that disablement does not have to mean the end of their active participation in sport can provide a very important psychological prop during that difficult and agonising period of adjusting to a different style of life.

Sport can bring benefits to all, and it should be available to all. As I understand it, this is the proud boast of the Sports Council slogan, "Sport for all". Sadly, this proud boast is found to be lacking in substance when one examines the support that the Sports Council gives to disabled sportsmen and sportswomen. I was shocked to learn from a written answer on 28 January this year from my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for sport that the Sports Council's grant aid to organisations directly concerned with sport for disabled people was approximately £100,000 in each of the past three years. That is only 0·3 per cent. of its budget, which in the current year is £32·9 million, which grows to about £40 million in the next financial year.

To place that minimal expenditure of £100,000 in context, I note from the public expenditure White Paper section on the Sports Council that it has spent 11 times as much as that on public affairs to promote the council's aims and policies, including, presumably, its slogan "Sport for all".

It spends 15 times as much on what is described as management, which I assume to be a euphemism for administration. If the provision for disabled sportsmen did no more than reflect the 8 per cent. of our population who suffer from a disability, the Sports Council's expenditure in support of sport for the disabled would be more than £2·5 million a year against its actual spend of only £100,000.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I shall deal with some of the points that my hon. Friend is making when I reply to the debate, but he says that the money to which he referred represents direct grants to specific organisations for the disabled. Will he bear in mind that the whole of the Sports Council's grant is aimed at all people? Is he able to say a few words about the integration of the disabled into the community? I should be interested in his comments about that aspect before I reply to his motion.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend has made a good point. I am not setting out to achieve some kind of sports apartheid in which the disabled have their section and the able-bodied have theirs. I said earlier that to the fullest possible extent sports facilities which are designed for general use should also cater for the needs of the disabled and bear in mind difficulty of access for the disabled so that there is the widest possible access for all. I acknowledge that some of the Sports Council's expenditure under other headings will indirectly be of benefit to the disabled, just as it benefits the whole of the community. None the less, if the Sports Council had been able to present its performance in meeting the needs of disabled people in a somewhat better light than that disturbingly low figure of £100,000 reveals, I believe that it would have taken that opportunity. I have seen no sign of that.

I acknowledge that the Sports Council has a wide responsibility, that one of its responsibilities is to promote centres of excellence, and that this has an inevitable effect upon the way in which it allocates its resources. However, it is important to recognise that it is not only the able bodied who can excel in sport. To my mind, the thalidomide victim who swims competitively, propelled only by stumps where arms and legs should be, also has a desire to excel and strives to excel and to achieve. That excellence and that achievement should also be recognised. Therefore, the Sports Council should accept the responsibility also to support centres of excellence for disabled sportsmen.

I am neither disabled nor, as my somewhat over-ample frame probably indicates, an active participant in sport or, indeed, a spectator. But that does not prevent me from understanding the immense pleasure which participation in sport brings to so many people, both the able bodied and the disabled. But my particular interest in sport for the disabled stems from my involvement with SADSAD, the organisation in my constituency, and my role as a patron of its Everest building appeal.

That appeal is so named because its organisers have set themselves what they see as the mountainous task of raising £300,000 to fund the building of a purpose-built sports centre for the disabled at Stoke park in Slough. The plans for this centre include, obviously, a level single-storey building so that there is easy access throughout, with a major sports hall marked out for a wide variety of sports, including badminton, basketball, handball and volleyball. Other activities which are planned include archery, athletics, bowls, darts, judo, movement, dance and table tennis.

That part of the project represents only the foothills. There are further plans for phases 2, 3 and onwards which would provide facilities for track events, swimming and bowling. It is no exaggeration to liken the task SADSAD has set itself to the scaling of Everest.

I am not one of those who argue that voluntary organisations should look primarily to the public purse for all their funding. Since the appeal was launched in 1983, voluntary funding of £27,000 has been raised. That has been sufficient to pay the professional fees charged to complete all the design work and to obtain planning permission so that construction can begin as soon as the balance of the funds becomes available.

Berkshire county council has given the site for the sports centre at a peppercorn rent of £10 a year. Discussions are taking place with Slough borough council and the South Buckinghamshire district council about financial contributions from those authorities. Voluntary fund raising continues relentlessly. The mayor of Slough has approached the European Commission through the good offices of Baroness Elles, who is our MEP, but an application for support to the Sports Council has been deferred until the end of this year. That is disappointing. I hope that the Sports Council's consideration will be favourable and that it will recognise that the facility not only will serve the people of Slough but will have the potential to form a regional centre of excellence for sports for the disabled — a facility of "wider than local significance", as the public expenditure White Paper stated.

Each year, SADSAD hosts a weekend of sporting activities to which disabled sportsment from all over the country come. The programme of events at last September's meeting shows a wide range of activities, starting at 9 am on Saturday and continuing until 8 pm on Sunday, encompassing all sorts of field events and going down to draughts and dominoes. Most of them are active participatory sports. I have had the pleasure of attending those sporting events and seeing the pleasure felt by the sportsmen in their ability to participate and seeing their great courage, bravery and determination to overcome their disabilities so that they can achieve in sport.

What more could be done if only this purpose-built centre were available to the disabled people of my constituency, the surrounding areas and the rest of the southern region? I hope that some of the Budget proposals, including those that extend tax relief to charitable donations, will provide a further welcome boost to our voluntary fund raising efforts. I hope that local companies will seize the opportunity to put some of the profits they have earned in the community back in the community for the benefit of disabled people, most of whom are their employees. I hope that employees of local companies will take the opportunity to contribute to this project through the payroll deduction scheme with the benefit of tax relief.

We shall exploit all the oportunities to the hilt, but there is still room for an element of public funding. Each year millions of pounds are spent on the provision of sports facilities at public expense through the Sports Council and local authorities. In the past 10 years, the Slough corporation has spent £15 million on the provison of sports facilities locally—facilities, it must be said, which are used predominantly by the able bodied.

No one asks able bodied sportsmen to raise cash before any of the facilities are provided and before the local authority makes a contribution. No one asks able bodied sportsmen to carry on fund raising after the facility has been provided in order to defray the running cost. Why is it that such a demand should be made, almost uniquely on disabled sportsmen, who have extra disabilities and obstacles to overcome before they even reach the starting point of participating in sport? Why should they be required to meet such stringent requirements before the public purse strings can be loosened just a little?

I am in favour of voluntary effort, and I intend no pun when I say that people should stand on their own feet, because that is precisely what the members of SADSAD and other disabled sports associations do to the best of their physical ability. However, they need some support, the support that is readily available to the able bodied. The Sports Council has a responsibility to take a lead, and I call upon it to face its responsibilities for disabled sportsmen and to make a reality of what is at present no more than an empty slogan, "Sport for all".

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) for raising this matter. I attach considerable importance to this subject, and so do my colleagues in Government. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House agree on the importance of consideration for the disabled. If my hon. Friend's motion had been the first and not the third one on the Order Paper, we would have had a sizeable attendance, because he and I remember that for Friday debates about the disabled in the past there was always a queue of hon. Members outside the door, waiting to get in to talk about the subject. It is a matter that touches deeply our lives and the lives of a number of our constituents.

My contact with the disabled over the years has been fairly considerable. They desperately wish to be integrated in the community and not to have too much attention focused upon them. They do not want a spotlight placed upon them or for there to be too much probing discussion. I should like to develop that point in my remarks about the integration of disabled people into sport, a subject I mentioned to my hon. Friend in my intervention. The Sports Council's policy is enthusiastic on this point.

We fully recognise the value to disabled people of all ages of participation in sport and recreational activities. That is not only because of the important health benefits which are also enjoyed by the able-bodied, but because of the sheer enjoyment and the contact that they enjoy with their fellows. In my responsibility for sport and recreation I am keen to promote community participation in all sports at grass roots level. I have talked about that many times both in the House and outside, and I view as a priority that we should have full-scale community participation in sport for all our people. Disabled people should have the same opportunity as able-bodied people to participate in sport.

My hon. Friend has mentioned his experiences in his constituency, and they are obviously good ones. We have all had such experiences. My constituency is fortunate to have the Kingston Association for the Disabled and SADSAD sounds similar. The Kingston association has a lively and active secretary and a full programme of events. Indeed, in Surrey, around my constituency, the disabled have a considerable involvement in sport. It shows how well-organised things are because I have already been asked to a special football tournament for the disabled in Surrey in May 1987. No doubt that will be an excellent day and, as with other sporting contests, it will be followed in the evening by, I am told, a good dinner at which I am asked to speak. That is the sort of enthusiasm that I find.

I have had contact with sports for the disabled for a number of years. When I was at school one of the best days in our rowing calendar was rowing against the Worcester college for the blind on the River Avon and the River Severn. We had some real needle matches. Latterly, I have been involved in the triathlon competition at the royal showground at Stoneleigh where co-ordinated teams of the able-bodied and disabled join in shooting and fishing. The able-bodied ride horses and the disabled compete in a slalom event. That is the sort of thing that leads me to believe that provision is being made, some of it voluntary, some of it provided from public funds. The provision is there and the keenness is there.

My hon. Friend has drawn attention in his motion to the Sports Council's policies towards, and funding of, sports for the disabled. He will no doubt be aware that all Government money specifically allocated for the development of sport, particularly the unique services, is channelled through the Sports Council. It is for the council to decide how much of its funds are specifically allocated to various sports or to a specific area such as sport for the disabled. Mr. Ken Roberts is an active member of the Sports Council. He is disabled and he specifically represents the views of the disabled and takes part in the general discussions of the council. The council distributes its funds in the light of its policies and priorities with fair consideration of all those matters.

Apart from the Sports Council, I am glad that my hon. Friend has not forgotten, that the major contribution to sport from public funds in Britain is the £700 million going through the local authorities, of which a large part is from the rate support grant.

My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to matters of planning and design of sports facilities. I am glad to say that the Sports Council takes a great interest in those premises that are particularly within its direct responsibility—the national centres. In the annual report for the last year, mention is made of Worcester college for the blind participating in mountaineering and rock-climbing exercises at the Plas-y-Brenin national centre in Wales and also the special courses for deaf squash players at the Bisham abbey premises near Marlow, close to my hon. Friend's constituency.

I can assure my hon. Friend that disabled people have certainly not been forgotten by the Sports Council in the exercise of the "Sport for all" ideal. The European "Sport for all" charter was, of course, aimed at all sectors of the community and the council is concerned to encourage disabled sportsmen and women to integrate—that is an important word—with the more able-bodied, wherever appropriate.

The principle of integration with the able-bodied is an important one to grasp in understanding the Sports Council's funding of the facilities for the disabled. There is no direct reference to it in my hon. Friend's motion. Nor should we overlook the fact that there are a number of sports in which the disabled compete on equal terms with the able-bodied. I have spoken already of rowing and canoeing, and I can also mention archery, shooting, bowls, and sailing.

I should give more details of the Council's grant-aid policy. The motion refers to sports Council support of £100,000 for sport for the desabled, and while that figure is correct, it represents only the value of direct grant aid to specific disabled sport organisations such as the British sports association for the disabled—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Michael Martin (Report)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I thank the House for the opportunity to raise once again the case of Michael Martin by way of an Adjournment debate. As the House is probably aware, and as the Minister is certainly aware, the death of Michael Martin in Broadmoor some 18 months ago really lit a touch paper to a torch which began to illuminate a number of matters.

The matter moved forward from there by the appointment of an inquiry under Miss Shirley Ritchie, QC, which reported in the summer of last year. Many of us who have an interest in this area and in mental health generally waited with some interest to see to what extent the Ritchie report would be received by the Government. The initial reaction is that they accepted all the recommendations, as I understand it, except one. The Mental Health Act Commission, in a release dated the same day — 30 August—urged the Government to change their mind on that recommendation. I hope that this afternoon, I can deal with that recommendation and then widen the issue into general matters which appertain to people who are detained in places such as Broadmoor.

That recommendation was one which, on the face of it, seems to any sensible man or woman to be perfectly reasonable. It recommends that people should not be administered sedative drugs, particularly heavy sedative drugs, unless it be done under the authority of and by a medical practitioner. There are few people in this land who would feel happy if they knew that the decision as to dosage for particular sedatives did not lie in the hands of a medical practitioner.

Michael Martin was detained in Broadmoor. There had been an incident, the facts of which are not pertinent now. After the incident Michael Martin was physically restrained, stripped of his clothes and injected. The injection was made by a nurse. The injection he was given was heavy — 500 ml of one sedative and 200 ml of another. The tragedy was that he had already received, if my memory serves me correctly, some 400 ml of a further sedative earlier that day. He had eaten and they put him in a side room. He choked to death on his own vomit. Of course, certain physical injuries had been sustained when he was restrained, but that issue need not concern us this afternoon.

Any of us who considers those matters with any care appreciates that in mental hospitals there are occasions when people should be, need to be and have to be restrained for their own safety. How they are restrained should be the subject of careful training. How they should be dealt with medically must, of necessity, mean very careful medical training.

When one puts a drug into a human being, sometimes against his will, one cannot predict with complete certainty what will happen. The tragedy in Michael's case was that the mixture or the cocktail—call it what one will—of drugs undoubtedly led to vomiting, as the report shows, and to his death. I do not blame the staff of Broadmoor in any way. I do not seek in this Adjournment debate to cast any aspersions on them. I hope that we can learn some lessons from that tragedy, and ensure that it never occurs again and that the standards in the secure mental hospitals of Broadmoor, Rampton, Moss Side and Park Lane are raised.

The people who serve in those institutions take on an onerous task. Unless, as a society, we give them the assistance that they need, we are not fair to them nor to the patients in those hospitals. If it means — it must mean this — that we have to increase the staffing levels in those four institutions, so be it, because a society that is not prepared to help the weakest in its midst, and those in greatest need, is a pretty poor society. People find themselves in secure units because they are said to have committed a criminal offence — one accepts that the majority have, but sometimes they have not. They are, through no fault of their own, deemed to be extremely ill. Mental illness is not a glamorous subject. It does not excite great headlines. Few people are prepared to fight the corner for it, but I assure the Minister that those who are prepared to do so will continue to press and press on those matters.

The more I read of the Ritchie report, and the more carefully I consider how the terms of reference were interpreted, the more I believe that only one narrow aspect of the matter has as yet been explored. The exploration that one seeks is in no way an attempt to criticise what has happened. We hope that the exploration is in the spirit of seeking ways to prevent tragedies in the future and to improve and enhance the standard of care in hospitals.

The one recommendation that the Government could not accept states:

> "The decision to administer heavy sedatives should be made by a doctor and not by nursing staff. The decision should be made at the time of the incident by a doctor in attendance on the ward. He should be made fully aware of the extent of the violence immediately preceding his attendance and the quality and quantity of food recently consumed by the patient."

My next remark is in no way critical of the nursing profession. Is it right to put upon the nurses at Broadmoor the onerous decision of making decisions about the injection of heavy sedatives? The Mental Health Act Commission says no, and most of the members of the medical profession to whom I have spoken say no. Everybody says no, but the Government say yes. I accept that it will mean that doctors will have to be in attendance on the wards at Broadmoor, perhaps around the clock. I accept that it will mean more doctors. But is that not a small, and, indeed, the right price to pay? Such important decisions could then be taken by those trained to take them. The staff at Broadmoor would be the first to say that their training should be longer and more intensive. It is not adequate for the decisions that have to be taken. The same applies to Rampton, Park Lane, and Moss Side, and the other secure hospitals. Some mental hospitals, including Rainhill in my constituency, have secure units attached to them. The same principle must apply. If we are to learn any lesson from Michael's death, let it be that expertise must be brought to bear when administering heavy sedatives.

I referred earlier to the danger of the drug cocktail. A person needs to be a specialist to understand such things, and needs to be trained for years before being able to take the right decisions. The doctors in attendance at Broadmoor have specialised, and have not come straight from college. They are very experienced men. Is it too much to ask, then, that a doctor should be there to make the decision when a patient needs heavy sedation? He would have to consider what food the patient had eaten, because of the risk of choking to death on vomit when sedated.

In the case of Michael Martin, a doctor was not in attendance, there was a death, and there are lessons to be learnt. The report shows that the wing where Michael was located lacked facilities. I do not blame the staff, who have to cope with horrendous problems. However, the fact that a person is mentally ill does not mean that he needs to be sitting in a chair in a group of 12 for endless hours day after day. That is not the way to help. Outdoor facilities should be available. I appreciate that that would cost money, and that it would mean more staff and greater investment. But, our society can afford that.

Let it never be said that the sick are too heavy a cost for society to bear. After all, a person goes to Broadmoor because he is ill. It may well be that he has committed an offence, but that offence may have been committed before he was ill. Of course, some patients have committed no offence, and are just ill.

Money lies at the root of our problems. The facilities are inadequate, as are staffing numbers. Even the buildings are inadequate. I have raised this subject in the hope that a life lost in tragic circumstances will not have been lost in vain. If all five of the report's recommendations can be implemented, and if the Minister gives an undertaking that he will consider some of the matters I have raised about facilities, staffing and the general conditions within secure units, that tragedy may well turn out to be one step along the road to better conditions for many.

2.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) for raising this important matter. He touched on the tragic death of Mr. Michael Martin and covered broader issues, and I shall try to respond as well as I can to all his points. If I have not covered some of them, I or my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State will write to the hon. Gentleman. I accept the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that we must learn from such tragedies, and that we must constantly strive to enhance the standards of care in such difficult cases. I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's consistent interest in the complex and important area of mental health and his activities with the organisation MIND.

Given the tragic case of Mr. Martin, the reaction that it caused and the inquest's finding of "accidental death aggravated by lack of care,"

this was clearly a matter of such public concern that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the former Minister for Health, decided to establish an inquiry. It was also an opportunity for the staff at Broadmoor to put their side of the story relating to the events of that day and other events. My right hon. and learned Friend invited Miss Shirley Ritchie, QC to undertake the inquiry. She sought advice on clinical matters from two highly respected clinicians — Dr. Higgins, a consultant psychiatrist, and Miss McCloughlin, a district nursing officer.

Before I talk about some aspects of the report and what has been done to improve procedures at Broadmoor hospital in the light of Miss Ritchie's recommendations, and in the light of decisions taken separately, in some instances before her recommendations appeared, it is important to emphasise the context in which patients such as Mr. Martin are cared for in special hospitals. As the hon. Gentleman understands, it is a difficult job, and he paid tribute to the staff. We recognise that the physical environment is far from ideal. Broadmoor hospital is well over 100 years old, and despite the best efforts of all to improve the fabric of the building, to reduce patient numbers significantly during the past 10 years, and to advance therapeutic and rehabilitation regimes, it remains a difficult place in which to work.

Problems are exacerbated by the fact that staff are dealing with mentally disordered patients who, because they are either so difficult to manage or so prone to extreme dangerousness, cannot be satisfactorily cared for anywhere except in conditions of special security. The House will agree that we owe it to the staff to recognise that those problems exist, and that was certainly the case with Mr. Martin.

I do not wish to give details about patients, but it is clear that Mr. Martin was a young man who fluctuated sharply between moods of cheerfulness and considerable violence. During his time in Broadmoor, he made more than 20 unprovoked attacks on staff and other patients. Yet, between those bouts, he displayed a happy and lively personality. The nursing staff were fond of Mr. Martin, who was one of their younger patients, and as Miss Ritchie said in her report, he became something of a pet on the ward. However, there is no doubt that he could be a difficult patient to handle. It is to the credit of those looking after him that, while in Norfolk house, he showed some overall improvement, to the extent that consideration had been given to the possibility of a planned transfer of him back to Bexley hospital.

Miss Ritchie's report appeared in August 1985 and Ministers welcomed the care and sympathy with which the task was carried out and the skill with which she identified the problems and shortcomings that had occurred. Miss Ritchie made five recommendations, all of which were accepted except that which related to the practice of administering heavy sedatives, to which the hon. Member for St. Helen's South referred with some emphasis.

There is no doubt that the administering of sedatives is a difficult issue in all hospitals, and especially so in hospitals such as Broadmoor in the circumstances which I have described. Section I of Miss Ritchie's report discusses this issue in detail and the responsibilities that attach to it. It quotes in full the notice issued on 8 October 1984 by the medical director to all nursing staff and doctors in Broadmoor. The effect of the notice was to forbid the administration of any medication unless it had previously been prescribed in writing by a doctor. The issue of a prescription in writing is known as the PRN basis, and it specifies in advance the circumstances in which particular forms of medication may be administered to a named patient. The effect of insisting that a decision to administer heavy sedatives should be made by a doctor and not by nursing staff and of specifying that the decision would be to prevent medical and nursing staff at the hospital from using the PRN practice, to which I have referred, which is generally accepted as being available for use by medical and nursing staff in hospitals. As I have said, this was the only one of Miss Ritchie's recommendations that was not accepted by the Department.

"should be made at the time of the incident by a doctor in attendance on the ward"

The effect of the recommendation would have been to remove from the nursing staff at Broadmoor hospital, and Broadmoor hospital alone, the professional responsibility of a qualified nurse to exercise judgment in the administration of properly prescribed medicines.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, South has suggested that everyone agrees with Miss Ritchie and that no one agrees with the Department's view. That is not so. Among others, the Royal College of Psychiatrists, the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting and the Royal College of Nursing have all confirmed that they agree with decision not to accept this one recommendation of the Ritchie report.

There is no doubt that when the tragic incident involving Michael Martin occurred there was a degree of confusion and lack of precision. I think that it is clear that the effect of the two notices that have since been issued by the medical director is to remove all uncertainty and ambiguity and to ensure that the practice at Broadmoor hospital will conform with the most demanding standards that might be applied in any other hospital. The responsible medical officer is involved in evey decision to employ advance prescribing. He specifies the dosage of a particular drug to be administered in defined circumstances to a particular patient. For example, in the case of a patient who is thought likely to have a disturbed episode, it might be decided that it would be in the patient's own interests if drug treatment were given immediately. If at the same time there are contra-indications, senior nurses will seek medical guidance and will not administer the drug automatically.

Multidisciplinary working, underpinned by clinical teams concerned with the overall care of the patient, is practised in Broadmoor as in other psychiatric hospitals. Decisions on medication are taken in that context. There may be occasions when it is essential that a patient is given medication without delay. Advance prescription is decided in the light of discussions between the members of the clinical team. Following the administration of such a prescription there would be a full review by the clinical team. That is in step with current thinking on crisis intervention throughout the National Health Service.

The hon. Gentleman said that some members of the Mental Health Act Commission are not disposed to accept the Department's view. Baroness Trumpington has had discussions with the chairman of the commission and we are continuing to investigate the issue through a working party. I emphasise that this situation obtains throughout the Health Service and has been extremely carefully considered. We shall have to move carefully before we go in the direction urged by the hon. Gentleman.

All the other recommendations in the report by Miss Ritchie have been adopted. That is a demonstration of our commitment to continue improving as best we can our care and treatment of such patients, given the inherrently difficult problems.

Prior to that inquiry, a number of matters were already under consideration or had been acted upon by the hospital. For example, there was training in restraint for staff. Just before Mr. Martin's death the hospital management team decided that Broadmoor hospital staff should undertake such courses and begin training before the end of 1984.

During 1984, the Department had in progress a comprehensive review of seclusion policy and procedures in the special hospital service. In April 1985 a report constituting policy for local application was sent to each hospital. That is another concern emphasised by Miss Ritchie's report.

On 15 October 1984, the hospital provided nursing staff with written guidance about the internal movement of patients in Norfolk house. The number of beds has been reduced in Norfolk house, where Mr. Martin was established, from 39 to 36, and the staff has been increased by one. The hospital management team has plans to reduce from three to two the wards in Norfolk house. A key element is the provision of a re-socialisation unit on the top floor. The scope for occupational therapy has been considered carefully by the hospital management team. It is seeking improvements.

We have been talking about an extremely difficult and emotive case. Everyone concerned was deeply disturbed by it. When tragedies such as this occur it is essential to learn from them. Whether or not mistakes are made, we can always learn. That was the objective in conducting the report. I am confident that we and the hospital authorities generally have learnt from the Ritchie report. We can take some comfort from that. We must always keep on trying, but we shall never reach perfection in such a difficult area.

We shall keep the administration of sedatives under review. The circumstances in which sedatives may be prescribed have been carefully examined. We are talking about a longstanding practice which has been found to be adequate and, indeed, necessary, given the type of emergencies that inevitably arise from time to time.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Mold bypass

1. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the starting date for the construction of the proposed Mold bypass.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): Subject to the satisfactory completion of engineering design and statutory procedures we expect the scheme to be ready to start in the period January 1988 to December 1990. This accords with the provisional programme set out in "Roads in Wales 1985".

Mr. Raffan: Is my hon. Friend aware that any delay in starting the construction of the Mold bypass will seriously hinder the industrial development and creation of jobs on the Bromfield park industrial estate and the Nercwys road industrial park at Mold? In view of the danger that that could mean the loss of industrial momentum in Delyn, which the Government have done so much to promote, will he seriously consider reverting to an earlier starting date?

Mr. Roberts: I assure my hon. Friend that there has been no delay. However, it is not really a practicable proposition to advance the start of the scheme. We are already working to the earliest possible start date.

Radioactive Discharges

2. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how regularly his Department monitors radioactive discharges from nuclear installations into the environment in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): Monitoring of radioactive discharges from nuclear installations in Wales is carried out by Her Majesty's radiochemical inspectorate on our behalf. Its programme includes quarterly sampling of liquid discharges from both Trawsfynydd and Wylfa power stations. This is in addition to monitoring by the operators themselves to meet Welsh Office requirements.

The effects of discharges to the atmosphere and to the aquatic environment are monitored on our behalf by the food science division and the fisheries radiological inspectorate of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Thomas: I thank the Minister for his reply. Will he confirm the information that I have been given by the Central Electricity Generating Board, that the discharge from Trawsfynydd, which included some radioactive particulate matter, did not present any radiological hazard to the public?

Mr. Robinson: I am able to confirm that. The incident at Trawsfynydd is now under investigation, and reports from various bodies are expected in the near future.

Mr. Grist: Will my hon. Friend see that his Department constantly gives every reassurance to the public on the safety of nuclear power generation? Nuclear power is of great advantage to many of our competitors and to the people of Scotland, who get cheaper electricity because 40 per cent. of it is generated by nuclear power?

Mr. Robinson: I can give that assurance. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy illustrated that point a few days ago when he said that the safety record of the nuclear industry in the United Kingdom continues to be second to none.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Is the Minister aware that the public are becoming increasingly concerned about the hazards posed by nuclear installations? For example, does he realise that there is a recognition in the Severnside area that it needs another such power station like it needs a hole in the head? If the CEGB attempts to walk in the face of popular feeling, it will meet the strongest possible resistance.

Mr. Robinson: I strongly refute the comments made by the hon. Gentleman. Authorisation of discharges in Severnside rests with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Aquatic monitoring of the Severn takes place regularly, and sites in Gwent are included in the station monitoring procedures. The Welsh Office keeps in close touch with all Departments concerned. The public can rest assured that monitoring is carried out effectively and continuously.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is it not a fact that the nuclear power industry has had a remarkable history of safety rather than of danger? To that extent, has it not been much safer than other industries, including even the coal industry?

Mr. Robinson: I thank my hon. Friend for that remark. I can confirm that that is the case. It is important not to get carried away by scare stories which do not have any basis in reality.

EC Farm Prices

4. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from Welsh livestock farmers about the negotiations on European Community farm prices; and if he will make a statement.

20. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from farmers in Wales and in the area of Vale of Glamorgan council, respectively, concerning negotiations on European Economic Community farm prices; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I and my officials have already met both farming unions on several occasions for substantive discussion on the European Community farm price proposals for 1986-87. I have carefully noted their views, and they will be taken into account in the forthcoming negotiations. I have had no separate representations from farmers in the Vale of Glamorgan council area.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Secretary of State agree with his right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that farmers in Wales should receive less in the current price review than they did last year?

Mr. Edwards: I am sure that price restraint is necessary if we are not to continue to increase the already very large surpluses in the Community. Indeed, that position has been generally accepted by the farmers unions in their discussions with us. I should be interested to hear whether it is the view of the Liberal party that we should seek to boost the wasteful surpluses.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is my right hon. Friend optimistic or otherwise about the outcome of the negotiations?

Mr. Edwards: Clearly there is a difficult period of negotiation ahead. The Community has now enlarged. One of our principal objectives in the negotiations is to see that none of the measures discriminates against British farmers, but that British farmers are fairly treated alongside farmers in the other Community countries.

Mr. Harvey: In view of the sharp fall in farm incomes last year, will my right hon. Friend guarantee that, in particular, the sheepmeat regime, which is vital for many hill producers in Wales, is preserved?

Mr. Edwards: I share my hon. Friend's view about the importance of the sheepmeat regime. Indeed, it is because of the success of that regime and the fact that we are not so dependent on cereals in Wales that the fall in farm incomes in Wales was so much less than in the rest of the United Kingdom. The Commission's proposals envisage the continuation of the sheepmeat regime in substantially its present form.

Mr. John: As reform of the common agricultural policy is intertwined with this year's price proposals, does the Secretary of State accept that the Commission's proposals on both beef and sheepmeat discriminate against the present United Kingdom farm structure and must be changed?

Mr. Edwards: I agree that there are discriminatory proposals before us. When I started answering this question, I said that one of the Government's principal objectives was to resist the Commission's discriminatory proposals, which apply in the cereal sector as well in the two sectors mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McQuarrie: Does my right hon. Friend accept that hill and upland farmers in Wales suffer the same problems as those in Scotland? Will he ensure that in any negotiations within the Community the beef premium is maintained, because it is essential for those rural areas?

Mr. Edwards: I assure my hon. Friend that we attach the same importance to the beef premium scheme in Wales as he does to the scheme in Scotland. As he knows, there are proposals for reforming the beef regime generally. There may be a need for general reform, but we attach great importance to the beef premium scheme. However, it will be a difficult negotiation, because our views on the scheme are not shared by most other members of the Community.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Does the Secretary of State, who is responsible for agriculture in Wales, intend to take part in the negotiations?

Mr. Edwards: I do not intend to go to Brussels because I do not believe that that would strengthen our negotiating position. The proper way to protect the interests of different parts of the United Kingdom is to see that we meet the farmers unions, discuss the proposals in detail and then present a single negotiating position within the Community. It is already difficult enough to present sensible negotiations in a Community of Twelve. I do not believe that we strengthen the Welsh case by trying to isolate ourselves. Anyone who thinks that simply does not understand either the nature of the Community or what is really important for Welsh farmers.

Dr. Roger Thomas: the Secretary of State is prepared to travel abroad on behalf of Wales and to listen to the Farmers Union of Wales, why does he not do a proper job and visit Brussels on behalf of the farmers of west Wales? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that 10 per cent. of farmers in west Wales are in dire financial straits and that they would be glad to see him go to Brussels and do a proper job for Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I am flabbergasted by the hon. Gentleman's remarks. If there is one thing that the farmers of west Wales understand, which the hon. Gentleman does not, it is that they benefit from being part of the general arrangements for the purchasing of milk and for the support of agriculture. They know that they gain enormously from being part of the England and Wales arrangements and that it would be a total catastrophe for them if they were isolated or separated from arrangements which are of such benefit to them.

Labour Statistics

5. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest unadjusted figures for unemployment in (a) Newport, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales; what were the equivalent figures in May 1979; and what was the percentage increase in each case.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The unadjusted February 1986 figures for Newport, Gwent and Wales are 213,288, 30,602 and 188,405. Unadjusted figures for 1979 were produced on a different basis and cannot properly be compared with this year's figures.

Mr. Hughes: Is the Secretary of State not concerned about the mounting redundancies and closures in the area? The recent example of Standard Telephones closing its electronics factory at Newport is but a case in point. On the Secretary of State's recent visit to Japan, was he able to capitalise, by way of new investment, on the good will which I found on my recent visit shortly before his?

Mr. Edwards: I cannot say that all the Japanese industrialists whom I saw had the name of the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on their lips. I do not know what influence he may have had for goood or evil, but I am certain that in the coming months there will be further significant investment by Japanese companies in Wales and that that investment will far exceed the job losses to which the hon. Member referred.

Mr. Raffan: When will the two pilot schemes announced in the Budget—job start and job counselling —for the long-term unemployed be implemented and extended throughout Wales? How many extra staff will be taken on at jobcentres in Wales to ensure that job counselling is effective and covers all the long-term unemployed?

Mr. Edwards: We shall put the new schemes into operation as quickly as possible. I am meeting the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission this week to discuss the detailed implementation and the exact numbers that are to be applied in Wales. In advance of that meeting I would rather not add to my general comments.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Is the Secretary of State able to tell the House when the unemployment figures for Wales will take a downward trend, because during the past seven years they have been going up and up?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has asked that question on so many occasions he should know the answer. I have no intention of making such forecasts. However, I can tell him that very substantial capital investment in industry is taking place in Wales. We are continuing to attract about 20 per cent. of the inward investment for the whole of the United Kingdom, and we have recently had some notable successes, such as attracting Renishaw to Cwmbran. We know of a considerable number of major new investments which will create jobs in Wales and which will be announced in the coming months.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Does my right hon. Friend agree that last week's Budget was the best prescription for the country continuing to generate more new jobs faster than all other countries in Europe?

Mr. Edwards: I agree that the Budget will contribute to more new jobs. It also confirms that the Government's underlying policies are leading to continued growth faster than elsewhere in the Community, and to falling inflation. We have introduced a tripartite package of measures designed to help enterprise, the young and the long-term unemployed. They are in addition to the substantial range of measures that we have already announced to help the unemployed and to improve youth training.

Mr. Rogers: Does the Secretary of State accept that the measures that he says have been undertaken are simply not working? Is he aware that on the Penrhys housing estate, which has a community of 3,000 people and unemployment of over 80 per cent. among both young and old, severe problems are being caused because the measures that the Government have introduced are not working? Why does the Secretary of State not accept that and do something positive instead?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman has asked me to do something positive. I remind him that the Government have introduced the priority estates programme, which is already beginning to result in improvements on the estate that he has mentioned. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not running down an important programme which is designed to improve conditions on an estate which has been in its present state for some years, and which was not built under the auspices of this Government. We have taken positive measures, which have been greatly welcomed, and I believe that they will improve conditions on the estate to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Best: Contrary to what the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) said, is it not a fact that the special employment measures that the Government have introduced are working extremely well? For example, is it not a fact that 61 per cent. of those who become part of the enterprise allowance scheme are still trading two years after having joined it?

Mr. Edwards: Yes, I believe that is right. I have no doubt that the scheme has been extremely successful.

Mr. Rowlands: A couple of weeks ago the Secretary of State announced his valley community investment scheme, and there were high hopes that the Budget would bring additional moneys for the Welsh Development Agency and the construction industry. Why has the right hon. Gentleman been left so empty handed after the Budget? Our valley communities need new investment through the WDA.

Mr. Edwards: If an earlier question had been asked, I would have said that the WDA, which has spent about £624 million between January 1976 and March 1986, will be spending about £76·8 million in 1986-87. That is substantial expenditure. There will be a great deal spent in the valleys, including expenditure on derelict land. As I told the House during the Welsh day debate, the expenditure of the WDA will be directed especially at making effective the valleys' initiative, which I launched and which the hon. Gentleman supported, and for whose support I am grateful.

Killan Fach Farm, Dunvant, Swansea

6. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales when his Department delivered the letter sent on 24 February to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson) from the hon. Member for Gower to the inspector holding the public inquiry at the Guildhall, Swansea, on 5 and 6 March into an appeal for residential development at Killan Fach farm, Dunvant, Swansea.

Mr. Mark Robinson: A copy of the hon. Member's letter was sent by first-class post from the Department's Cardiff office to the inspector's home address on 3 March.

Mr. Wardell: To avoid any future possible embarrassment to right hon. and hon. Members, will the Welsh Office ensure that when Members of this place attend public inquiries steps are taken to enable inspectors to receive their submissions before the inquiries commence?

Mr. Robinson: We do whatever we can in these matters. The inspector was informed that the representation was on its way. Unfortunately, its delivery was delayed and it did not arrive on time. The hon. Gentleman's original letter was received by the Department only on 26 February, so time was short in any event. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are reviewing our arrangements to try to ensure that this sort of thing does not happen again.

Ogwr

7. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales why he refused to meet representatives from Ogwr borough council to discuss the proposed return of Ogwr's regional development status and of related matters.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: As has been explained in various letters sent to the borough's chief executive officer by my office, there is no possibility of the assisted area map being revised so soon after the major changes of November 1984. In the circumstances, a meeting with representatives of the borough council to discuss a change in the status of Ogwr would not have served any useful purpose.

Mr. Powell: The Secretary of State will be aware that the council in its letter requested him or the Prime Minister to meet it, and it outlined the difficulties and problems in Ogwr borough. Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that there are 10,000 unemployed in the area and only 300 job vacancies? Every pit in the Ogmore and Ogwr borough area has been closed since the Governent came to office in 1979. Surely the right hon. Gentleman should have attended a meeting to discuss the problems which are besetting the coalfield area of Ogwr, or, in the interests of Ogwr, borough and its residents, prompted the Prime Minister, in the time that she is devoting to invest in stocks and shares, to attend such a meeting.

Mr. Edwards: I am aware of the problems of that borough. We were asked to meet to change the arrangements under which regional policy is administered, and we have made it clear that now is not the time to do that. We have, however, approved an urban programme allocation for 1986-87 which is more than double the allocation given to 1985-86. I have therefore met my commitment to the hon. Gentleman on that point. Since the review of regional policy carried out in 1984, offers of assistance totalling more than £2·5 million have been accepted in the Bridgend travel-to-work area. Those projects will create 500 new jobs and safeguard more than 100 existing jobs.

Rural Areas

8. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what guidance he gives to the Welsh Development Agency on the priority to be accorded to the rural areas of Wales in its various activities.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Development Agency's corporate plan confirms its commitment to the development of rural areas. I have recently discussed with the agency and with Mid Wales Development a strengthening of their rural development packages in co-operation with the Wales Tourist Board. Details of these new arrangements are being announced separately today.

Mr. Best: Does my right hon. Friend accept that his answer will be warmly welcomed throughout rural areas in Wales, particularly in Anglesey, and by those of us who press consistently for greater assistance for rural areas within the WDA's remit? What resources will be made available following the initiative?

Mr. Edwards: The initiative includes a much better presentation of the very wide range of measures already available. It includes a new grant scheme — the development of rural initiative, venture and enterprise, known as DRIVE — which is being introduced to stimulate private sector investment and to which £1 million has been allocated over the next two years. The initiative also involves the Welsh Development Agency broadening its definition of rural areas, introducing a low interest rural loans group scheme — which is to be streamlined throughout Wales — and improving the eligibility for grants to convert redundant rural buildings.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the Secretary of State recall 10 years ago describing the Welsh Development Agency as a Frankenstein monster and an extension of Bennery in Wales? Does he now regret those words, and does he agree that the WDA has, over the past 10 years, made a significant contribution to the economy in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Lady had paid attention to what I have said over the past 10 years, she would know that I have frequently stated that I opposed the introduction of the agency because I was afraid that it would be used as an instrument of Bennery. I have always freely acknowledged that it was not actually used in that way by my predecessors, and I have always been pragmatic in my desire to make the most effective use of the agency. I believe that that is what we have done since the Government have been in office.

Mr. Harvey: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the initiative will be warmly welcomed throughout rural areas of Wales? Will his Department consult Clwyd Fro in my constituency, which has extensive experience relevant to the proposed initiative?

Mr. Edwards: Yes, the Department will do that, particularly as our new initiative will have a number of pilot enterprise groups which are not dissimilar to the organisation that my hon. Friend has described. We are introducing these on an experimental basis to bring in the maximum expertise, experience and advice for people who are developing business and other initiatives in the countryside.

Mr. Foot: As the right hon. Gentleman has acknowledged one conversion about the WDA, may I encourage him to make another? Over the weekend he announced a number of increases in factory allocations, three of which are in my constituency. However, we need double that number to meet even our most elementary needs. How much extra money has he received from the Budget to carry out the kind of WDA programme needed in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I shall bear that in mind when I next make my allocations. It is, however, absolutely characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman that, whenever he gets anything, he asks me to double it. We have properly considered and assessed the needs of his borough. I have approved proposals by the WDA to construct two 10,000 sq ft and one 25,000 sq ft advance factories at Rassau, and I believe that that is the immediate need. However, the right hon. Gentleman is wrong to make demands that are not based on current need. He believes that we should double everything, on the basis that if money is thrown and scattered around, that must do good, even though it is not based on a proper assessment of need.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Secretary of State aware that £500,000 a year will not solve the major problems of deprivation in many rural areas in Wales? In view of the initiative taken by the Development Commission in England to designate rural development areas so that they will be eligible for European regional development fund grants, can he give an assurance that in Wales, too, outside the Mid Wales Development area, rural development grants will be available through the ERDF as a result of his initiative?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman picks on one sum of money as part of a package. The scheme that we have introduced is an additional one, as I have made clear. We have sought to bring together the wide range of schemes that exist—the large amount of money that is being spent by the development agencies, the tourist board and the ERDF—in a coherent and cohesive package. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to write down the importance of that initiative.

Mr. Raffan: Will my right hon. Friend pass on to the WDA the thanks of the borough of Delyn for the funding that the agency has provided to prepare a No. 1 site at Greenfield for new factory units? At the same time, will he ask the agency to explore all possible means to provide advance factory units at Prestatyn where the unemployment rate is now almost as high as it is in Delyn?

Mr. Edwards: I note what my hon. Friend said, and I shall see that it is considered by the WDA.

Dr. Roger Thomas: There is a general welcome for the improvement and strengthening of the WDA's hand on rural areas, but has not the Mid Wales Development got a long lead for grants for rural areas in Wales? For too long we have had first and second-class rural areas. Would it not have been better to extend the boundaries of the Mid Wales Development?

Mr. Edwards: No. We considered carefully whether to extend the boundaries and we concluded that the best way to proceed was to improve the arrangements that the WDA can make under its already extensive powers and allow Mid Wales Development to concentrate on its task in the area that was designated by the previous Government. The two agencies working together with the Wales Tourist Board can put a coherent package together. I want to check on the position with regard to the ERDF and I shall write to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

Mr. Geraint Howells: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman one more question to clarify the financial position? How much extra financial aid will be given to the Development Board for Rural Wales, how much for the WDA and how much for the Wales Tourist Board?

Mr. Edwards: The announcement of the rural package does not affect the overall financial provision that has been made and is being announced in the usual way for the agencies. What is specific in the rural package is the new DRIVE scheme, for which £1 million has been allocated for a particular set of grants. As the hon. Gentleman is also aware, the total resources of the WDA do not come simply from grant, but from receipts, and they make up almost half the total. Therefore, it is the total budget that is available to the agencies that is important in considering the resources that can be devoted during a particular year.

Rate Precepts (County Councils)

9. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the average increase in rate precepts by county councils in Wales this year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 22·9p, or 13·9 per cent.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my right hon. Friend aware that that percentage would have been considerably higher, most notably in the county of Clwyd, had it not been for the firm way in which he handled the matter? Is he also aware that the present arbitrary and unpredictable methods of allocating Government support by way of rate support grant make it difficult for county councils to plan ahead and that if they cannot plan ahead it becomes correspondingly difficult for them to make economies?

Mr. Edwards: Bearing that in mind, I hope my hon. Friend will warmly support the measures for improving the system of local government finance that are contained in the consultative document that we have issued. It is because of the shortcomings in the existing system, which we freely acknowledge, that we are making major recommendations for reform.

Dr. Marek: Will the Secretary of State accept that his continuing policy of draconian grant hold-back and draconian grant penalties for councils which wish to provide proper services for their citizens will lead, certainly in the case of Clywd, to the closure of many primary schools in rural areas and to the county council having to cease providing nursery education in the county? That is the shameful result of his policies.

Mr. Edwards: I noticed with interest a report in the Daily Post headed "Too top-heavy with bosses". That article described reports that had been submitted by consultants to the Clywd county council which outlined the types of economies that could be made without leading to the consequences that the hon. Gentleman described. I suspect that, whatever the truth of that newspaper report, it is true that many improvements in efficiency can be made by the county council.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is my right hon. Friend aware that these huge increases are regarded with horror and dismay by industrialists, business men and small shopkeepers? It is a terrible burden to place on people who work in difficult areas.

Mr. Edwards: I wish that my hon. Friend had made that point absolutely clear to members of his own county council, the Labour-led county council, which has increased its rates precept by more than twice the rate of inflation. That is an increase for which I can see no possible jusitification.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Bearing in mind the social distress experienced throughout Wales at present—so much directly due to the policies of the Government—does the Secretary of State not realise that this is hardly the time to put our local authorities in a straitjacket? Why does he not accept that they have many additional problems and commitments, which they are trying to handle in a most responsible fashion?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that this is a generous settlement for Wales, which allows for increases at least at the level of inflation. The people who are in the straitjackets are the unfortunate ratepayers, who are faced with demands which they cannot meet except by getting rid of employees or by increasing charges to their customers. That is the policy being advocated by the Labour Front Bench, and I hope that it is widely noted.

Alcohol Abuse

10. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals his Department has for lessening alcohol abuse in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Government's policy on measures to tackle alcohol abuse is outlined in the discussion document "Drinking Sensibly". The efforts of health educators, hostels and support groups such as local councils on alcoholism have been aided by the Welsh Office for several years. Recent developments include the establishment of Alcohol Concern Wales and the publication by the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales of a report "Dealing with Alcohol Problems in Wales". I expect to receive the committee's final strategy shortly and I shall then consider what further action needs to be taken.

Mr. Grist: Does my hon. Friend agree that although, quite rightly, a great deal of attention has been directed to drug abuse and the growing threat that it poses, nevertheless the toll that alcohol takes in terms of broken families, misery, violence, murder and general social disorder is quite disgraceful and is often overlooked?

Mr. Robinson: We have had a programme to tackle alcohol misuse over a number of years. The problems of drug misuse are very different, in the sense that we have to take action to prevent the stuff from coming into the country and to prevent the situation from getting worse. That, of course, is expensive.

Housing Defects Act

11. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to announce an uprating of the grant limits set under the Housing Defects Act.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is clear that for some types of PRC houses the present eligible limit is adequate. There are categories where experience may prove this is not the case, and the limit will be kept under review.

Mr. Ron Davies: I do not think the Minister needs any more experience because about two years ago his colleague, the hon. Member for Conway (Mr. Roberts) wrote to me stating that he was fully aware of the problem and that the Welsh Office was keeping the matter under review. I put to him the specific problem of Woolaway homes. The excuse used so far by the Welsh Office is that there is no PRC licence scheme available. Will the Minister confirm that there is a PRC licence scheme now available and there is no reason other than the obduracy of the Welsh Office why the grant limit should not be increased? The attitude of the Welsh Office seems to be that it will monitor schemes and review the limit in an upward direction if it proves necessary. That is no good at all. Unless the limit is raised there is no prospect of any work being carried out.

Mr. Robinson: Reinstatement schemes have been introduced during the past two years. I can confirm that a scheme for Woolaway homes was approved on 3 March. As I have said, we continue to keep the expense limit under review in the light of experience. If the hon. Gentleman has evidence of such experience regarding Woolaway homes, I should be grateful if he would send it to me.

General Certificate of Education

12. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has had any discussions with the Welsh Joint Education Committee about the level of funding necessary to enable it to provide course materials for the new general certificate of secondary education for those children taking such examinations through the medium of the Welsh language in June 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The responsibility for co-ordinating the introduction of GCSE rests with the Secondary Examination Council, acting in conjuction with the Welsh Joint Education Committee in Wales, and there has therefore been no discussion between my Department and the WJEC on that subject.

The resourcing of individual schools, including the provision of course materials in Welsh, is a matter for local education authorities. However, following the Government's announcement on 13 March, an additional £1·18 million is being made available to Welsh local education authorities in 1986-87 and 1987-88 specifically for the provision of books and equipment for the GCSE.

A further £15,000—additional to the £45,000 already provided—is being made available in Wales for teacher training for the new examination, and we are actively considering another WJEC written request for £150,000 for further teacher training in 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that, although the examination is generally welcomed, there is a real worry that teachers will not be trained in time to start the course in September this year? Gwynedd alone needs about £660,000 to launch the course. The money that has been made available is simply not adequate for the purpose. Will the Minister undertake to reconsider? Would it not be better to start the examination a year later than to make it a political football this year?

Mr. Roberts: The money that has been made available for training is precisely what the WJEC requested of us. Training is very much up to the teachers. In Gwynedd, they have not been assisted at all by head teachers preventing them from attending training courses. There will be further opportunities for them, however, including the two days before the end of the summer term.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Sunday Trading

22. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if the commissioners will make it their policy that all new leases granted by them for commercial premises prohibit their use for trading on Sundays.

Sir William van Straubenezee The Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners: The Commissioners' standard form of lease provides that their shops should open "during the normal business hours of the locality".
Should the current law be amended, the commissioners will consider the position.

Mr. Bruinvels: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a distinct, although sad, possibility that Sunday trading will be upon us? Is it not incumbent on the Church Commissioners to give a lead to the rest of the country by inserting in the leases of new businesses a provision which prevents them from trading on Sundays? I appreciate that the Church Commissioners already hold £26 million-worth of shares in companies that are likely to trade on Sundays, but does my hon. Friend agree that the best way forward is to set such a requirement to ensure that the Church Commissioners are whiter than the rest of the country and that new estates which are to open in Ipswich, Kingston, Birkenhead and Stockport do not trade on Sundays?

Sir William van Straubenzee: With respect to my hon. Friend, Sunday trading is with us, and has been for some time. That is not the issue. The issue is whether, in tidying up a wholly unsatisfactory law, the House should go as far as complete abolition. That matter goes wider than this question. As I have said, the Church Commissioners will consider the matter if and when the law is changed.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Since we last had questions on this subject, have the Church Commissioners also received representations from the public about Sunday opening? If so, what steps have they taken, or do they plan to take, or to make it clear on behalf of the interests that they represent that there is increasingly widespread anxiety at the Government's continuing intention not to change their original plans but to ensure that there is a complete derestriction of Sunday trading?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am not aware, although I shall inquire, of any additional specific representations. If I am wrong on that, I shall inform the hon. Member. He is totally accurate in saying that the overwhelming view of the Church of England as a whole, to which the Church Commissioners have responded—it is for them that I answer—is hostile to the idea of the total abolition of trading restrictions.

Mr. Aitken: Is my hon. Friend aware that until recently the cathedral shop in the precincts of Canterbury cathedral was vigorously trading on Sundays by selling beer mats and other tourist knick-knacks? Would it not be wiser for the Church Commissioners to correct the beam on ecclesiastical premises before they try to correct the mote in commercial premises?

Sir William van Straubenzee: That is precisely why they did so. It came as a surprise to one or two senior dignitaries to discover that this practice was going on. I imagine that my hon. Friend discovered it because one of the books on sale is very useful in the purchase of beer.

Mr. Ryman: Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that this is a far wider issue, and that if the Shops Bill were introduced and passed into law——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It cannot be wider than the new leases referred to in the question.

Mr. Ryman: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. The principle arises from the specific question. The Auld report recognised the anomalies in the law, but would it not be monstrous if the Government used their majority to force the Shops Bill through the House in the face of widespread opposition from the trade unions, acting to protect their members, and the Christian community throughout the country, when it would wholly alter the character of a Sunday? Does the hon. Gentleman agree——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I gave the hon. Gentleman a good steer on that.

Mr. Ryman: I shall throw some leases in.

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am answering only about new leases as and when the law is changed. If it is changed, the matter will have to be reconsidered. Meanwhile, the views of the Church are well known, and, needless to say, I share them and associate myself with them.

Mr. Cormack: Before granting new leases, will my hon. Friend and his colleagues wait until the House has had time to deliberate? Does he agree that we do not want a high street Sunday, and therefore if the law as at present proposed is passed no new leases should be given to shops in high streets to trade on Sundays?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I shall gladly consider that, in the light of my hon. Friend's penetrating comments.

Clergy Stipends

23. Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what account the Church Commissioners take, in calculating stipends, of congregational Easter offerings to the clergy; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The level of individual clergy stipends is a diocesan matter. However, I can say that dioceses do take into account any Easter offerings paid direct to the clergyman when they assess the amount of augmentation grant to be paid.

Mr. Greenway: Is it not a fact that, throughout the land on Easter Sunday next, in accordance with ancient tradition, church people of all ages, including school-children, will be invited to make personal contributions to their incumbents? Will they not be distressed when they discover that those contributions do not go direct to the vicars, but are part of the stipends? Will the Church Commissioners, with their £1·7 billion assets, look again at this to see whether they can ensure that Easter offerings intended for vicars are paid to vicars?

Sir William van Straubenzee: In operating this policy the Church commissioners are responding to a strategy laid down in 1975 by the General Synod, which was designed essentially to have a greater element of fairness as between one incumbent and another. The laity of the Church have now overtaken the church Commissioners in providing their share of the stipends, while the Church Commissioners are wholly responsible for the money that is paid by way of pensions.

Women

24. Mr. Dubs asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many of those for whose pay the Church Commissioners are responsible are women; and if he will break down these figures by category of employment.

Sir William van Straubenzee: There are 137 women on the commissioners' staff. The commissioners also contribute to the pay of 536 full and part-time deaconesses and female lay-workers and 100 women employed on the staffs of the archbishops and diocesan bishops. I have arranged to publish the full details in the Official Report.

Mr. Dubs: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that many women wish to take holy orders, but are debarred from doing so, and look with gratitude to the General Synod's recent decision that women should be allowed to become deacons? Will the hon. Gentleman do all that he can to expedite that matter?

Sir William van Straubenzee: If I am entrusted with this issue, I shall do all that I can to place any necessary legislation before the House. The first measure will involve women as deacons, which is theologically quite distinct from women as priests. However, I have a feeling that the second measure will not fall to me during this Parliament.

Mr. Frank Field: As most of the money raised in parishes is raised by women, what weight should the House give to the view that there should be no taxation without representation when it comes to consider the measure concerning women deacons?

Sir William van Straubenzee: In accordance with tradition, I am sure that hon. Members will want to listen to representations from every side when that measure comes before the House. I am convinced of the arguments, but it is for the House to decide.

Following are the details:

"Faith in the City"

26. Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what initiatives the Church Commissioners are taking to implement those recommendations in the report entitled "Faith in the City" which cover matters within the commissioners' responsibility.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The commissioners have offered to provide the secretariat for the proposed Church urban fund and they will give sympathetic consideration to the proposal that they should contribute £1 million per annum towards the fund. This, however, would require legislation.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. In hindsight, and in view of what was written in "Faith in the City", is it not a pity that so many churches in the urban priority areas were demolished, as they were very much the focal points of their communities? Does the Church have any plans to have a physical presence once more in those areas?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I must question the assumption that my hon. Friend has made. To my certain knowledge every case of proposed demolition, whether in an urban area or elsewhere, is given most serious consideration from all points of view, including that of pastoral care. If my hon. Friend does not feel that that has happened in a specific case, I should be happy to look at the matter. However, in general, great care is taken.

THE ARTS

Local Government Reform

27. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts if he intends to monitor the impact on the funding of the arts of the abolition of the Greater London council; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I shall, of course, continue to take a close interest in the progress of the arts in the abolition areas, and I have confidence in their future.

Mr. Banks: Is the Minister aware that in the GLC's so-called spending spree, £4·6 million is earmarked for the arts in London? Indeed, this issue is the subject of a case at present being dealt with in the other place. Is the Minister prepared to use his good offices, as a member of the Tory party, to persuade Westminster to drop its pernicious action against the GLC? If he is not prepared to do so and the case goes against the GLC, will he put pressure on the London Residuary Body to ensure that that money goes to the Richmond scheme so that the arts in London benefit?

Mrs. Kellet-Bowman: Speech.

Mr. Banks: It was a better speech than the hon. Lady will ever make.

Mr. Luce: I note that the Court of Appeal has upheld Westminster city council's challenge as to the legality of the GLC's spending plans. I understand that the GLC has sought leave to appeal, and I cannot therefore comment on the court's decision. However, I must make the Government's position in general quite clear. We do not consider it appropriate that the GLC or the metropolitan county councils should, at this late stage, incur significant expenditure on new initiatives without the approval of the successor authorities. That is our position.

Mr. Jessel: Does my right hon. Friend agree that real art, which excites, inspires, uplifts and enriches people's lives can be greatly benefited by a budget, whereas the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and his friends on the GLC gave a significant part of their budget for the promotion of degrading and decadent rubbish?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) should end his obsession with the past and look with a bit more optimism to the exciting things that can happen in future in the Greater London area. I also agree with my hon. Friend that the tax relief that is to be provided for single gifts to charities by companies will make a positive contribution to the arts. Arts organisations should now go out and try to persuade businesses to give them their support.

Mr. Buchan: Does the Minister recognise that if it were not for the malevolent and foolish actions of both his Government and Westminster council the GLC would now be able to save some of the arts described by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel)? The GLC could come to the rescue of the Victoria and Albert museum in the same way as it came to the rescue of the Cottesloe theatre. Will the Minister fill the place of the GLC? Will he give the proper funds to the Victoria and Albert to repair the damage caused by the flood?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Westminster council. It should be strongly praised for agreeing to provide £3 million for the arts in the Greater London area. If other councils, such as Islington borough council, followed the Westminster example we would make some progress. I have a great deal of sympathy, as I am sure does the whole House, for Sir Roy Strong and his staff, who have done a magnificent job over the weekend following the tragic accident at the museum. I and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) will, immediately after Question Time, go to the Victoria and Albert to see the scale of the damage and to discuss the situation with Sir Roy Strong. We are considering whether there should be an inquiry. This accident occurred because of leakage from a temporary joint on water piping. It is against that background that we are considering an inquiry.

Sir David Price: Does my right hon. Friend agree that dealing with the flooding of the Victoria and Albert on Saturday is the most urgent artistic problem in London? On his visit today he will carry with him the full support of the House and will go in the knowledge that if he wishes to ask for extra money to fund the repairs the House will view the request sympathetically.

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I say, in the next hour or so I will see the full extent of the damage. I take full account of what my hon. Friend has said.

28. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister for the Arts what assessment he has made of the impact on the 1986-87 funding position of arts' organisations in Islington of the abolition of the Greater London council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 10 February about Sadler's Wells theatre, for which the prospects are now good. Discussions continue between the Arts Council and Islington borough council about the funding of other arts bodies in the borough.

Mr. Smith: Is the Minister aware that among the many valued theatrical institutions in the borough of Islington is the Almeida theatre? Is he also aware that many theatregoers, not just from Islington but from the whole of London, are greatly worried about the threat to that theatre? Will he make sure that the Arts Council looks favourably at future funding of the Almeida theatre, and will he also make representations to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to ensure that before insisting that Islington council picks up the bill, it is not ratecapped?

Mr. Luce: Like other borough councils, Islington has been relieved of the rate precept and the bill that it had to pay for the arts from the GLC. That will apply in the coming year. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the Almeida theatre is extremely good and has a high reputation. For that reason, it is not unreasonable to look to Islington borough council to play its part. On 2 April the Arts Council will announce its budgets for all those areas where borough councils have agreed to co-operate. The Islington council has not agreed to co-operate, but I hope that it will reconsider its position.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, since the Budget, the debate on funding for the arts has to be conducted in new terms, and that arts organisations which have been accustomed to look to central and local government for funding should look also for tax-favoured charitable donations? We on the Tory Benches offer our warmest congratulations to the Minister and to the Government on a creative initiative which will release significant additional sums for the arts.

Mr. Luce: I strongly acknowledge the role that my hon. Friend has played and the strong views that he has expressed in previous months. I am convinced that the Budget measures will transform the arts climate and encourage still further the amount of giving, not only to charitable bodies, but to the arts world. I hope that all hon. Members will do their utmost to persuade businesses and, later, individuals to give to the arts.

Mr. Buchan: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that, not only in Islington, but in the surrounding boroughs of London and in the metropolitan counties, it is a sick joke to suggest that they have the moneys to replace the missing funding? There are at least half a dozen extremely important and major artistic events in Islington, including theatres. Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that his predecessor gave a pledge that the arts would not suffer and that the money would be replaced? Quite apart from what the right hon. Gentleman expects of the boroughs, will he fulfil that pledge?

Mr. Luce: We have clear evidence, not only in Greater London, but outside London, that all these issues are being tackled sensitively and properly one by one. There are already agreements on these matters in Greater Manchester, Tyne and Wear and other areas. Only a few district council successor authorities are holding back the prospects of a sensible settlement. Islington borough council still has not made a clear decision. Other borough councils, including Hammersmith and Westminster, have agreed, and their lead should be followed.

Wales

29. Mr. Wigley asked the Minister for the Arts when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Welsh Arts Council to discuss the funding of the arts in Wales.

Mr. Luce: Mr. Mathew Pritchard has recently been appointed to be chairman of the Welsh Arts Council, and I hope to meet him as soon as a date can be arranged.

Mr. Wigley: When the right hon. Gentleman meets Mr. Prichard, will he take up with him the position of the Welsh National Opera, which said last week that it could be £500,000 in debt by this time next year because the funding was not sufficient to cover inflation? Will the right hon. Gentleman look at the recent reports of the Arts Council of Great Britain on the allocation of resources to opera to ascertain whether any of those resources could be directed towards the Welsh National Opera to alleviate the position?

Mr. Luce: I am in no doubt that when I meet Mr. Prichard we shall discuss these and other matters. I should point out that the budget for the Welsh Arts Council for the coming financial year is being increased by 6·6 per cent. That is a positive contribution. I have already visited the Welsh Arts Council in Wales. It is doing an excellent job. Of course, I shall discuss the issue of the Welsh National Opera, which has a strong national as well as international reputation.

Mr. Best: Will my right hon. Friend discuss with Mr. Prichard the funding of Opera Gogledd Cymru, which is a new venture to enable young people to train for a future operatic career, which will give the people of north Wales an opportunity to see superb opera?

Mr. Luce: As my hon. Friend has raised this matter with me, I shall, of course, mention it in my discussions. I must point out, however, that it is for the Welsh Arts Council to decide how to disburse the money. The important point is that I have increased the amount by 6·6 per cent. for the coming financial year.

Evelyn Glenholmes

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the recent regrettable failure to secure the extradition of Evelyn Glenholmes from the Republic of Ireland.

Nine endorsed warrants for the return of Miss Glenholmes were first issued on 31 October 1984 and submitted to the Irish authorities for endorsement in accordance with the United Kingdom-Irish extradition legislation. The offences covered by the warrants related to various terrorist offences committed between 1981 and 1982, including murder, attempted murder, firearms and explosives offences. The original warrants were returned by the Irish authorities, who asked for some technical changes to be made to their wording. Fresh warrants were accordingly submitted on 6 November 1984, but by that time details of the extradition request had been disclosed in the press and Miss Glenholmes disappeared from view.

Miss Glenholmes was later arrested in Dublin on 12 March 1986, and the hearing of the extradition request opened in the district court of Dublin last Wednesday on the basis of the warrants issued in November 1984.

Throughout last week's court hearing there was close co-operation between the Irish prosecuting authorities and officers from the Metropolitan police and the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

On Saturday morning, having heard submissions from defence counsel that the extradition warrants were defective, the court discharged Miss Glenholmes. I understand that the principal consideration which underlay the court's decision was that, whereas the standard wording printed on the warrants referred to information on oath as having been laid on the day the warrants were issued — which was 6 November 1984 — the court considered that the relevant information was that laid when the original warrants had been issued on 31 October 1984. I understand that the magistrate in London treated the further application on 6 November as having been made under oath adopting the information already laid but not resworn. The information required for both sets of warrants was identical, but was not sworn again on 6 November, which could have avoided the difficulty which later arose.

Even before Miss Glenholmes was released, the United Kingdom authorities had made arrangements for the issue of a fresh warrant covering one of the charges of murder. On the basis of this fresh warrant, the Garda obtained a new provisional warrant for Miss Glenholmes' arrest. Once she had been rearrested, she was brought back to the district court. I understand the Miss Glenholmes was then released, this time on the grounds that the court was not satisfied, in spite of a telephone call from New Scotland Yard to the Garda, that there was evidence that a fresh warrant had been issued in London that morning or that Miss Glenholmes had in effect been at liberty between her earlier release and her rearrest.

Following Miss Glenholmes' second release, the fresh warrant was sent to Dublin this morning. Earlier today additional warrants were sent covering the eight remaining charges and will be sent to the authorities in Dublin later today.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and I have looked carefully at the information so far available to us. On the basis of that information, it is clear that the extradition application failed because of a technical objection taken by the Dublin court. My right hon. and learned Friend and I regret that this technical objection was not foreseen in time and fresh warrants obtained. We are considering urgently the need for a review of procedures and the handling of this sort of case. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has instructed the Directors of Public Prosecutions for England and Wales, and for Northern Ireland, to ensure personally that all outstanding warrants in respect of terrorist offences are checked at once for accuracy and sufficiency. Under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Conference, work has already begun on a range of legal matters relating to extradition; and lessons of the past few days will be studied in that context.

For the sake of completeness, I should also inform the House that our inquiries have shown that in giving evidence to the court in Dublin an officer from the Metropolitan police made an error in referring to the dates on which the warrants were issued. I understand that he sought to correct this error but that an opportunity for him to do so was not forthcoming. This does not, however, appear to have influenced the court in its decision to release Miss Glenholmes.

It is deeply disappointing that it has not so far proved possible to obtain the extradition of Miss Glenholmes to face justice in a British court. It is essential that we all learn the right lessons for the future from this failure.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): That statement still leaves a number of extremely important questions to be answered. Will the Home Secretary confirm that throughout this lamentable episode the Irish authorities have behaved with complete propriety and that the Irish Government have fulfilled all their obligations?

We are told that Evelyn Glenholmes is Scotland Yard's most wanted suspect for alleged terrorist offences. In the light of the fact that the extradition of Brendan Burns failed through errors relating to warrants, and the further fact that two prior sets of warrants were prepared for Evelyn Glenholmes, one of which was found in the Irish courts to be faulty, not just technically — and the Home Secretary does himself no credit by harping on technicalities when matters of substance are involved — but in at least one serious material respect, and the second one withdrawn by the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions when found to be faulty, why was this third and crucial error permitted? Why were these warrants permitted to go forward without being meticulously checked? Why, during the nearly 18 months that were available, were the warrants not rechecked for accuracy? The Home Secretary says that they were originally checked with the Irish authorities, were found wanting and were corrected, but the right hon. Gentleman does not point out that the new ones — the allegedly corrected ones — also turned out to be faulty. Why were they not cleared in advance for accuracy and technical probity with the Irish legal authorities?

Who was in charge of this process in the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions? Is it true, as alleged, that this matter was dealt with at a junior level? Is it true, as further alleged, that other warrants that were sent to Ireland on other matters have also been found to be defective? The Home Secretary says that new warrants in the Evelyn Glenholmes' case have now been issued. Is he sure that they are in order this time?

Mr. Dukes, the Irish Minister of Justice, said yesterday that after the court adjourned on Friday in Dublin further information and clarification were sought from the British authorities at that stage but, Mr. Dukes said:

"We were not able to get it."

What is the explanation for that serious lapse?

Why did an official from the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions then go to Dublin? What was his purpose? What did he achieve? What was the purpose of the telephone call referred to by the Home Secretary that was made to Dublin from a chief inspector of the Metropolitan police? What was that meant to achieve? Could the Home Secretary say how a British court would have responded to such a telephone call on a serious extradition case? Above all, taking into account the important and sensitive issues at stake, why did not the Director of Public Prosecutions ensure that he himself, or a high official, supervised meticulously all stages of the procedures? Why did not the Attorney-General, who is answerable to this House, take care to satisfy himself that the necessary procedures had been precisely observed?

The Home Secretary calmly tells us this afternoon that now, when the horse has bolted, there is to be a careful inspection of the stable. That is not good enough. A full inquiry is essential. It is also essential that those at the very top accept responsibility, are disciplined and, if necessary, are removed from the offices that they hold.

This disquieting episode has created serious difficulties for the Irish authorities in their determination to co-operate with this country over the delicate issue of extradition. What is more, the scenes on television have given the IRA a gratuitous propaganda triumph. Slackness, incompetence and complacency have brought about this discreditable botch up. May we have an absolute assurance that steps will now be taken to ensure that nothing like this can ever happen again?

Mr. Hurd: I confirm that we have no criticism of the co-operation that we have received in this matter from the Irish authorities. I am glad of the opportunity to make that clear.

In response to the right hon. Gentleman's second point, the difficulty on which this case foundered on Saturday was a technical difficulty. I think that my statement made that clear. It was concerned with the question whether, when a second and revised warrant was sought from the same magistrate, the identical information which was laid when obtaining the first warrant needed to be laid under oath all over again. Whatever view one takes of it, that is a technical point. As I said in my statement, I believe that a great deal of trouble could have been avoided if that had been foreseen and acted upon in the autumn of 1984.

The second set of warrants which were held to be defective on Saturday were given to the Irish authorities and no objection or criticism was raised on them. However, I think that it is fair to add that it would not have been reasonable to expect the Irish authorities to have spotted the particular point on which the court in Dublin found the warrant to be defective on Saturday. But the warrants were available to the Irish authorities for their comments.

I am advised that it is perfectly normal in these circumstances for news of the issue of a fresh warrant to be conveyed, either way, by a telephone conversation between the police forces concerned. That has happened before, and I understand that it is normal. It happened on this occasion, although it was not accepted by the court for the reasons I have given. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is essential that we find ways, through the Anglo-Irish conference and in other ways, to ensure that such difficulties do not recur.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is there not a high duty resting on the Director of Public Prosecutions in all cases of extradition warrants to ensure that those warrants are validly and properly prepared? Is not that duty even greater when we are dealing with a matter of the gravest importance such as terrorism on a massive scale of which the person concerned is suspect? Is my right hon. Friend able to assure the House that the warrants taken to Dublin this morning have been seen and approved by the appropriate legal authorities in Dublin and that he has received an assurance that the new warrants sent over today are in order?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with the first part of my hon. Friend's comments. It is our responsibility to ensure that warrants of this kind are in a form which arms them against all possible difficulties and criticisms, whether of a substantial or technical kind. The new warrant and the other warrants which I mentioned being sent to Dublin today are identical to those previously sent, with the crucial exception that the information concerned has been relaid before the magistrate concerned.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Has it occurred to the Government that the incompetence of those acting on their behalf in the matter of extradition may have been exceeded by the incompetence of those who negotiated the Anglo-Irish agreement and who advised the Government to enter into it?

Mr. Hurd: I anticipated that the right hon. Gentleman would raise that point. However, I do not think that he has proved its relevance to the matter we are discussing.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Since my right hon. Friend has reasonably pointed out that there is no relevance to the Anglo-Irish agreement in this unhappy matter, it is not the case that the commendable and exceptional exertions of the Garda Siochana, to which I pay tribute, have no connection with that agreement either?

Mr. Hurd: As I said in my response to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), we have no criticism of the behaviour of the Irish Government or of their agencies, including the Garda, in that respect. Therefore, I associate myself with what my hon. Friend has said. The relevance of the Anglo-Irish agreement is that discussions are taking place under article 8 of the agreement to review procedures. Obviously the lessons of this event will be relevant to those discussions.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Surely the purpose of a statement in this House is to enable us to question the responsible Minister. The Home Secretary is not responsible for extradition warrants and he is not responsible for the Director of Public Prosecutions. We should be questioning the Attorney-General. The Opposition will have to take the matter further.

In any event, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this is not the only example of a defective extradition warrant recently? It was brought to my notice by the chief constable of Yorkshire on Friday that a defective warrant was served on a man called Anthony Kelly, who is wanted for questioning for 18 armed robberies and the murder of a Leeds policeman. Will the right hon. Gentleman use his powers as Home Secretary to tell the Attorney-General that when the warrant is served again we in Yorkshire will want better results?

Mr. Hurd: The matter concerns the police and the prosecuting authorities in this country, so it seems sensible that I should make the statement today. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will have ample opportunities for asking questions of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General if he wishes to do so. [HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] I do not doubt that there will be opportunities.

I refer to the case that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned. The gentleman concerned, Mr. Kelly, is serving a sentence of imprisonment in the Republic for offences committed in the Republic. Perhaps, therefore, we are not at the end of that story.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Would it not have been unthinkable for a British court not to have granted a reasonable adjournment when such a technicality arose —particularly one which emerged only in the course of cross-examination—and which must have been known to the Irish authorities and thought by them to be utterly unimportant?

Mr. Hurd: I do not want to get drawn into that. It is true that those concerned on our behalf asked for an adjournment and the court did not grant it. My hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues will be able to judge whether a British court would have taken a different decision.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): In dealing with this extraordinary example of sloppy, incompetent professional negligence, will the Home Secretary tell us whether in future we are to regard the failure by a court to administer an oath as a mere technicality? Why in a case as serious as this did not the Director of Public Prosecutions personally examine the warrants before they were sent to Ireland?

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us why the mistake was not corrected properly before Saturday morning, and whether anybody will take responsibility for this shambles in the way that he should?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. and learned Gentleman misunderstood the point that was at issue. It was a question not simply whether the information was on oath, but whether the information needed to be relaid, although it was identical to the information that had been provided on oath a week before. That is the point. I maintain that it is a technical point.

The Director of Public Prosecutions is responsible for the conduct of that office, and for the extent to which he delegates to senior advisers and officials the handling of particular cases. The organisation of that office is, of course, a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Far from this sorry affair being used as a criticism of the Anglo-Irish agreement, does not my right hon. Friend agree that it is a reason for those involved to try harder to make absolutely certain that the co-operation that was begun three months ago becomes more effective so that this sort of incident will not be repeated? Will he specifically ensure that those responsible get together in a working party specifically to make sure that this sort of misunderstanding will never happen again?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. That is exactly what is happening. Of course, as right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House know, this process has always been a subject of extraordinary difficulty and complication, and the failure in this case is simply a further illustation of that fact. I do not complain about the criticisms that have been made this afternoon, but that is an argument not for despairing of that process but for continuing strenuously with it.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy: (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The Home Secretary persists in trying to minimise the incompetence of those responsible by putting forward legal objections when he is really dealing with due process. Is he not aware that this is the fourth major embarrassment in extradition cases with the Irish Government in the past two years because of blunders and inadequate presentation of cases by the British and Northern Ireland authorities? Why has it suddenly become so difficult in London to prepare an adequate legal presentation?

Mr. Hurd: As I said in my last answer, this is an area which has proved to be difficult over the years. This is the latest example of it. I maintain — I think that my statement bears it out—that the difficulty on which this case fell was essentially a technical one and not one of principle.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Is there not a very painful contrast between the detailed, careful, and often dangerous work by the police service of the Irish Republic, of the Metropolitan police and of the RUC in obtaining the necessary information, sometimes at the risk of their lives, and the comparatively slipshod and careless way in which the matter was dealt with in the Director of Public Prosecution's office? Who precisely was responsible in the DPP's office for establishing the sufficiency and accuracy of the warrants? What hope does my right hon. Friend hold out of bringing this most wanted person to justice in the near future?

Mr. Hurd: It would be neither customary nor in order to give the names of officials. The structure of responsibility is clear. It is through the Director of Public Prosecutions to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Since this statement is principally about the DPP's office, since on a number of occasions the Home Secretary has said that this is a matter for his right hon. and learned Friend and since he has sometimes said "I am advised" after the Attorney-General has whispered the answer in his ear, why is the Home Secretary making the statement and not the Attorney-General?

Mr. Hurd: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening to my reply to the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) he would have realised—[HON MEMBERS: "Answer."] I did answer the question. I explained that the matter which is the subject of the statement covers part of the area of my responsibility—that is, the police and the general conduct of policy against terrorism—and partly a matter which falls within my right hon. and learned Friend's responsibility, that is, the DPP's office. Since we could not both make the statement, one of us had to, and the lot fell to me.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Although my right hon. Friend and his Department are not directly responsible, does my right hon. Friend agree that the degree of incompetence involved is such that there must be the most searching inquiry into the way that these issues are handled to ensure that a proper administrative machine is put into place so that this does not happen again?

Mr. Hurd: I agree.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is not the essence of the matter that the Home Secretary has attempted to suggest to the House that this is a matter of extraordinary complexity and that he has tried to weave a web to protect those responsible? Is not the reality that which is set out in the Government's Green Paper on extradition last February which described extradition by warrant as a "comparatively simple and expeditious procedure"? In the light of the evidence of the Director of Public Prosecutions' inability to manage such a comparatively simple and expeditious procedure, should he not resign, or, if not he, the Attorney-General?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that that is fair of the hon. Gentleman. The advantage of the procedure which we follow with the Republic is that it avoids some of the difficulties involved in our other extradition legislation, in particular the prima facie case which the House might be asked to consider next Session. It should be a comparatively straightforward procedure, but that assumes that everybody on both sides is armed effectively against the procedural difficulties, whether of substance or technical. That did not happen in this case.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): May I ask my right hon. Friend not to accept too readily that there has been any incompetence on the part of the DPP or his staff? If true reciprocity existed, as it should, the document would not necessarily have been ruled defective. Given the nature of the technical objection, would it not have been sufficient in this country for the court to adjourn the case for consideration before making an announcement on the application and thus releasing into the community a notorious wanted criminal? In these circumstances, should we not address our criticism to the spirit with which the Dublin court operated this business?

Mr. Hurd: I hope that the House has noted carefully the point which my hon. Friend has made with his experience of these matters. Choosing my words with care, and as I have already said in answer to an earlier question, I think that it would have been possible for the court to take a different decision on the request for an adjournment.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the House is clearly quite dissatisfied with the answers given by the Home Secretary, will the right hon. Gentleman make representations to the Leader of the House that a statement should be made to the House tomorrow by the Attorney-General?

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will have noted that request. As I have said, there are ample opportunities to put questions to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General on aspects of the matter which concern him especially. There are wider aspects, however, and several of the questions which have been addressed to me have covered them. I repeat that I think that it was entirely right that I should make the statement.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. Friend deplore the irresponsible attempts of a vociferous minority to use this regrettable incident as a means of denigrating the Anglo-Irish agreement?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, Sir.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Normally the standard of professional work of the Director of Public Prosecutions is extremely high, so why was it that the revised warrant of 6 November 1984 was not sworn? What was the reason for not taking the step of swearing that warrant? It contained revised facts and was amended to an extent that made it obvious that it had to be sworn again to conform with the law.

Mr. Hurd: The magistrate did not so require.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Instead of merely showing the second lot of warrants to the Dublin legal authorities, would it not have been more sensible specifically to have asked the authorities whether the documents were in order? After all, the Dublin authorities should know more about Irish law than we do. Does my right hon. Friend agree that they should have been just as keen as the British authorities to bring criminals to justice? Also, has my right hon. Friend noted the apparent glee with which some Opposition Members have greeted the escape of a notorious criminal? Whose side are they on?

Mr. Hurd: The revised warrants were available to and shown to the Irish authorities, and they raised no comment or objection to them on the ground of Irish law. As I have already said to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, (Mr. Kaufman), it would not have been fair or reasonable to expect the Irish authorities to spot the technical defect——

Mr. Stanbrook: Why not?

Mr. Hurd: This involved the relaying of information between one week and another in this country. It would not be fair to expect the Irish authorities to spot the alleged defect, which was thought to be decisive by the court.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Since Scotland Yard is blameless in this matter, although the Home Secretary made an adverse comment on a Metropolitan officer, why has he been put up to protect the Attorney-General, whose responsibility the Director of Public Prosecutions comes under, and who should be making the statement and who should now proceed in any case, after this series of errors, to dismiss Sir Thomas Hetherington?

Mr. Hurd: I have answered that question twice. The hon. Gentleman will excuse me for not attempting to do so a third time.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): Will my right hon. Friend explain why the Irish courts were not satisfied that a new warrant was issued for the second hearing on Saturday afternoon?

Mr. Hurd: I sought to explain that. There were two reasons, and I do not wish to comment on them particularly. One reason, as has been mentioned already, was whether it is sufficient evidence of a new warrant having been provided that the news of that warrant is communicated by telephone between police forces. I gather that that is normal practice, but it was not accepted by the court.

The second question was directed to Irish law, on which I am not competent. The issue raised was whether the release of Miss Glenholmes on that morning was, in effect, a release to liberty under Irish law.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Are there to be any resignations or any disciplinary action at any level in the department concerned, or does nobody take any responsibility for anything any more?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman could have listened to what I said in my statement on that issue. Both my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and I regretted the failure in this case, and that was stated specifically in my original statement. The internal arrangements of the office of the Director are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Can my right hon. Friend tell the House what sanctions are available to Ministers when they are convinced of the incompetence of public servants?

Mr. Hurd: They vary, but they exist.

Mr. Kaufman: The House is clearly highly dissatisfied with the Home Secretary's faltering attempts to answer the basic points that have been raised. The right hon. Gentleman harps on the alleged technicality of the failure on Saturday, but the magistrate who signed the warrant signed it "Sworn this day" when it was not sworn that day. Was that statement, which was palpably untrue, merely a technicality? Above all, the right hon. Gentleman has not told the House who was responsible. Who was he seeking to shield by himself making this statement? Was it the Director of Public Prosecutions? Was it the silent Attorney-General? Or, in accordance with the Government's style, will no one accept responsibility for this almighty mess?

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is repetitive. As I said in my statement, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have expressed our regret that this occurred. Therefore, we accept our share of the responsibility; and that, I think, is what the right hon. Gentleman would expect.

The point at issue was whether identical information which had been laid under oath on one day was required to be laid under oath on a second day before the same magistrate. The magistrate did not so require and it was not done. It is clear that if it had been done this particular difficulty would have been avoided, although everyone who has studied the case knows that even then there were further difficulties further down the road.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, despite the opportunist and derogatory response of the Opposition, he and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General continue to enjoy the confidence of the House and the country for the way in which they discharge their responsibilities to hound terrorists and to bring them to book?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that my right hon. and learned Friend and I expected that a statement on this subject would be received with enthusiasm, and I do not wish to understate the importance of this failure. I have tried to be open with the House about exactly what happened. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the disquiet on both sides of the House about the role of the Director of Public Prosecutions and his office, may we expect a statement tomorrow from the Attorney-General, the Minister responsible, on the reorganisation that he has effected of the director's office for the avoidance of further difficulties, technical or otherwise?

Mr. Speaker: That patently is not a matter for me.

Auxiliary Oil Replenishment Vessel (Order)

4.9 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Royal Navy's order for the auxiliary oil replenishment lead vessel."

The matter is urgent because an announcement is about to be made placing the order at Harland and Wolff in spite of the representations made at the weekend by Swan Hunter to the Ministry of Defence and in spite of the representations made by myself and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) when we met the Prime Minister last Thursday.

The decision should be delayed before such a disastrous course is embarked upon to allow Parliament the opportunity to consider the strategic issues involved. Is it Parliament's wish that privately owned warship yards—such as Swan Hunter — should compete against the massive public subsidies—£37 million last year—which have been given to Harland and Wolff? As there is enough work for both yards, why will the Government not place the order for the lead vessel at Swan Hunter and the order for the follow-on vessel at Harland and Wolff? Harland's has work until 1987 but Swan Hunter's has a shortfall. Why should the people of Tyneside have to accept a further 2,000 redundancies, which would give that area the highest level of unemployment in the country, including Northern Ireland, as the price for the Anglo-Irish agreement?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Royal Navy's order for the AOR lead vessel."

I have listened with great concern to what the hon. Member has said, but I must say that I do not consider the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House, but I hope that he will find other ways of raising the matter.

Evelyn Glenholmes

4.12 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the failure of the Director of Public Prosecutions to secure the extradition from the Republic of Ireland of Evelyn Glenholmes, suspected of the gravest terrorist offences, despite the Anglo-Irish agreement of 15 November 1985."

This matter is clearly specific and relates to events which are within the knowledge of the House, which took place as recently as last Saturday. It is undoubtedly important. You have heard, Mr. Speaker, the deep concern expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the statement made by right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

The matter is also urgent. You will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary did not answer the third question that I put to him this afternoon, and say whether he had satisfied himself that, in the view of the Irish legal authorities, the third warrant sent over this morning to Dublin did conform, and conform in every respect, with the legal requirements of Irish law so that there could be, if Miss Glenholmes should be apprehended, a proper extradition of the kind that was attempted twice on Saturday.

There is a third aspect which I would like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker. Our proceedings this afternoon take place four months after the signing of the Anglo-Irish agreement. On 11 March, less than a fortnight ago, there was a meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference at ministerial level. I wish to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of what took place as recorded in the official communiqué:

"The Conference welcomed the development of contacts between officials concerned with security questions, and the plans for these contacts to continue."

Later in that communiqué it states:

"The conference heard a report of the meeting held on 13 February to discuss legal matters including the administration of justice."

The communiqué also stressed that:

"The Conference agreed that at its next meeting it would consider . . . progress reports from the groups of officials set up under Article 8 of the Agreement to discuss extradition."

It is clear that the matters which were the subject of the terrible events in Dublin on Saturday, and which were the subject of my right hon. Friend's statement this afternoon, were also considered at the last meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference.

The House is about to rise for the Easter recess. There is no other opportunity, save through an emergency debate, for us to discuss these matters which are so clearly of importance to the House. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to agree to an emergency debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The extradition from the Republic of Ireland of Evelyn Glenholmes, suspected of the gravest terrorist offences, despite the Anglo-Irish agreement of 15 November 1985."

I have listened, as has the whole House, to what the hon. Gentleman has said and I listened, of course, to the earlier exchanges on the statement. I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Courtaulds Clothing Ltd., Seaforth

4.16 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The threatened closure of the factory, Courtaulds Clothing Ltd. at Seaforth in my constituency."
